"Starring gave a graphic description of his experience.

"What is your name air!"

"I'm Walter starring. I and my companions have so much desire to lodge here in your camp for the night because by what I percieve this is a camp of forest Rangers, and you may be camped here to watch fires and make secut security for refugees." The ranger smiled, but the water stood in his eyes, and after a little pause he au ld :

"I will call forth two of my officers and a member."

Bo he sent unother man, and called out three more officers who after a little discourse with him and his followers, allowed him to come into the camp, the officer saying ;

nome in you phristian friend, we are glad to welcome thee,"

Then Walter followed followed them into the campallo out down on a log near another beacom fire, and one of the men gave him something to drink, and conversed with him untill autill suppor was ready, some of the officer s also spike aspoke with Walter, for the best improvement of time, and thus the chief officer wishing to know something for the good of his rangers began withWalterWalter.....;

"Well General, since we are on friendly sides, and as we have recieved you into our camp to night lut lot us if it pleases you talk with you of all things, that have happened to you during your adventures."

"I am perfectly willing, and , am glad that you are so well disposed."

. That moved you at first to betake yourself on this strange and very great mission. which to us appears to be very democrous also?"

"I ha heard so much naws of the draudful forest fires and floods and other disasters that have been as it is said made by the enemy, that unusual destruction of country side that even too have been frequently a witness of I have been even driven out of the sections of the country by the dreadful sounds of the explosions that have newsr left m? my ears. And the Vivian Girl Princennes also begged me to go out on the quest with the proces to help them in their own efforts?"

ut" said the ranger" "tow did it happen you came through the forested country his this way where forest fires of awful sizes are spreading everywhere. "!

"I believe it was as God would have it, and before, came to general Arrenburge army I was persuad by the tremendous forest fires, and for a time I was under the fears of destruction, , did not know hich way to go, then by unlucky chance , was shot at from ambush by glandelinian spies, rescued by Gertrade Angeline, who took care of me untill general Arrenburg came up with his armics, then after that the left wing of the forest fire swept upon his army and routed it, and , had a thrilling time reccueing the general himself from destruction. After , was recovered from my injuries recieved during my rescuing the general, he directed me to Reneral Vivianias army, which else in such a smoke shrouded region I would have never found, and so set me into the way that led me directly through general Hansonias camp, untill finally reached here.

"nut did you come have an inverview with general Hanconia?"

"Y es and soon many interestings things there the rememberance of which will stick to me as long as I live. Many other ti things I saw before I reached general Concentinian Aranbur : lines, now hundreds of rangers there, despite the destructive fury of forest fire, , maintained their desparate fight against it, how the fires continued on o so relantiassily, that , lost help of ever scaling it evercome, and also that it made a scene as though the day of judgement had come."

"Did the forest fire keep general Arrenburgs army always on the retreat, !!!!" "Yes, and a most droudful one it was, it made my heart ache as ; observed its awf ul r progress, but yet I'm glad I have experienced a part of it so I'll know what I shall do in ano case another ome owner comen n toc close."

"Was that all you saw on your way tward general Arrenburgs lines after your injury??" "No, but it is too much to tell in one time . I also watched aldi r soldiers and rungers day by day cut their way through forests to make fire breachles, but all their work could not stop the flames. I could have stayed at that good generals headquarters for a long time, but that I must seek after the quest."

"And what sum you also in the way, that is before you was shot at in ambush. ???"" "Thy as I first started out from general viviens lines not far from the buttle field of E Evangeline St Clare, I caw the enemy moving off tward the northwest. Twas a strange thing to me for I never as the enemy make such a moved before. Yes and while I stood looking at them from a hige ridge, , now for the first time the forest fire that persued me and it was coming for Munleys army, and general Viviens too lay in its path. All these devastations caused by the enemy brought in mind Our alsened Lord hanging bleeding pon the Gross and that they insulted him with these disasters us he hang dying....You and while I stood looking on and ondering pondering on these things, some of the nearest glandelinians percieving me opened fire and gave chase but , escaped. General Vivian furnished with this disguise gray cout which you see I'm wearing, and also gave me this sealed roll. "and with that he plucked it out of his hosom"

"And what classed did you see on your way. ?"
"Baw." said Walt."But as I went but a little further, , saw the fire coming for my observation post like the speed of a hurricane cloud, and i saw hundreds of refugees flooing b fore it having no doubt left towns which were in its path. Then when I rescued him, and then left for Hansonias lnes and then got off again _ found it hard work to get p this hill, and as hard to come past two Blengigloemean Creatures because of my unifour uniform, and truely if it has not been for one of your guarda I might have retraced my stops, but now thank god 18m here, and , thank uoi a you for recieving ma."

Then the panger chief thought of asking him a few questions, and desired his answer to them. "

"Do you not think the devastation will hart all parts of calverinia, which from you game!"

"Yes, and , can only think of it with much shame and detostation, truely if , had been mindful of that countrys a destruction, I might have had opportunity to mobolize a large army of rangers and men from towns and villiages, and go out to turn aside the disasters myself if posible now . see it is impossible, that Calverinia in explosions, fires floods, and massacres and other horrors is nothing short but a terrible seething hell of dreadful serrow suffering and death."

"Did you not bring along with you some passes with which you might have an easier chance of entering general Johnaton Jacken Manleys lines?" "Yos, but greatly it is against my will to carry so much thrush, but to be successful in my purpose I had to coose choose to do so, otherwise surely enough I would never choose to use such passes any more, for should, desire t to enter a stranchristian line, . would have trouble to do so for the guards would wish to desirs an explanation of whi why , carry a roll pass into the christian lines and an enemy pass also. And I cannot throw the latter away a no untill I finish my mission. And yet all those things which I have seen and heard are my grief and resentment. " resentment." Well" continued the ranger, "Do you not believe som times the name reporting our cause is vanquished, which at other times such news is a perplexity for the whole world in general. "!

"No I think the reports are either a mistake or false. I have heard such reports but seldom, but they are nevertheless to me spurs, for in which such things happen in this war increases my determination to discover the ones who are responsble responsible.

while Can you remember by what seems you found these kinds of news annoying at times, as if the christian armies and our cause were vanquished?"

"Yes, when , think of what ' read of in the newspapers, heard of from the generals, naw startling letters written to violet and her sisters which they showed to me, and when , suw the whole econes of other great disasters, forest fires, expl sexplosions, and other floods too that seems enough to do it. And when I looked upon the discouraged faces of many of the best christian generals that is enough to do it, but when ; look at the situation in another way I feel different, for then I have the believe from histories that t have read, and reread that usually nations who are in the right cause, have the worst lack at the beginning of conflicts, and have the best of luck in the final issue. That should do anything to discourage such unusual lying or blundering reports. ! ! . . "

""""And what is it that makes you so desirous to go to general Manley Manleys army to find out who is guilty of the said disasters you tell me about in?

"Why there I hope to secure clues as to the ones who may have ordered the disasters to be made, and by finding at this I hope the c nation may be rid of all those things that may cause future disasters of the same And, for all this is a dreadful annoyance to me, for throughout the devastted devantated parts of Calverinia a horrible Palley of death is on, and there it is a great likeness of they infernal regions wfor for the good instead of the wicked. For to tell you the truth, I love the state of Culverinia next to our plessed Lord, who did hand doud on the Cross, and therefore I am weary of all these horrors, I would even fain be where I'd see it no more, and have this dreadful war also have its final climax."

"In Then said the Ranger leader;"

Have you a large command under you in general Vivians army. Are you a Major general too. !!"

"I have four divisions, six brigades of Infantry, and four cavarly squadrons, and six u hundred pieces of artillary."."....

"And why did you not bring them along with you on this mission!"

"Bring my army along on this MISSION!"

"YEg. It would be enfer."

"hy sir it would look very conspicious and even it would be exceedingly dangerous for me to have a large army accompany me, even though willingly I would have done it. But even for my sake many of my officers desired to accompany me and I was utterly opposed to them accompaying me on this adventure. It should would or sure would have been my exposure."
"But you should have taken them nevertheless and have them close by in hiding places near Manleys army, for you know not the danger of going on such an adventure when all the glandelinium are wise to all such spies trying to learn why the flood and explosion disasters were made."

"So it might seem, but I believed also general Vivian could not spare that force of men and that some parts of his army would need go to the scenes of the destruction of some of our fuirest cities. Therefore I deemed it wiser to go on

"And did you pray to God and ask His pleased Mothers Intercession asking that they They would bless your interprize, and cause a good council to come to you!" "I sure did" answered Starring," and that with much affection and devotion, for you must know that He and His lassed Mother are also very dear to me." "Did youconfide to Him and His placed Mother of the country suffering and sorrow, qn and fear of Total postruction, for I suppose you saw enough disasters to make that desf destruction visible to you."

"Yes, I prayed over and over again. The officers under me saw my fears in my face in my tears, and also in my trembling under the apprehensive fearings of the scenes like coming judgement that did hung over the nation especially Calverinia, but yet he He did not seem to hear me. "

"But " continued the Equger " could you say more why you did not allow your command to come with you?"

"Why I was afraid that the showing of so many men, could cause my intention to be exposed, and so what by one thing, and what by another, I left them behind to wander in this manner with only these few companions. "

"But why did you not trust more by chance of plans, and have them come along, pid not one of your officers persuade you to allow them to come along with you.

"Indeed I cannot hide my secrets away, for so far I am conscious of many on of my own failings, and I know also that any man by his conversation may soon overthrow any argument or persuation, he would try upon others, but none affected me this way though of course they tried. Yet this I can say, I was also very wary of giving them occassion, by any unseemingly action, to make them for four to go on any mission with me. Yea for this very thing, they would tell me I was too rash with my own safty, and that I would rick too much for even children that should have sent soldiers instead of me. Hay I think I may say that if they san any danger in which they thought to hinder me, it was my tendernoss in the o welfare of , islet and her sisters, or for the suke of od and His Blossed Mother."

"Indoed" said the Ranger"Glandelinia is like a remale Cain hating hating her sister Calverinia and others, because her own works w re were wicked and those of her sisters rightcour, and therefore all that Glandelinia has done is implacable to the good, and our novernment must deliver Calverinia and her slater states for our own good. Yet though I have not heard of the disasters Walt, yet from the first accounts of the explosions that have made floods, and from fires also it is clear to me and to the nation in general that these disasters must rank among the greatest disasters of the whole world in general/Movertheless these disasters through glandelinians fault cannot be literally account for. Closer inspection by the investigators could not be used to establish even the true rank of the eruption like explosions, for for war made cataclysms that would wreck towns from concussion many alles away miles bury towns a able off under earth debris, and whose oncussions were so loud as to excite the co mend of people nearly eight hundred miles away whi h explosions threw up such a quantity of debris and earth with the sume volcano meaness as to seriously deminish the intensity of sumlight for days and for forest fires to cover the country side for many months throughout the whole of Calverinia, must be the mot greatest disasters ever heard of or known to our own existence. It was something most unusual that even our jovernment really I know point believe, yet transmission as must have been the authorate of explosions that produce produced much effects as recorded. It has gradually become certain, as all the in wontigators have proven, and who have taken chances with their lives in exploring the whole disaster a country round about, that even the explorations that wracked and caused floods to sweet Abblecam away was by no mound the most remarkable feature of this most tremendous discoter. Yet it is too much to claim that the evisceration of these enemy mines of great size was only a more subordinate outhreak of disasters consequent upon the main disasters, yet it is certain that before that explosion disaster occured, others of the first mignitude also had already occured at a distance some hundred miles from that city, that might have began the origin t of the following floods"

"How do you make that out!" Asked Starring.

"Yan. "

"My the main relative importance of the unasual explosion, given rise to the velley of death over Calverinia, in flood fire and so forth, as compared with the main explosions and the resultant forest fire plagues to boot may be judged, it is certain that that flood horror did not begin, as the government naturally would suppose, with the big explosion fourty miles northwest of Abbieunn. That was rather the closing act in that diseasor drama, the sequel to other big mine explosions like or utions at more than two hundred miles distance from Abbieann." "How can any one prove that?" demanded Walter Starring.

"It's It can be or proven by the fact that the debris of many other ernormous explos ions overwhere lies on the forests in fields and over w everywhere showing that the latter explosions have occured before the big minos set near Abbisombles blew up."

"That seems exemperated,"

"Well it may neem so to you who have not witnessed it. The discovery of the awful disasters recorded in the news and in other reports, and also as will soon be describ ed in many of our magazene mazagenes could easily famile the ausgestian for the whole world in general that there were many other phases of the eruptive explosions and flood disasters more interesting than the Abbisonn catastrophy, but any understanding of what really occured in those days of horrid bloody disaster months elsewhere involved so much study by government, and cographic and other Socitie societies that it has not been possible untill now to even give a loast verdict of the real ... nature of any of these disasters, and even jot there is much that must be left to conjecture, although the general fautures stand out fairly clearly. The take of finding at and interpreting the events of any of these great explosions and floods has been much the mre difficult, because so far as can be found, nothing resembles them us closely, or has mything like them ever been recorded before-Not even a volcanic eruption of the most violent kind op compares to them gince there were very fow real witnesses to the immonse catastrophe we therefore are limited in framing our accounts of the events of these horrors to deductions from the study of their awful effects on the state of galverinia. Indeed Walt it is hardly probable that any observer too close would have survived to tell the tale if he had been near enough to n any one explosion disaster of the Abbicann kind to see that a actually happened. It will be understood therefore, that the accounts of the explosions themselves must of naconalty be must up of reasonable inferences and conclusions ff from the only evidences left behind, rather than of the narration of a series of observed events, which the dovernment so desires. Any anyhow real facts are hidden or prevented from being known by the enemy,"

"It may be a fact at that" said Walter Starring. As I have cheard some time before before the beginning of these great explosion and fleed disenters, whose sounds first announced to the world that a war of battle and hell eruptions of gumpowder was in progress, and a pation of forests burning, with wild buttles and massacres and what not in anopenkable horrors, a host of smaller explosions burst open the Plains near Lake Solicia, through which ran a part of the Yellow Brick, or Big Girl Knool roud, causing the Lake Solicia Flood horror. The date is known but was probably sometime early in November 1913, causing a frightful loss of life for a flood over twenty one hundred thousand liewever the venemy did it, yet in the very formation of those ernormous mines, they were powerful enough as many papers say to present a feature at even a far distance even more unusual than for even a volcanic Phenomena nay put such an action of nature out of existance, nay this was no reawakening of d dormant disasters of the past, such as constitutes the vast majorities of early explosion and other disasters, but rather the man made formation od of new highly explinexplosive mines near the dikes of Lake Selicia in areas where none had been made, up under ground previously. If there had been nothing class remarkable about the disaster, this alone would have set it off as a notworthy event."

"Probably so" said the Runger, but the explosions were the sume at or near Abbieum don't you see The explosions there may be of grouter force for you must understand that proofs have been shown that the explosions left many crater like holes in the ground, deformed the face of the country, and made a stretch of five hundred miles of fiscures in the ground like those produced by an earthquake lies many of the explosions there were or how the explosions may have m looked when they occured, we have no means of knowing as the enemy even provents such investigations, but there is nevertheless every reason to heliove they constituted literally a host in number , and that the crocraters produced by the explosions consist of lines of cratiform holes blown through the floor of the plains nour the city, resembling parhaps the close set shall hales of a Viview Wickey battlefield though of course much larger that the explosions produced by the biggest shells. What ever the cause of these explosions of what their force it is certain that they looked like volcunces in erue eruption the throwing at ash and pusice in ernormous quantities."

"But how can any one tall how they looked like when the explosions came?" "No one to be an o can give on, idea of what the scene must have been like during this momentary stage of horror, before the flood same. In addition to such myraids of explosions, probably equally as great as volcanic scattion in all probabilities, accros of hundreds of the blasts must have been going on like a rapid musketry fire. One theory was that not far from this scene a forest was being consumed by a veritible sea of fire. Whether this set off the explosions also no one can say, but the audden outbrook of the flood partly rained the forest fire-Yet prodigious quanities of debris, mus as of earth, broken trees and water too sand and clay, sund stone and turf insued from the ground during the explosions, and later on the ensueing floods coming from only Heavon knows where poured at on the ground, following the slope in rolling tumbling torrents that carried alwa all before them. In the moment of the explosions if one could have seen them, to the blants no doubt would have made many ignorunt witnesses believe many separate volcanous would have appeared in diff erent parts of the country near Abbloom n such pouring for a moment forth its own contribution to the general chacen and then to be engalfed and put out by the nuclen devastating flood that follows."

"But what about the main force!"

"No one can account for that. Yet from each explosion there was probably a great black cloud rising to a considerable height in innamorable expanding lobulated convolutions. From evidence of other explosions, great flushes of woird granduer accompanied the clouds riving during the blusts. On making a most careful observation it probably would have been or become evident that the course of the cloud was more from high explosives than more mine powders. It was in fact pr produced by a mingle of gun cotton and T.H.T., and the force of the blaste might have been so great that the whole cloud was paffed up like those seen in graptions of volcances. If any other of a score of valleys in the vinicity had been the seat of explosion shocks and disasters it would probably be squanible to gain any information of its character before the main flood disaster, for the whole country foundabout was terribly devest ated in such manner as to destroy all evidence looked for."

"But " inslited walter Starring " what could have oraced all evidence?" "My the ensuring flood of course. Abbieum had been in its own place a regular Center for Railroads 1ke Chicago in morion, a part of the great Benden railroad also having run through. The city was much used by the best railroad lnes in the lines in the nation before the disaster which wired out all these railroad lines with the city. It is contain that none of those railroad presidents, ever suspected that this rich section of Calverinia might became the drama of such on unusual disaster. There was no indication of encesies being around to set in such droudful mines, and there had only been in the far off forests south of Abbicann as Independent forest fire raging. The region there was overgrown by dense forests of a ruce, poplar and birch, broken only by penda, a big river of the rminia pun and high tumdras in the low places. While any no might have any time suspected come disasterous explosion, the possibility of such a cataclysm as broke out in neugal state and awooting away such a big city as Abbicann would never have occured to him. There was only one man , know who claimed to be a vitness to one of the explesions near Abbisans mind you only one of the explosions, out of many. Warned by many other far distant preliminary war disturbances of whose character no clear account could be given beyond the statement that there might have been " strange earthquakes of neconds duration, one of the plains men, had gone up on a high hill near Abbiconn to look for the progress of the forest fire, and was having the full view of the city within his eye sight, when the nearest of the explusions occured."

"Were any others with him. ?"

"No he was the only one who had any opportunity of observing what happened near Abbiennn. I have racieved an unusual interest in his story, since meager as it is it constitutes the only scrup so far of direct evidence concerning the biggest disaster ever hard heard of that can ever be secured. He told me;

"It looked like a big mountain blowing p with lots of fire, with far distant forest fire coming down the vulleys with lots of smoke. At first , did believe it was a volcanic cruption occuring suddenly. I started fast for the lower places to avoid the shower of debris that followed. I then was herrified to see the immense city hid away in dreadful clouds of smoke or dust and heard a tremendous rear in her direction. I felt the convention of an ourthquake neveral times. It was a scene like a seething h 11. For fifteen minutes may half a hour everything grew dark, so I could not see. I thought hell had broken loose Later when and Abbleam ruined by the crash and then see the flood rush on her, I worked like hell to climb up higher to avoid being caught in the torrent.1'11 never forget it till my dying day-"

Realiting: 'A Amperia of the testimony of this man, I endeavored to question him to recieve further details, but none were de obtained. He and his associates were too badly frightened and too much concerned with the effects of the disaster, and with flowing "from the wrath to come" to make any detailed observations. He must have left the region before the disaster was fairly under way. Indeed it is probable that he and hiscompanions could not have encaped if they had been a little later. The forest first not in the path of the flood came down the Wickey Bay Valley and those were first of such intensity that they swept ever all the adjoining mountain sides consuming every forest in its path, every, westigs of vegetation throughout the area surrounding the flood came of Bongal State and Abbicann"

"But is it not probable that those statements of the diseaser is not exaggerated to some unusual degree!"

"no sir. The worst will never be told. So completely were the trees destoyed in these forest fires that there remains to day not even a scrap of charred wood or any other evidence to indicate their former presence. In all the paty hath path of this droudful forest fire all plants trees and all, bridges over streams and so forth were completely consumed, and their ashes long since scattered. Elsewhere t where the fire had been somewhat lest intense the roots of the former abundant forest trees and lower vegetation remain in the soil but the fire made a clean sweep of everything above ground. On account of the complete destruction of everything combus tible, no trace a f a forest for six hundred miles hardly remains except ash and desolation. The entire forested region beyond the flood has been reduced to a baron waste, a near desert of charred wreck and ashes, Many spaces still smoke as if they were fumurole. I was told by am, many witnesses of the forest fires that the flames consuming the red hot vegetation like oil, converted the ground into red hot earth, and sand hills in the path of the conflagration turned into a single flery torrent of its own of seething swirling masses of red het sand and rock, which rolled down he valley under gravity. Pefore it finally came to rest this flery torrent run down the valley for a mile or so. Even at that distance the sand was so hot that although It no longer atterly consumed even new forests in its own path, nor started new fires up the mountain sides beyond its reach it still reduced every stick it touched to charcoal. The charcoal forests produced with the ending of the confligration are extremely impressive witnesses of the flery conflagration that overwhelmed them, far more striking than the baroness of the other path of conflagration, where the work of destruction was so complete as to leave the imagination powerless to reconstruct the original scene.

In many places I have seen the tranks of the everwhelmed trees standing where they grow grow, rected in the ground, but turned to columns of black charcoal, Such

That indicates something unusual indeed "said Starring. "Although Starring the description will undoubtedly call to mind the condition of an ordinary forcest fire, yet it some imporbable that the forcest fire can do all you say, but just the same I have to believe it me panger because though you might laugh at me I've soon sights resultant from forcest fires that makes your statement seem nothing, a more nothing. During the fires I have been a fagitive of, rocks have turned to the likeness of molten lave, and though those melting rocks cannot be compared to flowing lava, difficiently from a lava flow in many cases, they were nevertheless turned liquid whose before the immense heat. The physical behaver of this resultant fluid because because of the heat was of course very different from molten lava, for lava under the most favorable circumstances is aviscous liquid, loving slowly like stiff far, whereas these melting rocks run like water."

"Yes but, adoubt that the Abbiecan diseaser can be outrivaled sold the Runger. The tangual explosions continued for a time, say loss than fifteen minutes, past midnight that fatal how, touring groat yearing holes in the surface of the Bengal valley-the present mine of explosion craters which dot its surface in places where the flood had not hit now for course filled with water. Some of these as investigators found are isolated, others stretch out in long lines like beads on a string indicating that they had been placed by the sc secret enemies in long lines but in tunnels underground. In other places they are so thickly peppered over the surface of the ground as to coalesce and form compound nests of "shell like craters." everywhere. Two of these measure two miles in diameter. The explosions responsible for the craters, make shell craters of the buttlefields of the Vivian Wickey seige appear in significant so comparesion. Still these explosions capable of tearing up huge pieves pieces of ground in some places are thun a mile wide and upheaving them like volcanic cruptions would from the human standpoint form about as awe-inspiring an exhibition of titunic forces as can well be imagined."

"How far was the extent of the forest fire up there?"
"Well this fiery conflagration at its height sir must indeed have presented a spectacle if it could have been seen through the sea of impenetrable black clouds that rose above the burning forests far surpassing the most weirdest image of the droudful informal regions ever enjured up by post or preacher or pante in an effort to picure picture the place of overlasting torment. The spectacle of the explosions was not seen by the human eye but some of the fire was. Yet its resulty is one of the most impressive features of the diseaster. Not only did the terrific conflagration continue down the main army of the Nickey Lunein walley, trurd Evangeline St Claire for two hundred miles but it also ran back a sen of fire across the forested divide behind v a Ava Maria Hoights of the Vivian Hills, and completely encircled plamond mountain rushing up a side valley under the Bondon wills to join the main great conflagration again down tward Sound pend where its now heading. Here surprising yet a large section of the conflagration is pouring across the Mic-pollester Rier Riveralong which course it is burning both across and both ways sending one sea of fire down tward the thickly forested base of Heidi's Ridge on the Mic-Hollester side of the range, while another burns up into the main valley between Gound Bend and Gloriannia Ridges. Over most of this area this conflagration is so intense in heat, and trees are so close together that no indication of what was even a forest remaine. It is therefore impossible to ontimate the amount of destruction as yet.

The figure of the loss of the property caused by the explosions, floods, and the fires put together is so large us to puss comprehension. The country itself has been pulversized by the explosion and floods.

The nation is sending out huge armies of ablied bodied men not yet in the army to fight these blazes, yet they find before they had finished turning acide a portion of the fire it springs up unew somewhere clas. In socking to gain some magnitude of these awful forest fires we may inquire how it would appear as if so many big fires would be raging along the mountains of the Pacific side of the United states. The answer is that that part of the country would soon be entirely devoid of all its forests, and the effect over all that country would be as if all the mountain rage range of the Pockies would have broken out in eruption as vol violent as the most explosive scuptions we have so often read of."

Indeed they had out talking together untill suppor was roudy . The table was not forthcoming the rangers just eating out of military utensils, but they had good food nevertheless, and while they are the talk continued about the conditions of the wars progress, the difficulty of even all the men called out from various cities and towns to holp the rangers combat the dreadful fires,, ab also about Our Blessed Lord, and what se might fool and think over the awful situation brought on by the wicked Clandelinians, as namely what even He might do or cause to be done in the fu ffuture if Clandelinia keeps it up, wherefore what Emperor Vivian himself was didding, or what he did it, and why the Abbiennian Government was seemingly so slow to take a hand in the situation, and by what all Covernmental officials may have said and done about the series of disasters,, that why it is that emporer Vivian being a great warrior in his earlier days did not do something to Glandelinia, and why he had not fought with the enemy more than one battle, knowing that if such things go on us now it will be to a great danger to himself. For , as the rangers all said to Starring that it appeared as if the country of Calverinia was 1ke one Crucified with the loss of much blood. Therefore it was true that if any one who can secure any suffucient information not only aw as to who among the glandelinians did the deeds and caused the disasters by order or action but also how they got the materials to make such tremendous explosions, will put him into grace of great glory and honor for accomplishing it, providing I he did it out of pure love of country, to aid the Vivian Girls and not out of search for honor and fame alone. And bosides there were some of the rangers who did speak to the grout amperor who claimed that galverinia was like one of Cladelinians helpless victims who was forced by her to die on the grosse , and they attested they had heard from his own lips, that he is such a lever of of his own country and her states, that the like is not to be found from any other ruler from the east to the west, and that emperorWivian was striving to arouse the nation as fiercely as possible to aid him to crush wicked@landolinion,.

They more over gave an instance of what they said and affirmed, and was that he had stripe himself of much of his own possessions that he might do this for the sake of aiding the poor distressed refugees of calverinia, and his officials had heard him say and affirm that he was not goong going to tolerate these disasters from Glandelinia any longer under no conditions whatever... They said moreover that he had made many lieutenants of good learning generals, and had from many of the men refugees sprung p n w armies to swep swell the surviving sections of the mobolization camps in big cities throughout various part of the country of course any one mentioning that from the shocks of great explosions that it was testified the cities were so violently viberated as to apparently cause them to dance the "HIGHLAND FLING" made pturring bent double with laughter as he thought it absolutely something out of the ordinary, and that those who made such reports were plumb Bug House Capital B. Thus they discoursed together till late at night, and after they had comitted themselves to Our Blessed Lord for prot ection and for the hope that the far distant forest fires would not surprise them in the night, they allil betook themselves to rest, after placing a guard on duty. Starring was placed in a special tent whose doorway opened tward the sum rising, where he selt slept till the break of day. When he awoke it was morning, late in the morning beyond ten elc oclock but it was half as dark as night and the air was thick with smoke fog.

WALTER STARFING WITHERSES THE CHEATEST OF CALTERINIAN FORLST FIRES, THE HETICRS OF THE FIRE WICESE MAKES ARE UNUSUAL COMPARED WITH THE TERRORS AND DESTRUCTION OF THE RECENT EXPLOSION AND FLOOD AND MASSAGRE DISASTERS.

HE IS THRILLED AS HE WITHESELS PROGRESS OF THE CONFLAGRATION, HOW THE PROPLE OF A MENANCED TOWN WERE CARED FOR.

THE strange darkness and the smell as of burning woods and trees aweke them or otherwise it was probable they would have alopt all day so late had they remained up in the night talking. After some discourse with him they told him he should not depart untill they could see what the meaning of all the smoke in the atmosphere meant. At first they climbed to a higher hill but could not see anything so thick was the haze, and not even a breeze was blowing, and though so late in the season it was as hot as a interior portion of a Volcanic crater. They could have recorded heat of the greatest intensity. As rangers had to do and always do they therefore consulted a map of the Cal varinism forest in this locality, in which they showed Btarring first the formation of the woods near the Imperial valley, that it was a very extensive forcets of surpentine and fir and other trees, and extended for a thousand or more miles. Here also they saw on the record map the main stretch of the Mic-mollester woods, and the names of the many hundreds of big tar and peat bogs in these woods that if the fire ever struck indeed such a thing as calling it a hellish inform would be a more trifle indeed.

There had been many worthy octs that these bodies of rangers had done. They had olsowhere subdued forest fires that throatened good parts of the nation, stopped big grams fires, quie quenched the violence of oil fires in the plains, escaped the ferocity of the bodies of the enemy, waxed valiant in fight against seething flames of forest fires gone beyond control, and turned to flight the armies of Clandelinian fire vandals who tried to stop their work. They told him he he if he so desired how willing they worm to recieve him into the favor of adding in the fight they now would have to wage against the conflagration. Yet he told them that his first duty lay in his mission, and that only if the fight would be successful in enabling him to work his passage through would be give agaisstance.

They clowed him all manner of forest fire fighting equipemth equipment, which the neverment had provided for all Rungers, as sack, s plankets, saws, axes, explosive mar materials, water in barrels wagens and teams of horses and cutting and digging utensils of all kinds, shoes that would not burn and abosto suits. And there was enough of this to harness out as many men for the service for the government in fire fighting as possible.

They also showed him some of the other implements with which they had done conderful things in combating the Red Plague. They showed him the explosives used by the mining engineers for broaching the forest in the path of the fire, the low trees saws, the large saws, the ornermous spades and the picks and showls. They showed him besides many other excallent things, with which general starring was delighted all delighted and said it did give him on impiration to fight the fire if necessary.

Starring of course was really uppreh naive for the day before he had observed at a great distance a most plousant monstain country but heavily forested everywhere with enrormous thickly growing turpentine pines, a scene just then very delightful to behold added with springs and fountains so beautiful to be hold that it was known as the "Delectable Country of galverinia" Others called it Culverinias Immanuels Land. He had that night before desired to go forward, which he hoped would add further to his comfort because he know they were nearer to the glandelinian army he was heading for them any one close know. But to day he could see nothing but smoke smoke fog no matter which way he turned and a bake even heat permeated the atmosphere and there was not even a breeze.

Now he did not think of setting forward, even though they were willing he should for he desired to remain with them untill the throatening "storm" was past, but they did not like to detain him on his sistion but as he fielded inested on aiding them first as he could not proceed as he said anyhow unless the conflagration was repulsed they then said to him to wait untill they consult together among themselves about it. They only took a minute and then they told him to come, and they while doing it themselves harnessed themselves and him and his followers from head to foot with that fire proof suits lest perhaps he should meet with disaster on the fighting line. He being thus accountered, walked at out with his friends, while the mules pilled the wagons twurd the lower section, it being their proces to purpose to breach at this point as the Rungers being well acquainted with the situation just know where the advancing fire was even though the dark fog of smoke even meet to hide its light.

"Are there any big towns near the section upon which the great fire hurricans would menance?" he asked,

Then when they had just about got out of the large clearing, and headed for a wide earth road in the dense wooddes woods, they presently saw before them the van of an advancing army of A bble annians and angolinians. It was a part of Vivienia; great Abi Abbleannian Btbb: host. It was advancing down the road from the direction of vic-whitther Run further north, from a villiage bearing the name of penas and it was nearly 67,000,000 atrong , and advancing from and down different local localities, and roads.

This big oray now coming thard the main woods has no new affair at all, but a column of troops of almost oldest formation, though I might have to show the reader the origin of it.

Almost at the very beginning of the war, there was ramors of the enemy always making efforts to get this territory into their passession, and general viviania, Hamsonia, and Herdrade, with their ompanies of efficers, percleving the path of retreat that the various armice ander the Manleys were making since their defeat at grangeline at almo, and now before the fires, that their way of retreat from the northwest region of Sound and led away from the forested regions and tward Big girlkness, they contrived therefore to make a junction with Concentinian Arronburg and the Vivians too, warning each by wireless the direct course of Manleys retreat, a retreat wherein all concentration should be made against, otherwise the war might rage with more than usual fury in this section all the year long.

Therefore at this indication of danger tward Big Girl Kneell all troops, such as Calverinians, Angolinians, inians, winkis Avrocinkilians, wriponligonlians, columns, over plains, crops lands, places of glenwoods, and over hills and through woods of all sorts over risking to themselves the perils of the ever operate and through woods of all sorts over risking to themselves the perils of the ever forest owners, and babbe, fire, and that not.

And moreover in this big army there was followed by immence bodies of cavarly, armies of heavy and light artillery, munitions, and weapons of all sorts, and spice and occuts of all kinds. Here were to be seen too, and that for a good purpose, the members of the powerful domini in droves of numbers, great Professional secuting officers, detectives, and investigators for war and other disasters.....

The armies through this region advanced in a series of hufe columns of some distance apart but within easy sight of each other, under their proper and reliable commanders, where such and each commands are of comprehensible goof, so here lie likewise you could meet with the proper troops of each section of the army, where the best commanders of this army are someet to be found, and also military efficers who are priests and labour who say Mans for the soldiers whenever opportunity presents itself. Here could be found the Winkie Abyssinkilian divisions, the Abbieann columns, the Abyssinkilians proper, and all others, with the main bodies of the fierce Calverinians and Angelinians leading the van, where all sorts of cavarly took the course or both sides but somewhat in advance. But as in other armies on the march of one one is to be the chief in the lead, so greatal general Hansonia pedrufe was appointed to lead the van.

Now as it is to be observed the way of the adventurers lay just for this advancing army, and those who are well known by this army and officers needs no ontroduction to the officers or guards. At the time before tyle this army stared or started its advance Prince permains vivian, the son of mporor Vivian when coming with his father to join general Hunsonus army went through a portion of the big Mic-Holloster Woods to making a junction with Humson Vivian, and that upon this exciting and perilous times too, and general Viviania invited him to making a direct jin junction with him untill Hansons army should be come up with, and asked him to direct command of the army in person, as he deserved reverence for his great generalship and righteoueness. Yes because he was such a person of honor, general Viviania had him from camp to camp, and showed him all the lay of the country, how Munleys awance or retreat tward mig Girl Knool could be frustrated near a there, and a battle of good measure forced aginst him, that he might if posible cause the great Prince to take personal command as it was necessary he should do so untill he reached ansuman wast armies. Knowing the necessities of this the Prince remaily did so and was therefore in personal charge. This Prince as well as his brother Prince James vivian were great and loving friends of general Walter Starring, knowing his friendship and service under all ckinds of conditions perils, and meather for his little lovely and be brave sietors, the Vivian Girl Princesses, that is to say to put it more simply, Violet, and her sisters.

Now alter gtarring, and his followers, including the two girl and ne boy secuttt were heading tward this advancing army, well so they did, and met up with the van and behold even as they came within slight of the loading column of officers, all the officers and soldiers were moved, the whole command at this point itself as it were in a hubbub about them, and that for several good reasons. For;

"First, despite the fact that the adventueres were uniformed like glandelinian soldiers of chilfd child scouts, the soldiers and officers reconized them at a glance, know who they were, and made a great gazing pen them, some said they were fools for venturing cut dithout a force of troupers in such dangerous territory, some said they were deing a good duty on any conditions, but the others said that they would not venture cut in their manner in such territory without good reason.

Secondly, and as they wondered at their disguises, so they did likewise, at the appearance of three child scouts with them, but et all those who were of the advance guard were soldiers and officers well acquainted with them all, so that soon from one end of the column to the other, they sh soon spread the news that guarring and the three great hereines of the army have meet them. Thirdly, but that which did not a little mass the officers alone, was that these adventuerers set very lit lightly upon the perile of the country, they caned not so much of what they met with , and if quostioned as to who is whether they knew what they were doing they would only answer That the Vivian Girl Princesses cent Sturring, and he needed guides to tring him through the advanture. One of the officers, beholding them said;

"Where to General, and your companions?" "Sturring explained the giventuer and its cause, and this caused an occassion to be more surprised, some giving him tarning as to the campers, some trying to chice him out of his purpose, some speaking represenfully, and some advising that he should have a large body of rotainers or cavarly. Over his arival however things had come to a habbab of joy and greating, coming to a great stir in the commands, inso much that all order was confounded. Word was presently brought, to the Prince, who quickly rode forward, and after a heart, gr. ting to _tarring and his fellowers, and a still more ford gracting to the two girls had some of the soldiers to take them within the command, to be given the honor that was due them ...

The Prince Jarmaine vivian knew that gtarring was out on an adventure for a purpose to learn who were responsible for the awful incidents in _alverinia and elsewhere about which not only the nation but the whole world was overturned .. Caneral Viviania also came to see who were brought into the lines, and seeing who they were asked them from where they came, whither they went, and what their purpose would be if they were successful in their mission. Starring told them, all who were assembled, of their mission,, and that they were forced by strange and anastal circumstances to go on their journey through the evil sections of the country, and that they had left general Arrenburgs army since the first passage of the " Red Plague"But all those who heard the story, and asked assettions and recleved answers b did not believe them to be anything also but mad, or else such as went on an adventure regardless of danger to life and health, for the clandslinian armies which had put such horror and confusion throughout the country were more dangerous than formerly, and to enter general Johnston Jacken Manleys lines to learn information of which even the Princesses themselves did not find seemed sucide.

As Su Starring and his followers were all dusty, becomeared with south and blackened by smoke, and grarrings and even Angeline sichees uniforms partly burned, they were taken to a quirtar masters wagon, and for the purpose i of their adventures which they insisted on continuing were given citizens clothes in instead of uniforms, and then were get into a big mess wagon where they recleved a good hearty moal. There, they therefore remained for some time as the army was preparing to halt for a rost. Starring told how even when the refusees of floods suffered, how when near enemy infested regions they were made objects of the sport of the glandeliniums, malace or revense, the glandelinium leaders laughing at all that befell them. The howeless inhabit inte however were patient, and suffered so silently that as Starring admitted even some landelinians who were o more ob serving and lass preh projection than the rost, began to check and blame the baser sort for the continual disasters done to the country by the armies. They said that for aught they could see, it was no fair way of fighting a war under any condition and that there were many of the officers who were responsible for the disasters that were more worthy to be put before a firing squad than a christian spy, than were any others. The refugeed did not render railing for railing, giving good words for bad, and kindnessfor in injuries dong. Starring stated that many of the glandelin ian generals were charged with being guilty of the disasters which had caused such horror and excitement throughout the whole nation. He said that the guilty on ones if four found when captured, shouls be led through the company streets of a christian camp with irons on them, for an example to them and a terror to other wicked ladelinane glandelinianess. That the people of the States of Culverinia and others recleved the ignomin; and shame that was cast upon them by the effects of the disasters without a murmur or protec protest was a wonder, but it nevertheless won the compassion and aid of many other countries as far as aid could be given. The Abbieannian government had degreed the death of any one found guilty of the avful flood and other disasters.

Every new disactor had put the governmental officials into a greater rage, but it seems they could not do anything. And Starring called to mind again, what he and his friends had heard of the Abbicann horror, and were the more confirmed that the real terrors of that disaster would never be known as the flood erased mostly all clues necessary to be investigationed and traced. The stricken states had comforted such other, and whose at it was to suffer, and the sorrow ful inhabatants had committed themselves to the all wide disposition of Him that ruleth all things, untill the enemy should be overruined. Glandelinia's indictment was one and the same in substance, though somewhat varying in form, the contents thereoff being

That the Glandelinians were enemies to and disturbers of the safty of allthe christian nations, that during the war they had man horrors and commotions by

FLOODS And other disasters, in contempts of the law of Civilized warfars. After all this had been told, one of the officers told starring that on such conditions the mission he desired to perform was exceedingly dangerous, but he answered;

"I have only set myself against that which is bringing on such disasters to our beloved country. And us to all porils, I defy the devil himself and all his adventuresous angels, violet, and her sisters have depended upon me to fulfill my mission and r will.'

After Starring said this, a proclammation was made that they that knew semething or had chances to say for the generals, about the a effects of disasters they too might have seen, should forthwith appear and give in their evidence to therefore there came in three witnesses, whosen names were Columel Heiner, gantrio, and grancis antrio. They were asked if they know the general whose name is Walter Starring, and what th y they had to f day for the good of the country about the mission he was undertaking. Then stood forth polonel Reiner, and he said it, "Your Eacliency, I have known general starring for a long time, and will attest upon my o ath before this honerable council of generals and officers, that he is-"mold" said general Viviania " give his auth,"

So they sawre hosm. Then he continued on; "Your Excellency this man, is right in uttempting what the Vivian Girl Princesses have tried and failed, for what the Olandelinia government has done, in making those disasters, and committing the dreadful massa cree has made of itself one of the vilest countries in the woirld, she neither regarded, women or children, the Laws of God, nor custom, but in this war but does all she can to possess Calverinia by her cruel methods, which the wicked Glandelinian Covernment in the generals calls principles of war and its causes. And in particluar heard general Starring once affirm that he knew many who were witnesses of the Abbisam disaster and other big explosion and flood horrors, and therefore he is right in attempting to accomplish his mession and we should d. all in our pwer to power to help him He also said that christianity, and all the customs of Christianity were in dire poril because of such an enemy as Glandelinia, and therefore we cannot be reconciled with her untill she is rightly brought down to absolute submission. By which saying Your Excellency, we all do at once condem not on only landelinias method of burbarous warefus warfare and all her wicked landable g doings, but all her peoples in the doing of them. Therefore for the suke of the Bafty of our cause we should be to him a great aid in his mission."

Then said general Viviania,;;;;;;;;;;;;; "Have you anything else to ha

"Yes, your Excellency, I should and have lets more to say, only I would not rob others of their turn to speak. Yet it if it is necessary, when the others have given in their of evidence, rather than anything shall be wenting that will be evidence again 4 against@landslinia I v 11 onlar o my testimony against her.....

Then they called cantrio, and big him look upon a large map of alverinia,, and as he dise they also therefore asked, what he could say for the countrys cause against the dispators of "landalinias making. Then after he was sworn in he

our Excellency" said Colonel contrib, I have no great acquanitance with the Nature of blandelinia and her ways ... nor do I lesire to have any knowledge of her. gowever this know, from all news I have read, and from reports I have heard, that landelinia has done her share of disactor making,, and that giar a Atarring show should make make himself to all glandelinian generals a very postilent fellow. From some discour co that one day I had with him in general Vivians army, I heard him say that our cause was nought, and such by which no part of the country could ever win it unless we have mount to frustrate landelinias purpose of disaster making, and to drive her out of Calverinia, break down the recistance of the besisged at Vivian _ickey, which saying of his Your Excellency very well knows h what necessar ily then follows if his advise is taking, which it should be, to with otherwise, we will still fight landelinia in vain, are jet to face more terrible plagues of disasters like those of the past, and finally shall be defeated, therefore let him have a large force of retainers and grout spies, and aid him secure the clues of the disasters causes and those who ordered them. And this is that which I have to

Then Francis antrio ,his brother was sworn in, and asked to say what he hew in behalf of the Country, against the landelinia nation, of how gtarring should be aided in his adventures. Then he said;

Your Excellency, and you army generals all, this great christian scout I have in known a long long time, and have heard him speak things that ought to have been done the time the first disapter was started. If this had been done landelinia I'm sure would not have been able to progress further in her disaster making. The wicked Manleys and all their followers, had also railed on our noble and rightsous country and her noble leaders, and thereforecalse general gtarring has spoken cof correctly in his declaration of his wishes to force the true facts of he the causes of the disasters, and her had said mreever, that if all the Governmental officers in bbicannia, and hor statew, were of i his mind, if possible, there would have never occured but one disanter. Violet, and her sisters had said the same, thing, menides he has not been afraid to go on any such trip, your excell ency, calling landelinia at angodly nation with many other such like vilifying terms. with which he had be pattered, most of the wickedness of clandelinians."

"It would be bost for that purpose sir. I'm su e the rearunagate, heretic and traitor of a ganley has something todo with the whole affair, or that is one of the wanleys at least, or maybe all of them. I say also in answer to what colonel H laner said, that what he has witnessed concern concerning the disasters, that what rules or laws or custom or people is supposed to be Simidelinia has no respect for in that regard, as all glandelinia to diametrically opposed to all G odliness and christianity. If I had said amine in this, you can convince me of my error, and am ready here before you to make my recuntation. As to the others and what they said , say only this, that in the great catastrohpes made by glandelinia of the past, and these series of emeracus forest fires now rading, there can be no redress untill we enforce its coming, therefore whatever in thrust into the efforts of our government, cannot be done by humanaty alone, but by pevine ansistance, , but there can be no Devine Assistance, without having Faith in His help, therefore let the whole nation have masses said for our success in our adventure. For all what the Glandelinian nation a has done so far, as all of us know whether we have all been witnesses thereof or not, all of glandelinia is more fit for being in hell then on this with, and so the Lord Jesus have merc, upon us all, and ald me and my followers in the mission."

Then prince vivian Heamselife called to his officers and staff who all this while stood by to hear and observe. ""Centlemen of the Military Roral Staff we have before as a great lader, leader, general Walter Starring by name, about whom so great an acroar has been made throughout the van of our mosterous army, you have also heard what these worthy officers have said in behalf of his mission, also you have heard his raply and confession, it lies now in your breast, s to give him a good strong escort, but , think I will have to a Instruct to whom you should recommend, There was an act made by maperor vivian my father, that lost Violet and her sisters in their own scouting expeditions should meet with too strong bodies of enemies should have General Jachk Jack Evans and his retainers as their guard ians. There was also an act made by imperor Humson Vivian, my Uncle that who ever would not accompany the Vivian Sirls on their migsions when called for, should be disbanded from the army in disgraco. There was also a degree made by my own brother Jimale Vivian that whoever accompanied the Vivian Girls on their missions either openly or in secret to keep them out of untimely danger, should be duly rewarded. Now the substance of these laws is to be fullfilled for Starring, who is doing this for the Vivian Girls my sisters, and therefore he should have a good reliable bodyguard. ger he is out on one of the most important missions of the cause, not only ricking untimely dangers, unseen perils and the like, but also the horrors of ever opreading and swiftly advancing forest fires which must there fore needs be intolerable. For the actions of all the Hanleys too, their laws and war carrying was made upon suspiction of us, no war crime in the early war being apparent, but here now are the worse wholesale crimes ever recorded you also see he requested the body guard, and he for his great mission for the sake of my Princely gisters deserves to have a good stolid one.

All of those generals decided by jury case or bring glandelinia in guilt before the whole world. And first among thomselves, general Vivienta said;"I clearly see that general starring is right. Then said general Nero, "Away with Glandelinia from the face of the earth. "An ayo" said general Hororode" for , hate the very name of her. "Then said general ...ienstien." I could never endure the name of Glandelinia." "Nor I" said general Hubbard nowen" for she has always was waged wicked cruel wars." "Crush , her, cris her" said general Stanislaw."A sorry scrub." said general Grandy. "My heart rises against her." said general gladerlinia. "She is a murderer on the face of the earth" said general ghristic wilson." Destruction is too good for her" said general !Pensie. "Lets dispatch her armies out of the way." said general Crinson." Then said general Viviania" "Might I have all the world, and heaven given me I could not be reconciled to her unlest she repent, therefore let us forthwith struggle against her in the face of all difficulties and never desist. Starring shall have his bodyguard as he desires, and he can continue on his adventure and Pray god aid him through to a good success."

Therefore when he was ready to leave with his friends he recieved his strong bodyguard.

"The scenes had been awful" eaid ne of the officers. "Clandelinia is trying to put Culverinia to the most cruel destruction that could be invented. Clandelinia scourged her with disasters, deformed her land with fires and explosions, and burned up all her best of forests. If we do not do something 1 m afraid Calverinia will come to her end".....

Now us they waited on their horses for the arival of the bodyguard , there came ip behind them a number of other great christi-n generals, and they saluted Starring and his companions as they finally rode off, with sound of trumpet. They headed for the nearest way out of the pat path of the advancing armies as to go that was was impossible as the long lines of troops fairly blocked the road. Now as they continued on, the same officer who accompanied them, and who was to be the main, communder of the bodyguard entered into a brotherly covenant, and told him that he would be his ampanion. This officer whose name was Colonel anders Welsonia also told starring that there were many o more of the men that would take their time and follow after. About fifteen to twenty minutes after they had gotten out of sight of the wast christian army, Starring said to the colonel,;;;;;;;-----"What part of the country can we find general Johnston Jacken Manleys army, and how far do we have to go this way to get within sight of his wicked hoots! "I cannot say just now, declared the con colonel. "Some of the scouts said not long ago that he had been moving off from the locality of the town of pairkness and he was going northto west of grungeline St clairs to joing his sons armies who are retreating tward Big Girl Knool and Kittons placherts."

"Going tward those towns." said Starring. "Is there any grave danger for those towns there. My heavens floods and shock and fire have rained them terribly. Now the enemy going there. They must be stopped. Thank heaven Prince ... ivium knew that is and is going there too."

"Yes" said the colonel. The Manleys are joing there. "I hope Conventinian or Concentinian arrenburg gats there first. I heard he too is heading for the same wp spots with the two Vivian Girls in advance. If they all concentrate there, 1'11 bet there'll be some batte soon battle soon."

"Pray sic, what part of the country do they call it he is in with his army?" "whis part of the country is a stranger to me, as well as to you, but we can have him locared by ecouts. If not we must be content."

"That might be so, but this glandelinian army I have heard of, and as I have heard it is a dangerous one, and we do not for eaflys sake want to come upon it unawares. Otherwise my offorts will be of no avail, and we would have to beat it. "Yes I will assure you that all the armies belonging to the commands of any of the Manleys are exceedingly dangerous to approach especially when one retreat, and we have a very good reason to be careful how we come upon it, and I have sent many demini there.

"Pray how many memini will accompany us now, if a man may be so bold as to ask?" "Well" said the colonion Colonel, "almost a hundred, and in particular some of their officers. And to tell you the truth, I have sent gentlemen of good qualities, who have done wonders for me, and , recleved my command and commission from the same occupation as , am one of the officers of the H cemini myself."

"Yeo and the Supreme Person Hendro Darugr pargar, is a very great spy and Gemini, and his two great assistants dingigore and Whilliamson Bchloederine are equal. They are very honourable, and they too have arived to such a quality in their owkr that they know how to carry it all through, even to the uttermost-_is true we some what differe differ in the kind of work we do, but it is well for our success. First we never strive without success, we do it through all obstacles,, even against wind and tide so to say, seconfly we are always realous IN EVERY THING we do, and we never fail.

Then _ Starring stopped or arged his horse a little aside to Angeline pichee, and said;

"I'm sure that this colonel is one of the best of the cemini-and if it be so we may surely have a success in our adventure."

"Ash him and find out." said angeline pichee." Was gtarring came up with him again, and said,;

gir, you talk as if you know something more than all the world does, and if take take not my mark assino, I deem , have a half guess of you"Is not your name Ned perkins, the young men who first of all befriended the Vivian Girls when the war was in its infancy ?"

"That u is surely bmy name, and i am the one you mention."

"gut did you never give an occassion to the Vivian Cirls to need your assistance more than once."!

"Yes, yes,. The worst that they ever went through, had the luck in my judgement to accompany them at the time their enemy makeley tried to do them dirt, and I as every me knows pulled them through, whatever peril it was, and my chance was to get them away from him thoreby, but if other perils are thus cast upon me, let let me count them a blessing, but let not us run into perils heedlessly in

"Well, said starring I thought indeed that you woo were the man that I had heard of, and to tell you what I, thisbar we will run into more excitement, than you or I are willing we should even think of."

"Well if you will thus imagine, we cannot help it. It's the fortune of war. Nevertheless you will find me and my men good guides and helpers. We will go against wide and tide, through hell if need be to assure your success in the adventure, th the which I percieve you are determined to see through, but you must also take our advice, the advice of your girl scout guides, and stand by them when they run into peril, as well as when we have to fight our way through ... ut when we first sight any of the armies belonging to the commands of the unleys, we must not expose ourselves too quickly, not a stop farther untill we see un easy access. Never desert your old principals, unless they do not turn out to be as good as formerly, o lets go whead. It's getting too warm here to be comfortable you know the forest fires are very near ."

As they all rode on gtarring again renewed the conversation; "Now many divisio mof general vivianias army were pon the rode when I meet with

There were three ernormous columns under the generals of Francis erdrude, galder linia and Prince livian, all whom you are greatly acquanited with They have taught their armies the art of proper warfare, and all the soldiers have buttained much of the art of all their officers, so that they can do all their commander suggests." "Well that seems good and safe for as then, said starring put

"Prince Vivian is No is a great officer, and he is going to join one of the Vivian Girls to help him intercept general Manleys retreat tward Big Girl Knool."

"Alas" said Starring, "It is too bad we could not have stayed, that we might have had their good company, for they and we and you sir, are 1 going into good and thrilling adventures."

"We are all indeed, said colonel Perkins, but as you have your mission to perform which is a rigid one, and as you must do it for the cause you love so much, and as you also highly esteem the efforts of Violet and her sisters, we can always hope for a remion with an army by and by."

"That seems hopeful indeed, said Angoline pickes herself, "but we need lots of hardy men not men who are so rigid and love so much their own notions, and do also so lightly esteem the opinion of others, that let a man be never so brave, yet if we jump not with him in all rightful things, he'd want to desert our company."

"You"that would be a bad thing, said gtarring, "We have had experiences with such , even of those who are brave-evermuch, and such mone rigidances, prevails with them and come comfour condemns them only to their own folly. But , pray, what are the proper things we must do to accomplish what we are after."

"That is hard to tell" said the colonol. We however will have to make a long journey in all kinds of weather, neither waiting for wind or tide, and risk all perils and hardships. We have to huzard all for cause of country at a clap, and to take all adva advantages of every opportunity that shows itself. We chave to hold through through thick and thin, though all others light be against our opinions, and we must do so if we have to face rages and contempts, but we can succeed."

"Aye" said jennie murmer, " and hold you there still, good colonel perkins, for my part , can count ant one a cowardly fool, that having the liver liberty of haveing adventures like we all do, shall be so unwice to fail in the end, quail before hardenlys and run off. Let us be wise, and trust in God and His Blessed Mother, tie best to make hay when the san phines or not. Let us be content to tal take any kind of weather along with mo. For my part I like an adventure best that will stand with the security of gods good plessing unto us at all times, for who can imagine, that is ruled by proper reason, that he could do anything o no make matter how steep and high the so called "hill of Disciful pifficulty might be. The Vivian Girl Princeusase went through all perils in their work though they never need to do so."

"I think that we are all agreed in this matter, and therefore there is no need of any more words about it."

"That is right right, there is no need of more words about it indeed, unless he that believes neither success in the undertaking, nor reasons for failures, and you so we have all on our own side that is right, and therefore valees he knows his own liv liberty knows any better than us, and therefore through cowardice seeks his own safty when his comrades are in perill!

""ell my dear friends, said padeliffs now also speaking, we are "we are as you all know going all on a stirring adventure,, and for hour better diversion from the things that are bad enough to cause a failure give me leave to propound unto every one of you this question. !!!!!!""::

"Suppose a man, I spy, secute- or maybe one of the gemini, or a professional lilitary betective, &p-should have an advantage to go out on an alwantare like ours, to get for our Country the good blooming of a winning cause through his successful efforts, yet so as that he can by no means come by them except in works at least, he becomes extraordinary zealous in all parts of his work, no matter what Seexciting and difficult times and hardships he goes through, may he not use this means to attain this end, and yet also be a right good apy. A spy that only goes through an adventure when it is not at all dangerous, is he of any benefit to his country anuse."

"I see the bottom of your question" answered younce urmer herself, and with thegode the good leave of all those prosent, y all endouver to shape you an answer, and first and first, to speak to your great question an it concerns a spy i himselg; suppose so spy, a worthy professional christian spy possessed but of vary small tarkent in the eyes of others, and yet has in his eye, a greater, more tarlent and ability that he seems, he has also now an opportanty of getting it, yet by being more stations, by working and endouvoring more frequently, and scalously, and because the temper of the Abbieuthian people requires it, by increasing some of his efforts for my part, I see no reason but a man may do this, providing he has the ability and the nerve. Ay, and more a great deal besides, and jet not, be a really called Profocational unless he succeeds every time he makes a move to accomplish his work. And

"I. His desire to help his country and God is lawful to any degree, which cannot be contradicted, since it is also set before him by Our Blessed Lord, so that he may and should be successful, and got what he is after . making no question for perils and difficulties, if only he does it more for the sake of Our Blessed Lord, and continually ackes His h 1 help, and also places his work and himself under the gam rilance ship of our Blessed Morther.

2. Besides his desire for h what he wishes to accomplish, makes him more deterimed,, a more zeadous worker in his misedon, by, and so makes him a better spy. Yea makes him tetter improve his work, which is according to the safty that his work depends on and also for his country, which is according to the help of God.

: Now an for his complying with the conditions of the refugee peoples of the flood devastated states, the temper of the nation by it, to serve their cause, use

aso all of his efforts and principals, this argued, let that he is of a brave char actor, a man of keen but quiet temper, sool and collected, shrewd and crafty, 2nd of a sweet and winning deportment for his friends, and more fit for the opying function!

4. I conclude then, that a spy, that turns himself out to be profession-1, should not fo so doing be judged unloss he can accomplish the hardest tusks successfully, fears no peril, hardenipe, and weather, but rather, since he is improved in his works thereby be counted as one who persues his call, whether he had good opportunities or bad to do good work. And now to the second part of the question, which concerns, the Gemini spy you mention a, "suppose such a one to have but a great employ in his mission, but by becoming a p spy he must have better qualities than even the professional, perhaps to go through a long course of practice and study which a common professional does not need or more. For my part I see no reason but this may be done proporly. For my,

1. To become a Comini is a virtue, by which what means so ever a man becomes so, but such a man must be righted us, a daily a communicant and a daily attendant at Mass, and gunder and other evening services as long as he is able to do so. Her is it able for one to be a member, where he has also the ability, to be one, the strength, and the health, and the never nerve.

2. Periods the man, who is a member of the Romini by becoming a member, gets the countistion for such an office, from the Imperial government of Angelinia gette only, that is the only good Covernment of the nation, so thereby when he can proved he passed the examination and the severe tests, he becomes a good member, and good National gpy, and all those by becoming members, in a good ond profitable sign do for his commission. To become a member, costs nothing, except for the doctors examination, and the charges for the tests and visual earned are the members of the gomini that in everything they do cannot be soub doubted."

while answer thus made by Jennia Turmer to Endeliffee question, was nighly applauded by them all, therefore they concluded anon the whole, that it was most wholesome and advantagous. And because they have no one could contradict it, and Starring and his body_mard were nome distance off and heard not the conversation they joyfully agreed to have are if opinion of the question as soon as they came up to them again again so they node faster and caught up with the mehm. They decided as they went, that not madeliffe, but Jennie wurmer, should should ask the question, because as they hoped their answer to her would be more sufficient. So when they overtack Starring and his gourds, Jennie projounded the question, to Starring, and asked his opinion.

"Why any one can answer ten thousand a such questione." said gtarring, "For if it is dangerous to follow on advintares the like of cure, as it probably is, how much more dangerous would it be to do such as a man abominable thing as to back out of an adventure because one is a coward and a weakling, for he therefore would make of both God and His beloved country, a stalking hereo and a mockery. Her do we find any other, than those who counct keep from mortal sin, who live like hypocrites, devils, and witches who could not be of anything size but a coward. "I wicked persons, for those kind know the results of their sins if they have to die, and when they see there is no way out for them to keep our out of a perilous adventure them thay desort. If every one of us be brave, as we should be brave, shall we not in the near future accomplish our mirelen with great success. The enemy have the secret of the originators of those who made the algusters as a of the information which we sought to obtain, and we can as so.

2. The Vivien cirls are good ories even though being Princesses, long journeys with perils and hardships and other troubles were their perance, but to succeed in their i missions were usually their results, and greater praise from the nation the outcome.

3 Ceneral Hondro Dargar is also a great spy, about and everything wiknown to us, he was jeazous for his position, that he might be possessed of all information that can be obtained from the enemy, and he had chanowed genley very often that very son of perdition.

4. Whilliam chloeder is a great Supreme person too, for he is equally us success full sither will it be contrary to my mind, but that those sen take up their vene vocation, for the efforts they use never full are good for the cause, so surely did he also succeed in once securing a whole uniform from Munleys hend-quarters with important papers in the pockets. To answer the quention therefore affirmatively as I percieve you have done, and to accept the maswer, is propor and good and our reward will be according to our accomplishment of the mission."

The others stured upon one unother and had not oward to answer Starring-grangeline iches looked surprised, and there was a great allence along them, Then continued tarring"" see you are surprised at my unswer, staggered. Yet for a moment have more to suy" if aludelinia cannot fight us more than by flood, explosion disasters, massacres of so many children, and by forest fires, and what not what will they do if we do not recken otherwise. Calverinias norrow seems like a sentence of God, and what will the Glandelinian nation as when they shall be rebuked by the flames of a accouning fire!"

They had now come to a large forested plain, where following a read leading northwest straight they continued on their way lith much content, but nevertheless that forested plain was not as large as they had expected it to be it, so that when they had advanced quickly over it, they were underly confronted by a wide stretch of water, which proved to be the Mic-Holloster Riverliow at the first sign side of that I lain was a small rice of ground, clear of troom, and on top of that hill one of the wayside shrines or ouf of our Lord Crucified,, w: which some of them that had formerly gone over that way, because of the marity of such beautiful shrines, had turned acide to see and pray before, and which they had usually decorated with the beautiful wild flowers of the forest...

"No, said starring, let us turn aside hither, and pray for our success in our mission. It's been a year since I ever came upon a wayside shrine "

They did so, and then said Starring"we have a good view of the surrounding forested country from here, a thing so deserving as to almost turn us out of the vay to see."

"but what could be see from here."

"Why here is a good view of the forest, and toking in the sights with a little pains we can discou discover our course."

"Lot's proceed down the other side of the hill" said Radcliffe."

" othing doing" said starring. "We might surely g the wrong way, I have heard of this place before, and besides this section of the woods in this location 'a d fact is in paths of the western wing of the forest fires, and therefore is a arare for those who may go through it. "Then he called to the colonel and said;;

"Is not this place dangerous?Does not the western wing of the conflagration threaten this part."

"Not very dangerous unless we are caroless." he cald. "We can get out of reach of the fire if we can only get bouts and cross this river to the other side. It's too wide here for the fire to cross."

"Then " said Starring to the rast, "lets try and cross the river, so that we can still keep on our way. If it was not too strong in corrent I'd try and swim across if the rest of you cun. "

"I'll warrent you when the fire comes up, if it does, it will turn aside and sweep around the hill with the shrine on it."

"No doubt thereof, for the wind is driving the fire that way, and a hundred to one if we go that way we,d perish there. Better try the river or follow its course northwestward if we cannot crosss cross."

"No one can cross the river here though without boats." said "Angeline Bichee. "Eut do you think we could try and see."

"Not without boats."

"And " said Starring" As Clandelinia .lso is the vile enemy to the wrightine right ways of the Blessed Lord, and an already been condemned for her felly, why should we too bring ourselves into like condennation by crossing a river by ownsaing when it would be swide. Bosides if we try it, and it ends fatally, and the Vivian Girls hear of it, the results might be putting on all to shame, for no one can swim the current of that river at its height new and survive.

"But will we curvive if the vestern arm of the fire comes up and surprises as."? "I do not believe we will be surprised by the fire. We are also all on the same mission, and if we we would trarry a little or go down the banks of the river but follow a northwesterly course, we could side step the " red plague, of which the forest fires is named."

"Why do they call it the "Roa Plague" asked Endeliffe. "Is it not the same name for a dangerous disease, a rad disease by which Cholora is known, or Scarlet Fever and son on!"

"Yes, that is true, but the fire spreads among the forest at such a rate that it is well deserving the name. To make these fires, to flood out the population, to tear our cities and towns to places by waters and flood concusions and the like, is but a devilien prack which _landelinia usest to win her dusturdly cause, all the ring leaders who caused the catastrophes ought to be hanged, and Manley and his generals and all his followers deserves no better reward. Assure thyself Radeliffe, and the rent, that if we discover who the ones are who did these things, or saw to it that they were done, that when we come before the Vivian girl Princeences, we will do them word of it all. They desired to know, for they tried to find out too and they will know."

"But suppose they or we do not succeed."

"Wel we'll succoed, or we, il assassinate the Manleys one or the others other." By this time they had come again within sight of a long and wide plain all forested, but with some large clearings, low whether they decided to go through this section, or whether they declared to go back, even I the aurthor am not certain, but this I may observe they continued enward nevertheless down the northwestward course of the river. On the course of the river they finally came to a large board landing place, where stood an old boathouse hard by the way side,, at the sight of which they were both concerned because of the strugeness of the form, for it seemed to them as if it had been once a little Church in the forest, therefore they stood looking and looking pon it, but for a on r short so space of time could not tell what they should make thereof. At last they decided to dismount and investigate, and Starring, and the two girl scouts dismounted and went forward. Angeline espled w i written above the doorway, a writing in an unusual hand,, but she being no scholar of foriegn languages, called to _tarring(for he knew eglish english- to) see if he could pick out the meaning, and so he came and found it to be as it is to be followed; it.;

"Bouts for laon. 45g per hour. $3 for crossing river and back." Bo he explained it in ab bbleamilen to the rost,, efter which they bout concluded, that it was a bout house and saddanly an amuzing sight cave them a occansion the sight cave them.

-of firm the and host after heat, the very flames geoming to be faufted on the The air, and gradually declining to earth, while from clear of clean of flaming ambore and quarke were carried over the rest of the forest, and nearled the earth after starting fires among the folia foliage below-per twelve miles at once did

And also let us consider ago that a 11 the fire cannot come down into the ravine or the glen, others so far as I can understand, have been caught by one and forced to seek refuge in a ravine as well as we, and yet have escaped out of the inferno, who knows but that God that made the world, may cause that the main sen of the fire may pass off quicker than we think, or that at some other time or other make it burn out mooner than we expect, and when that should come to pass, for my part , am resolved to pluck up the heart of a man, and to try my utmost to get out from the inferne. We were fools that we did not try to go across the river in t instead of coming down here, but however comrades let us try to be patient and endure a while, the time may come that may give u us a happy release, but let us not be our own murderen."

With these words this this man at present did moderate the minds of the others who were disca discouraged. During this conversation, starring had climbed up to a view point in fance of the flames to see if the sheds had burned down to the growd as he had heard no explosions, but he could eximb only one third of the way, and there found the heat so terrific that he could not race it, and down below they were all getting more desperate, and some could do little but breathe. There however was one stretch where the fire had burned across and onward leaving nothing but a smoulder behind and tall half burning trees and stumps, and sturing said to Remember Mr starring how valiant thou has been before. We , have hep I have helped the rangers fight their way through these fires,, nor could all that thou did hear, see or fo l in the "Valley of the Shadow of Death?" make you give up. What hardships terror, and amazement Thou has already gone through, and why should _ not now, hoping the others have not fear. I am in the glen with the rest and also this giant conflagration has passed with most of its terror by now, the wind had stopped and the flames are rising only upwards, so I believe we can do do it, if they are game enough Remember how paved a town that was in its path, how , with thousands cof soldiers and rangers tried to keep the fire off from prientown, so why not try a stunt now. I'll tell them all my plane."

He therefore climbed down, and when he came to the bettem, he found them expecting his return, and he told them his purpose, and they all declared they would try it if he was game enough.

It was however getting a little lighter, and slightly cooler, and Radcliffe asked Starring concerning the sheds, and if they had exploded. To which he replied; They were not touded with explosives or otherwise if they had been and blew up the concuesion would have thrown a down the rocks upon us and buried us under the debris here below. As we are all stud sturdy fellows, and choose rather to bearall hardships for the sake of our country our experience here will make mistory."

Then said gaddifee" Lette climb to the top and see if we can find out way tward the river, for we do not want to ever be in the path of the fire again." "Starring decides to climbagain, then when he returned he said-

"It is going to be cooler now but we will have to remain here for quite a while, as up above there is too much smudergy and fire to go through the remains of the forest yet, which the fire has already dispatched. I and many soldiers and efficers and rangers have foughtothese forest fires before, and when , thought it safe to cross over the scorched areas, I will do so but we must wuit a few hours, when the emoulders will have died down somewhat. And yet there is too much smoke, And something good will soon come to relieve us, by which we may have means or hopes to ascana."

Therefore while waiting for the time, they began to rapy, and continued in prayer fa for about three or four hours. Then Starring climbed up to the top."

"Indeed what a fool we were" he said to himself" to have been forced to life lie here in the ravine, when we could have tried to swim the river. Now even it is not quite safe to cross that burning ground, and yet we must do it or stay here forever. I The river is only a hundred paces off.

then climbing down he gave the orders, and they tegan to beat and fight their way back through the ravine once more, and after some difficulty came out of the glen. Then finding no fire had entered the ravine they continued on through and climbing up its sides, saw a sight which almost made their limbs fail. Only a few smoking trees were still standing, while the ground and debris was all smouldering and smoking. Yet gturring knew which way the river was and therefore in order to reach it must go through this, though the task was hard. They however had souked their vio clothing good, and therefore they all went on at a dash, unfortunately without their horses as they had forced them to swim the river, while they dashed for sufty into the ravine. After a hot trip of it in which their eyes were tortured by smoke and the heat was almost unbourable they came in sight of the river, and when on the shore first tested the water before during to cross. It was not any too warm, and they all dived in. The current was not strong at this section and they not across in about fifteen minutes, and were now safe being at of the fire zone as they believed as the fire had not reached the opposite side, and here too they found their horses eating grass near the shore.

Now when they got here they began to contrive with themselves what they should de in completing the journey, to preventatione that should come after from running firm advanced host after host, the very flames seeming to be 'wafted on the Q-120 air, and gradually declining to earth, while from cloud of clouds of fluming into the path of the conflagration as they had... tot whatever whey could have or would have planned, to make, if the fire would come up this way it would also r erase gll all evidence, and all they could do was to pray more fervently that any one who comes after should be able to escape the danger. On the other side also as luck would have it they had recovered their horses, and therefore mounting these they continued on, till they came to a ridge of low hills, not quite so thickly forested. .Ac the grade of the slope was gentle, they rode up the side of the nearest hill, to behold to their surprise, gardens, vineyards and orchards, and a small waterfall, where also they drunk, and washed themselves, and did freely out of the vineyards... How there was on top of the hill a large lookout station, and it stood by the nigroway elde. An they came to the summit a man came out, and riding up Starring asked him who he was, and what he was doing on the mountain side.

"This " said the man" is an observation post for Forest Rangers, and the station here gives as a fall view of all the country round about, and I am left alone here to keep a lookout wille the rangers are out fighting fires. Some of them have laid down their lives for the safty of people living in these forests."

"Can you direct us to the Glandelinian ar y under general Johnston Jacken Hanley!"

"You are just out of the direct way."

"How for is it thither?"

"It is hard to say as he keeps moving on." "Doon this road lead for Big Girl Knool."

"You are going the right way."

"How far is it to there!"!"!!!!!"

Too far for mny one, and it is a miracle for any of those that shall get thiter indeed."

"Is the way safe or dangeroust"

"Bufe for those who know the country, keep cool, use their head, but reckless jersons who know not the country shall perish withal."

Then the Runger lockout perclaved that some of them were wearing gray uniforms, they also put questions to them, to which of course they unswered the same before "Thence came you?"

"From general Vivienc lines. I'm general Walter Starring, and these are my bodyguards and girl and boy scout companions."

"How aid you got through the forest fire country without mishap?"

"Starving told him graphically.

"Then asked the Ranger;

"By what means have you so persevered on your adventure!"

Starring told him, and when he heard their answers, and their stories, he was pleased therefore, and looked f very friendly upon them, and said;

"Welcome to my station .1'11 put up some tents for the others. You and the child scouts follow me."

And he led them to the station, while tents were put up by his assistants and the others recieved shelter within, and he had them purtuke of what he could spare.

Then he said ; "It is better for you to sta, here awhile, to be acquainted with me, and yet more to solace yourselves with the goodness of this hill. If the fire comes here it cannot climb as the trees on these slopes are too far upart."

Starring said he was content to stay, and so they went to their rest that follow ing night, because it was very late and they had not slept hardly for two nights. On the following morning, The Ranger called upon Starring and his followers, to walk with them a little ways up the mountain. So therefore they went forth with them , and rode around a while, having a pleasant prospect on every side. Then said The

"Do you wish to see some wondors!"

Bturring answered "Yes"

Ranger to gtarring-

So the Ranger took or led them to the top of a hill, which was very high, and steep on one side, and bid them look a cross the the valley. So Starring, and Radcliffe alone looked across, and saw down below in the valle y a large and long opening in the forest below.

"What does this mean sir!" asked Starring.

"The nanger answered -"Have you not expected or suspected that the forest vire might nometime change its course and hit around here. That breach will save us us. And have you not heard that the conflagration is also raging on this side of the stream and will be coming this way any time."

"No unaswared Starring." If I had known that , would not have come this way."
"Well" said the Ranger" that breach you see down in the valley has been made by my fellow rangers and lots of drafted and volunteer citizens from towns, and they have continued to work for two weeks without stopping, there being a day, and night shift, and it ought to keep the conflagration heading for the forests beyond these hills."

Then he told them look far off in another direction.

. Durammian to the rest, ,, etter which they boat con cluded, that it was a boat house and suddenly an amuzing night save them a occansion and In this war they camed the river side or Applicans. They then croased the river to a section where the forest fire and come is with the shore, and where everything was still in a smoulaer and smoking like a sea of clouds in the sky in a storm. We sketch of imagination could conjure up a more sheatly place in the acle world.

Having reached this smouldering sea, but on the edge they found themselves , acing an fucing an isomence valley, entirely covered even to the upper slopes of pirning trees, and amouldering wrockage and ash. They followed it untill of proce suddenly off as if the arth had breach, and vefore them stretched a huge chasm. The pottom was a lake of ach, quite first and more than three thousand feet wide. It was another explosion explosion. On the orgosite side walls of flaming trees rose sheer again. They followed the vim of this crater, and shortly the solid ground became intersected by lanes of gravel sand and mud. They stepped down gingerly to cross the first one, but as they mowed forward what appeared to be solid ground gave way, and disappeared into apparent unrathonable depths with a dull booming sound. Starring and his followers had been literally on the pre prink of death.

They pered down into the chasm, and hurled large fragments of rock only to hear a dull thid trailing off into a faint whisper as the rocks ricocheted from side to side, then silence, and they knew they were malked walking on the crust of some inmense hole or roof of some immense and deep caverm cavern, which dropped sheet sheer down for many feet, and Starring wondered if this was not one of the deep mine galleries in which some of the explosives were stored that blaw up and destroyed Abbieann and the surrounding country. Making a wide detour, they continued their journey but after this experience not without testing every foot of the way in front of them. They came upon numerous fishures caused by the explicits explosions which they had to leap over, and althoughnthey threw masses of rock down each, they apparently fell deep down into these pits.

rinally they followed a sea of debris to where again the ground fell away into a half oblong chasm at least more than a mile wide, and although they lay down and proved over the edge it was impossible to see the bottom of what was beyond question another deeply dug explosion crater. Here as best as the twilight darkness would allow Starring took many photographs of this region, the crater and the distant forest fires but he wanted to get pictures of the actual interior of one of the burning valleys, showing the smoke and flame rearing up many hundreds and thousands of feet

It seemed for hardy, and to do this Starring had to kneel on a justing piece on the very edge and steepest place of the valley, holding the camera with t lons pointing downward. While he was kneeling there he experienced a fear so terrible that the sweat apoured down on him, and when finally he crept away, he could scarcely

As he knelt on the jutting stone the funes rising from below enveloped him so that he checked and his eves pured with water and smarted like fire and in those few seconds he had fully realized what would be the horror of the rock giving way and uhurling him down into the fiery valley beneath.

The next day being back in the ruins again, there was again a slight respite. The aburned portions of the forest alone the shore became less agitated by the fire winds, though the strange forest fire produced lava streams did not decrass decrease. Starring reported in his writing that all areas of cultivated ground were found to have been destroyed by the explasions being buried under the debris. Eutsonia and the Halso plantations and villiages near by were wrecked, and still partly under debris and forest fires ruging all around. Hany other plantations were gone.

The entire region was a smoking incenerated ruin. _mouldering wreckage of forests and induncesdeent ashes and ground was everywhere, no place being less than ten feet deep with the smculder and smudges, and in some places melted stone ran like lava floor over deep banks of aches. very tree had been burned totally and many still standing liked looked fike emouldering emoking skeletons. All vogetation had disappeared. Not a sprig of green was to be seen here . Rivers were dry, and the sand ran hot like lava.

Everywhere gtarring observed through his glasses dead smouldaring bodies of forest unimals, some half buried under smoking wire kage, others showing they had been stricken down ril while in flight, lither by heat, smoke of the fires or falling btrees. A faw seemed to have been dirred into Lava which took form from them. These bodies were burned tog far to decompose. The air in this location was still filled with dense smoke the heat creating interse thirst and causing such suffering among refugees as can hardly be imagined by those not among them.

Starving decided to try again to go further up the river as he wished to get a little around Abbleaum. Therefore the ship left the region of gorseshoe Bond at six cclock on the evening of the 22th. Terrible stretches of flames were visible during the entire journey, and it looked as if another hill was becoming like a volcanic eraction an arently fourteen miles away. The wary june rea into a heavy cloud of smoke once more, and the people who were on board were almost sufficiated and were forced to go below, and the atmosphere was so terribly dense, that no one could see a thing. The steamer was forced to pur about about, and steamed to the neuthwest for for f two hours before it was clear of this new fog of smoke. "ithin another 'our or two the Mary jane put back tward the region and encountered more smoke thicker than ever and was again comeppled t compelled to put off. It was seen that the forest fire was in constant movement and there was a tremendous roar of the flames, and great flashes of fire pierced the cacke clouds at the rate of eighty to two handred ton ues a minute. S Horseshoe mend which is sixteen miles from the closest ex losion cruter was covered with three inches of ashes blown by strong winds from the area of the forest fire, and the northern district from calto to Abbieann was completely destroy destroyed .. Starling realized that so far it was hissoible to proceed beyond than that point on account of the fire, and a huge hill was observed covered with fire where revisualy there had been a forested mountain. The smoke is dense and the whole region is smoking, and starring heard that seventy persons had been killed by the fire while getting away, and the whole country side is covered with ashes. Near Palso the smoulder and incadencent cases were many feet deep. Many present were loand to uper Ableum by the bouts of the vary and or ane from the forest fire area. "any of the refugees who were ariving on the opposite coast of the river were dying of thirst, and all of these people had been more than thirty nine hours without a myo of water, and all the cattle and other unimals were doad because of the lack of water. On account of the acca scarcity of water it was impossible to go into the interior to investigate the extent of the disaster, and therefore appossible to say how wang persons had perished on account of the forest fire.

Again Starving left Horseshoe Bend to tow a boat full of refugees to a point of safty. A quarter of a mile off there, he recieved a message from shore by some other boat sent by refugees that the passage was impassable. Novertheless Starving procuse proceeded on the vogage. Then opposite the region there was a grand view of the west side of the forest fire. Even rivers of le melted stone were coming davn the mountain side, melted by the fierce heat of the conflagration above, this coming down in every direction and flowing into into the river. This whole hill was covered with smoke and flame and there was an incessant spread of the flumes. Terrific winds blew great quantities of hot ashes into the air, which mingled with flaming brands and sparks was falling tward the river thus obscuring everything. It was impossible to get close to the shore in this location. The river was littered with burned trees and other wrackage. They attempted to peo proceed on tward the north through the smoke and falling muck of fire ashes but found it impossible.

It even meant sufficiation to try it. They returned with the boat and entered the belt again miles at or down the river but now there as was the same result. On the horizon there was nothing to be seen but smoke, which extended and piled like an immense rolling wall. Inside the belt all was dark,

They again put back and steamed round the mend to the west. Opposite this shore they encountered a terrific gale of wind carrying smoke and flaming debris. To the north the entire termi'ery of the fire district was a seathing hell. It was as he saw virtually im impossible to approach the fire stricken districts of Horsebend or orseshoe Bend, either by bound or by river. There was little cessation in the rumblings and shokings of the strange explosions, the columns of sucke fire, ashes and so forth that continued to blight the country side. Starring was at a loss and relt like giving p. Strange noises were heard miles from the forest fires, and the trembling of the ground caused by explosions centinually indicated the impending dangers everywhere.

Large stones at the outburst of one explosion fell in the neighborhood of Horseshoe Fend terrifying the reforees hoddled there, and in deed such was the unhappy condition that these terrified referees had to face. Most horrifyig details of the forest country where themsands of animals and some human beings were destroyed were revealed by the refugees. Tany refuses suffered from burns, and the area already covered by the forest fire in the region of persented each comprised of about thirty miles. The fact that loss of life was not severe was due to the position of the country, the knowledge of it, and whose inhabit ants were fiven warning of the approaching disaster, and fled for their lives. Starring tried to cable to Pandora of the situation but could get no answer.

One hundred and thirty five of the refugees were o in condition to be in hospitals, and he was not able to supply to the immediate wants of the survivo survivors. The refugees claimed the thousand pet dee ps deers has been lost, and the outlook was still more serious. In more sehoe bend five thousand persons were on the relief list, and yet they had to go off to the west to depend on the aid of neighboring towns. It was expected that sooner or later there would be a dreadful loss of lives among these.

The whole of the Horseshoe Bend country, over twenty miles or more in length from all the eastern river shore, and on the forested mountain side, was covered with conflagrations, and the whole country side is recking with the stonch of barning materials, and al animals and the forest in general. The curvivors were being collected by gtarrings followers in northern Abbieann, where they had to forage through the western country to find food for them, and themselves. The injured persons were horribly burned in their flight by the hot brands and grit which was driven along with tremendous velocity by the hot winds. It was said that thirty six women and children who sought refuge in a house were surrounded by fire and were killed. One man was brained by a huge stone that was dislodged from a

The arrival of the first detatchment of rescuers which brought sufferers to corthern Abbieunn caused a sensation. This party consisted of two hundred refugees, hose charred bodies exhaled fetid odors, and whose loathsome faces made even grarring shudder. All these burned persons were suffering fearfully from their wounds and from thirst, and attered when strong enough to do so, most agonising cries for water and relief from pain.

The report that a lake in the midst of a forest fire that had boiled away was confirmed sen of fire now surrounds its place. Valleys and ravines were like he pits discharging hot vapors, and from the centrer one huge volumes of steam rose from a boiling stretch of water rising like gantic gigantic pine trees tward the sky, and a dense smoke mingled with steam issued from a new quarter, forming an immense pall over the northern hills, lawering into the valleys, and then rising and spreading untill it enveloped the whole scene in a peculiar gray mist or fog. The stenches of smoke increased the sickness and mortality among the surviving refusees, and caused attende suffering among the new univals, and the stench from barning bodies of unimals was terrible beyond description. Another big explosion somewhere cause caused a great fall od of debris and stones and more consternation in Abbiean than resulted since they first urived there. shortly after the a peurance of a new cloud the following while the author and scorching firm atvanced host after host, the very fluxes seeming to be 'wafted on the 8-230 air, and gradually declining to earth, while fresh close of clouds of flushing embore and sparks were carried over the rest of the forest, and nearled the earth after starting fires among the folia foliage below-per twelve miles at once did the new fires extend from front and rear, and their shizzing rearing and missing could be heard for six miles on every side of them,

The bright flames illumined the rolling clouds like lighting of fire color, and the rolls were reflected through them into woird chapes, and as they rose heavily upward, the sparks seemed like innumerable flakes of flery snow and like flery snow from the flory bottomlans pit did they first ascend and then descend, a living carpet of fluming sparks, or rather pall, p upon field, grops gardens copses, groves orchards, vin yards, woods, orangeeries, forest plantations, and the other stretches of the deep forests, the flames rising as from them and spreading nothing within reach, and where there was nothing to devour, the flamen melted.

The cities and towns could spare their mendreds of the seands of able bedied citizes x citizens to go out and try to check the conflugration twice or trice over, and not miss thom, but to no avail, many fire fightern got trapped in flame roofted ravines, the flameing masses of trees filled the boot bettem of ravines, and hollow ways. In vain the repulations of men trying to force an everthrow of this Demon monotor fireing in vain their breaching, tranching, and counter firing, or attempting to turn it off its course tward a wide stream or lake.

The fire continued on hurled forward by a tempest . The poor pensants, their forms in danger hustily dug long deep pits and tranchos, as their hot enemy came on, in vain they exploded mines in a line of make a groundbreach, in vain they felled trees and covered their leaves with earth Heavily and thicky did the sparks fly before before that rearing gale, flames started up everywhere, in vain they tried to chock and bent out of existance the starting ground fires, the wast living hostile Red Demon still moved on.

The lines of fires moved on like soldiers in their ranks, stopping at nothing, melting like running water what they could not burn, turning que quickeand and mud bogs into boiling mad and sand springs, chaging water of rivers into toiling streaming streams, killing the fishes, melting the iron structures and so stone viaduacts of railroad and other bridges and rails with the terrific heat, and stopping for nothing, they exept enward clear across the open forest country, leaping the widest streams like a onrushing storm, hollish in fury and loathsome in black and reddish and other colored smoke, and where before it was green and smiling before and on each side and in front as it had been before it came up everything became a " tottomless pitopefore the fire was a valcerinian paradize, behind a smoking charred desert.

The flames are daunted by nothing, they surmount the stoopest hillsides at harricane speed, and destroyed enclosed gardens and houses of towns driving the inhabatants before it.

A rare and experimental vineyard has been planted in a sheltered grove.. The high winds of the advancing conflagration tour the trees to shrade, and the flames do what the winds and tempest could not do, and the whole promish of the vintage leaves an all is gone, and the vineyard is a thing of fire.

There are many other yeards, less uncommon but still tended with more than common care , each plant is kept within due bounds by long strenches about and around them, and by upright cames on which it is to trail, in an instant succumbing to the terrific heat the solicitude and long toil of the vine dreaser are lost and by fire his pride humbled. There are in the midste of the woods beautiful farms and vines can be seen against the various farmhouses. These vines of course spring from one root, and has clothed and matted with its many branch s branches the four walls, the whole of it is covered with long clusters, which another half month will ripen, they go to ruin when the heat sets the sets the houses ablaze.

On the fields grew th wheat, grain and corn, alfala and other crops. These are consumed by the flumes. That the fire does not touch the heat withers. The small patches of ground in the Mic-Hollester Run megion in forest clearings belonging to the poor mountain folk up and down the country, for ruising the turnips, barley, watermelons, on which they live, are either the prey to the flumes or its singing heat. The neutly arranged kitchen gardens of the burning towns with their cheries cherries, plums, peaches and so on is also a waste, the populace flees through the rusking curtainof of smoke, the air is filled with sparks, a screaming gale blows the rooms of country castles on hilleides is aflame from only the heat of the distant fire, nothing escapes.

The fire rages up the slopes, and are flung forward by the winds. They surmount the forested summi's making volcances out of them in apparence, filling the sky with flume and smoke, .. Somewhere beyond this a section of the woods is filled with forest rangers, making extensive breaches but news comes to them that the Red demon hus swept beyond their right, failing upon the forests to the rear also, and is at the same time burning the slopes beyond them and going forward like the wind itself. Yet the fighters are daug daunted by nothing, they continue working in spite of the perils they face. Reinforcements come up, and are hurled into the tasks. Not a momente hecitation or delay, though forced to retreat before the fierce heat, they strive to recover their grounf, they cut and beat their way through the glans, they sutmount the parapet of rocks, and move on, in order of bat battle and with the array of an army. Unrolaxed by defeat onward they fight, their leaders keeps them togeth r as if they had a king over them. Onward they 50 to the glens, to the plains, to the slopes, nothing comes amiss of them, where over fire threatens to sproud there they are, recklose of death, certain of conquest, if only there would be a downpour of ruin. another and still worse calculity, the fluxer as we have already intimated, could be more terrible in their everthrow than in their ravages. The inhabitants of every town of the country have altempted where they could to conquer the fire.

It would noom as if the malignant flamen had remolved that the sufferers should have the benefit of smoke to the full, for the advancing fluxes had not got more thus twenty miles beyond Evangeline at clare when they struck regions where great tar and oil bogs were citaated it was a saiden catantrophe, the fluxes increased the intensity of the smoke to a hundredfold degree, the flames seemed aking making for the region of Madge Evans mown, and Juddenly the forest fell before the flames have also and the along of those force's came to naught, and their burning embors rose up, the smoke rose up, and the hedious awarms of flaming smoking trees lying smidet the flames whereather fell increment the horror.

atmosphere and singed it with heat.

The dismayor lire lighters towns that the fire postilence had tricked them -- for a new visitation, not confined to the territory which the Red Demon had first made its own, but extending far and wide, as the atmosphere extends in all directions. Their desparata work, no longer claimed for the main section, is now devoted to the object of ridding themselves of the deadly legacy which they were endangered by instead. In vain is their t toil, they breach the forest, when the wind is favorable that make counter fires,, they blast and saw down trees, heat out ground fires, but the fire pentilence aproids.

good n Seeing himself now in the probable chief path of the forest fire, Walter starring, hailed his followers, and ordered the guide leader to go to the boat house and noe if there were my bouts to be necured. The efficer at once, without a word, wont tward the house, while starring fearing danger shead used his best men to the best advantage as near scouts, ordering them to climb the the trees and observe the progress of the fire, while Angeline Riches, climbed a tree near the style. Thoughters were silent, and by all the rules of panger fire warfare, the Rangors who first met gtarring and his companions, should have given them protre protection, by lending some of the force, but instead of it kept all his men, to which he sent the other members, a few brave men to only guide them a little way, fearing to exhaust his stock of fire fighting supplies if he did lend them support, and then working as he went on, on his own part of the " firing linew, instead of moving to cover the followers of gtarring.

Starring who from his perch on the tree top wi saw with the swiftness of inu intuition the new method that must be chosen now, that the first had failed, and who already resolved to transfer his point, with the certainity that, inthe in the doomed state of these Mic-Whirthian Forests, victory must perch on his shoulders or either period in the flumen, immediately descended the trees, and reaching the ground hade his nearest followers to go with all speed with their axes and clear the edge of the glen and ravine from as many trees, and as much shrubbery as possible, saying" The glen and ravine is our only chance if boats cannot be obtained. """

The command of the other party, fell to madeliffe himself, with full discretionary power to remain in the ravine and wait, or go on, but he had an admonition from our pleased Lord, which seemed to say to him don't give up. mrees on the upper edge of theravine had been felled amidst the shouts of the whole force, and the promish of the guides to if necessary redoom that part of the forest. Radeliffs consulted with ingeline pichoe, and Jennie Turmer, there were among the men no more tools that could be used, and hadthere had there been, men also would be want ing to handle them . The chief guide found that escape across the river was nigh impossible, it would be of no use anyhow, to try to do so, with the hurricane lashing the sparks and flames across might only expose life recklessly.

Officers and men and the two girls watched anxiously the progress of Starring they saw the men show him where greater danger was,, they saw a broadside of trees fall before the ax and blusting explosives, and fall beyond the ravine, they saw the other man cover leaves and smaller branches with dirt, cut down brush and high grasses grass, and again see starring climb up a high tree to investigate again, He and his first followers had braved the terrific conflagration for days,,, and also nights, therefore the two girls could not confide in help from other sources, and hold out without his own command. True they had no means of regular offence against the " Red Plague, but the Ravine, they had an enemy which dies only by water, they had the honer of two girl heroines to guard, they had a chief of good to whom they should appear unspeakable on n pain, they had the other things to consider, and with one voice cried out"To the Bavine if we cannot go anywhere also, And yot a shout of triumph from many proclaimed to them that the upper edge of the raving was quickly being cleared of trees and brush and other inflamable influmable materials, nor did they then forbore how the flames could leap across at this stage now. Meanwhile gharring climbed the tallest trees to take in once more the course of the Mostern arm of the fire...

His quick ave glance at the distant forew forest to the straight south, at the great sea of forests that covered the slo sloping hills beyond, and his buoyant nature promished to him, that a harvost of destruction would be for the flumes if the conflagration atruck here, as he behald a long wall of dreadful emoke spreading from east to west like the clouds of a great approaching storm. As he climbed up to the appearant top of the tree, he from there before the view of others hoisted the signal for au quick action, which was instantly answered from all of them with loudshouts, and the line of workers then bore down on the high weeds and grass to out them down, to the distance of a quarter of a mile beyond the ravine. One of the men was put out of the fight by a disabled ax, and had gone back to watch the work from another point. Radeliffe in another tree, when he saw the prospects of a contest with the second arm of the fire, had attempted to signal a warning to those below, but in doing so he fell from the branch clear into the river, and much surprised by hislong fall swam like a beaten beaver to the shore.

At this moment, Starring, who had been up in the tree sevenor or eight minutes, divregarding the heat of the approaching fire, ordered the men below by signals to cut their line of work obliquely, and as he did so he then signalled to the girl scouts to make sure of the ravins, telling her by signal that cooly and with fatal accuracy the conflagration was coming on like a harricans storm, and while he was signalling her the workers and his followers now reinforced by the retreating rungers, raked the forest around the ravine, while others started with axes anow among ontangled weeds and high thick shrubbery, and throwing earth over them so that the heat of the fire would have no affect.

The load noise of the falling trees was eaddenly mingled from a shrick from one of the workers, not of fright or injury but which told that the tide of battle had turned , but what was worse for them, the fire was moving in a trianglar manner which would soon out them off from the Ravine If they were not quick enouth enough to take advantage of it.

One of the pungers himself recieved a desperate wound which would deprive of him of no arm. The wound was so severe that he was obliged to be carried to a sufe distance, leaving the direction to an officer of not so good experience as he has. Starring now ordered the men to slowly full back to the thicker weeds bushes and sha shrubbers to the right, and to clear the way before them, but some of them that is the rangers terrified by the suidenly growing heat, and by the injury of no of their best leaders, fled to the reor. leaving o no one within the danger zone but their leader, who having for the moment lost his senses from a navore wound in the head caused by a falling tree, the branch of which struck him remained at his post,,, gazing about with a vacant stare..

Starring, ordered some of his followers to rescue him, which hey did did they did, while others worked now in the bottom of the ravine so that the conflag ration could be battled there also in case it poured in a deadly fire of burning branches woods, and embers. The commanding officer of another batch of rangers thray in his own men to the task, as he found as point of the ravines sides to be exposed at all points, and this was the first point attacked by ax and shovel pick and saw, scythe and rake, and one of his officers appeared, and waved a white flag bent to a long branch, telling him that the fire was about three miles away. The confusion of other men now became completely unamanageable, yet now every tree had been cut away, all weeds were down, and the other shrubbery shattered or covered with earth, nothing left by which the flumes could readily feeed feed upon. The right of the ravine was cleared at the same time, as was the left flank, which lay to loward of the fire. The top of the ravine on the right of the advancing fire line, and the extreme left, looked ike t it too would escape, and work continued here last. As the work was finished, an awful stillness set in, nothing was heard but the feeble booming of the distant flames, the eighing of the coming fire hurricane, or the breathing of the men.

It doesnot take so much courage to fight the enemy soldiers in battle, Of course there is the glow of action, the fierce love of killing which rises in the blood like fire, the thought of victory and the righ spil, all this to spur on on one on nut to enter a fire plague stricken forest, to fight against the udvancing conflagration, is like fighting a foul disease, this takes courage does it not??????

After a brazes breeze from the northweattt, the wind had died away as soon ad as Starring had climbed to the top of the tree. After he had been up in the tree untill the work below had almost been completed the gale came on not violent at but increasing every moment, Redew there was an answell trampling, and shouting shouting, and soon after a crash in the forest somewhere as if something had fallen and every one believe in the alarm, a range tward the ravine, asking each other questions without waiting for an recleving any answern. Investigating the sound starring found the noise proceeded from some falling tree. By looking down gtarring observed as many of his followers as could first reach the ravine, going below, while others stayed above looking westward in the utmost constornation. It was growing quite dark again, the winds began to whistle through the branches, and the noise of the tempest further off was scarcely loss than the roar of the plagara. And in the midst of 1 all this, the officers in charge of the rangers with their speaking trampet, the officers and mon accounting and shouting to each other in efforts to be heard, and mingling their voice with the angre our of the coming fire harricume—this all this, in the darknoss that proceeds the fire, and with the increasing dury of the gale, combined to form as much of the terribly sublime as flarring over durad to withous possentrated in one scene.

If his tree had not been shoulded from the wind by a towering wall of rock he would have been toneed off. These below were filled with apprehension, but the extent od ofdunger, and hav all this would terminate were questions which now arose in his mind, although measures of fear or trepidation, but nevertheless to such questions there were no answers, for thinknowledge realder with only him, who guides any storm and directs the whirlwind. Sturning soon was to have a view of a conflagration that he would never forget. The wind continued to increase in fury, and big walls of flames were driven madly along the tree tops; and among the forces of trees top and bettem. At this time even when it seemed impossible to walk the ground below without rink of being ifted up and carried away by the reging winds, some of the braver of the rangers, kept themselves aloft in tree tops, toosing and awaiging should with the awaying of tree and braiches. Clinging by their bodies, fee feet and a arm, with mysterious tenancy, while their only useleful hands were employed in breaking and chepting off branches to a prevent those trees if possible from eathing fire.

How these gailent follows kept from being blown off the trees was equally a matter of wonder and admiration, powers they had outstoff what branches they could,, except the big ones and descended and headed for the ravine. Feeling sure the fire would not touch his tree because of the shelter by the rook wall guarring remained to watch the advance of the fire storm. The harricane had now acquired its fall force. There was now no more work to be done, purely body except guarring were in glow and ravine.

The trees round like thunder, and fell, branches were or form off and smoke passed in fegs. B, this time the fire see was relling up and enward its tremendous waves, and that gtarring might not lose the granducer of such a view he fortified himself more against the wind that tried to eway his tree, and in spits of the fierceness of the gale, planted himself between trunk and big branch in a position favorable for a survey of all around him, and in sufty, so long as the fire passes without hitting the litting the trees.

He had often seen good paintings of flores forest fires, but here before him was the original. Those imitations are often graphic and faithful so far as they go, But they are necessarily deficient in accompaniments which painting cannot supply, and therefore are feeble and ineffective you have upon canvass the forest consumed by red smirches made for fire, but as they are pi painted by the arist so t arr a artist so they are. The universal metion of both is thus arrested and made very stationary. There is no sobject in which the brushes of the painter, acknowledges more its indebtedness to the imiganition than in its attempts to form the view of such a conflagration.put should even the attempt of the artest be successful, no far as the eye is concerned, there still would be wanting, the rushing of the hurricane, the rouring of the blazzing trees, the rouring hies of the flames, and the penderous relling forms of the quickly spreading and rising volcanic sruptions of smoke and flame. All there were numbered among the advantages of the position of giatting, as firmly planted, and bracing the heat, he opened eyes and ears, heart and soul to the beautiful frightfulness of the tempest around, and the roaring flames approaching with storm like speed.

At this time the fire hurricane was supposed to be at the top of its fury, the moment just before the fire comes up, n and it seemed to gtarring quite impossibld for winds to blow more violently.PParts of the forests had been reduced in the scale of proportion by this swiden transforming of the two elements into a mere nothingess of fire and falling embers. The fire came wave upon wave.

The smoke from smudge fires was even so thick, such fires being in advance of the main conflagration that you could not see more than five feet off in any direction, but of the fire itself the spectacle was one of majesty and power. Within easy view there were forested mountains and plains, which were becoming becoming all ablaze if or as if caused by some terrific volcanic power from beneath. Starning saw immense masses of rolling uplifted clouds of smoke ermerging from the left of the forests on one side, and seem of flumes rushing and roaring across the valleys untill they too became seething volcances of fire.

These waves were of fire of course but rolled apparently at times like the waves of the sea, were rapid in the forward movement, and were in massivement and in elevation of tongues and se shoots ruching a ward through the smoke, they yere the offspring of the well known " notomless pittingsome.

It was their heights that impurted the thrill and surprise to the scene, and not less sugnificent than the waves of flumes themselves were the varying dimmensions of some submrning valleys that remained between the, them. The engry appears which they presented to the eye, that guest almost vertically, upon their own which when they did, they percieved as they thought, a lot of men working among the forest, cutting and sawing down trees, digging ditches, and bla sting. And they percieved that the men were rangers, because they were the uniform of forest rangers, and Starring a Lasked;

"What are they doing out there. ! What is ouns this!"

The Ranger thon unswered;

"Did you not see a little below thems hills, across the river on the opposite side a stile that led into the general Mic-Hollecter Woods on the left hand of this way."?

"Yos" answered Starring.

""Then" said the Ranger"From that stile there goes a narrow path that runs sooner or later tward the "Yellow Brick or Big Girl Knool Roal, and these sen(pointing to them who were working afar off—came once to live in these beautiful forests, and while out so a scouting came to that stile. There o one of the milleding to the top of the highest tree ses that the fire sooner or later would come this way and trey they made this breach and are now over yonder making the other."

Then Radcliffe and Walter starring looked one upon another, with tears guehing out, but yet said not; I nothing of their experience in the Glen and Ravine to the Ranger. Then he led them to a higher place and bid them look in another direction. They therefore oboyed, and now that the west and south was very dark and smoky. They also thought that they heard from that direction a rumbling noise as of fire and they smolt the scent of herning pine. Then though he full he known Starring novertheless anked;

"What is thu f"

""We might as well call it the "By way to Hell" said the Ranger" for the western arm of the forest fire is ragin; raging there"""...

"Then suid Starring to the Ranger;

"I perciose that those rangers had plenty of time to work as well as others, had they not."?

"Yes, and in making the first breach it took them a long time too."

"How far did they extend the gap, since they had started in the work."?
"About six miles, and enother as far as these mountains."

Then said starring to onone of his followers;

"In the face of these kind of dangern we have need to cry to God for strength."
"Ayer said the Barger" and you will need to see it when you have it too."
By this time Starring had a desire to go forwards, and the ganger desired they should before the fire came up to prevent their progress, so they rode together tward the end of the hills.

Then said the ganger to ctarring-

"Do you wish to see the large clearing nature made in these modefif so you can if you have the skill to look through our large field glass."

"Starring and his friends willingly accepted the invitation, so they again climbed to the top of a higher hill, and here the Runger lended them the glass so they could take the lock. Then they attempted to lock, but the remembrance of their last exiting experience made their hands somewhat charky, by means of which p impediment, they could not bok steadily through the glass, yet they felt sure they observed something lke like the clearing, and also some of the size of the place. When they were about to depart, the Rangor gave them a note of the way, and bid them, beware of going in any northeasterly and westerly direction unless out of the fire zone, and take heed that they sleep not in these forests, and then bid them God speed.

"What direction shall we be going now!"

"That is hard to say" unswered the lad. I sir was born in the country north of here, a little on the left hand, and we are heading tward it now."

"put how do you think to get in through there, when the forest itself is in danger, for we may all find more difficulty there."

"Well that big clearing is in that direction and we can reach it as other good people do."

"But what good would it do for us to go that way when it might lead as into now dangers."

"I do not intend to loud any one in that direction. I am only saying I have left my country over there to join the army as a scout."

"Eut we came not in or through a pleasant portion of the country roundabouts yet, and safty is not even at the head of this way, so came through hell a number of times, and therefore, four, however you may think yourself, that a time will come that we'll regret our passage through this prtion of the portion of the forest as we had bud experiences already."

"Coneral, this country is no utter stranger to me, I know it well, be content to follow my gourdianship, and all will be well. And as for the clearing you talk of, all the world may know it is a great way off from here. I cannot think that, any man in all our country does as much know about the perils of these roods nore than we do, nor need they matter whether we do or no, an since we have as you see a chance to go on a fine hourt or record breaking adventure."

then starring a saw that the lad was wise indeed , he said to Angeline picheo, but in a whisper; "There is more hope of a succensful mission if we do as he save." "Yes" said the girl scout. "When we take no heed of good council we are like a fool that walks by the wayside, but his aledam failed him, and he perishes. Shall we hault halt here for a while, or continue on our tay for the present, and then stop afterwards, and see by degrees if we can learn something better!"

"It is not good to halt now" said Starring. "Lot us continue on if you will, and we can talk to each other ever and anon, as much as we are able to."

So they continued on, and the body guard came on a little behind. Now when they had pussed a little glen, they entered into a nort of valley, where they met a lot of uniformed men going trand a pavine of to the right, and they acted so strange that Starring was somewhat applicious , and yet as the louder led the men off to the right. Starring looked carefully to see if he know him and the men, and he thought it might be some of the rangers he had met sometime before when he was with general Arronburg, she helped the general combat the fires coming twarddd tward his own lines...

But he could not perfectly have a good view of their faces, for they had gone past on horseback so fast, but being gone past Angeline Richese lookedcafter the men in the van, and believed they were either going to fight the fire, or were retreating from it.

It was their heights that imparted the thrill and surprise to the scene, and not lean magnificent than the waves of flames themselves were the varying dinmensions of some unburning valleys that remained between the, them. The angry aspects which they presented to the eye, that gazed almost vertically, upon their own 2 welro

At least near destruct a thirty all thousand lives were being that the coast line to a strength of the coast lines are destructed and villiages were overwhelmed with less or greater loss to property. Hundreds of ships were east upon the shores nearly four miles inland, and meases of coral from fifty to a hundred tone for miles or shattered to fragments by the regime waters where the shores the from the bed of the sea, and either sweet lines do not be shored to fragments by the regime waters.

The Blennigh domenon lelands were devasted along their shores by the waves, and of one island, all the inhabitants were drowned to a man, and longighereness, creatures flow any in herror w from the scene of such a disaster. Three islands, St Johns, as a sea and great destruction was done.

Of course this triple disaster, of almost a simultaneousl character was not the only herror.

Also can be added the astenishing and record breaking forest fires all over easter eastern and southern Calverinia, and through northern and Central Angelinia, Ever since eastern and southern Calvarinia, and through northern and Central Angalinia. For since the forcet fires grew as encouncing, in other countrys far from the same, some strange and remarkable sky effects were observed in different parts of the world bocause of comuch smake traveling around the globe. Many of these effects however were of extraordinary beauty, but in othern were like sky smudges partly cheering the sun, or making slight durkness while the sun shone through a strangely gray black sly sky. At first thinking volcanic erretions had something to do with this, many scientific inquiring the were made and in due time there was collected and tabulated a list of places from which these effects were seen, together with the date of such occurances occurance common cause and that it must be smoke of some big fire that maintained itself up at an error was the sun also concluded that such stronge optical phenomena had a common course and that it must be smoke of some big fire that maintained itself up at an error was the sun also caused the source was from these two fitself in and Angalinia anaported the source was from these two states indicated that such error mous clouds of smoke started from these two states of southern Abbleaunia and that the rodificus fury of the error mane conflagrat long could at that time alone account for the presence of some make and make long could at that time alone account for the presence of so much smoke at such tates of southern Abbleannia and that the prodigious fury of the ernormous conflagrat 1885 for could at that time alone account for the presence of as such association and light in the atmosphere.

It was believed that this this cloud traveled at double the speed of an express train, and curried by winds of any directions but mainly by westerly winds, in four days it had eveneed the Mic-Whithian seas, and was rapidly going over other nations two days inter t was moving over other for iega countries, and then across other seas back to its birthplace. But the upper winds still carried this haze of association and again, and still against went around the world. In July 1913 the smoke area and arguing and again, and still against went around the world. In July 1913 the smoke area had expended so as to include all countries, countries, so that is some the our could be such as the season of the best gave no light, except twillight, for a great for a season of the best gave no light, except twillight, for a great day by the property of the form the day, in a season of the best gave no light, except twillight, for a great day be such as a countries of the property of the form of the property of the form of the property of the form of the property of the great of the

The whole southern and southeastern portions of the city of Abbieann had vanished entirely, except an islanted section, ten blocks or so square, and projecting at a light of lake Angeline with deep water all around it, looking like a ruined venece venice in the square at a remendous work of destruction this must have been is attested by the evidence that where the mightlest and most maginificent city of all advorting had stood, and surrounded by luxuriant forests, it is now in some places a lake of waters, wity only the northerly and eastern section of the city still remaining but mostly in ruins that are too serioe severe to be mended.

Bearring began to realize that there is no region in all Abbieannia was more frequently visited by disaster, and all the horrors of this ernormous war, than the beautiful countries of Angeline, Angelinia, and Angeline, ine, and nowe nowehere else has greater damage been done, than in the territories of beautiful Calverinia.

Tye These beautiful countries have more than two hundred very big cities, and yet the was disasters have been so frequent frequent in any of these States, that now the principal ones will always serve as dates o to make time or refer too, just as in our own country is the case with any great historic event. During this awful war so far since 19 12 came in a month had never passed without there being a score of terrific disasters of some sort, affecting only the christian side, and the disappearance of a city or a townwas of frequent occurance. In the vinicity of numbemoreach, that and the region of Delights Junction formed but one single paradise which connected them. the region of Delights Junction formed but one single paradize which connected them.

but because of the terrific explosion at Jennie Vivian during the battle of grangelinia randia, nolights canation was decastated, and a part of Jennie Vivian city disappeared into the river, with all its neighboring forents and fertile fields and a terrible number of christian wounded also, who had falcen fallen in the battle.

This explosion also destroyed by blast and concussion one hundred and fourty five towns and villinger, and one city ... The whole country was violently agitated by the towns did villages, and one city... The whole country was violently agitated by the first greatest explosion of the war, and a tract of nearly fourtyfive square leagues then the day before had been covered with flouring flouring the greatest was rediced to a heap of ruline or wiped off the map. This destruction and fares was rediced to a heap of ruline or wiped off the map. This destruction was allowed to loss of over twenty two thousand lives.

But many of the others or empty other disuster combined cannot compare with his awful abbleana horror. Flover in the war so far, and probably mover will lets hope again for the christian side occur acatactysm so torthle as this. When the first explosion occured after twelve, near Abbleanan, it did immone damage, but oven after the rulin, it was balleved if the flood had not touched good parts of Abbleana it would all have been whed out by first, because fo set fires mode overy hill near Abbleana lost like volcanous belefing out flames continuously not only from their tops but their sides valleys and flames as well. The speedy forcat fires soon extended to a portion of the Calverine should small a third of this cantain range was either in full flames or beginning to show aims of confloration. Hills these forcet fires were regime onward, the whole forcet for many miles was in a state of tremendous agitation from the fire harricano of wind, the clouds floating chove were seamingly all afterne, and at one moment there were fifteen big floating chove were seamingly all afterne, and at one moment there were fifteen big fires seen at the same time. Hen women and children flad in terror from their burning homes, and filled the air with their cries of herror and distress. Indeed many hundreds of them had who had not time to escape were trapped and barned in their homes. Day after day before the not time to encape were trapped and that do in the mole country of enatorn capbodion the fro of the forcet fires increased, and the micle country of enatorn Calverinta seemed likely to be wised out by fire. Ernormous waves of flumes spread over the greatest forests, and in some cames moved tward Abbigann, and there was a scone of horror and earlible results of the conflagration pageing all the powers of econe of horror and terrible require of the configuration pegang and the powers of imagination, grow luminous clouds gathered above the chain of the Calvarine Hills hich which runs along the authoractors stretchyof Calvarinia. This cloud increased in size with minute untill at lant it close to form a part of curpy overh a overhead of a grown and blood red color which even hung over the earth for hundreds of miles. In proportion as this cloud grow, the forest fires apread forth and gained fresh in proportion as one casta grow, the inventibles apread forth and gained free furly, burning all before them. On the morning of May the last, the cloud seemed to suddenly break up into flames, and a tract of country extending from Point calverine, to the north on fur as Aberdeenia, to the morth and west, and covering an area of about a hundred and fifty miles, and only the morth one of flame, at once.

There stood the provious day the villiares of Tellington, and Baldeinbess, not one of the inhabitants had esculped the fire had come up so suddenly. They and their villiages had been consumed in the set of flames.

CONCULDING INCIDENTS, BEFORE STARRING HAKES AN IMPORTANT DISONVERY. HIS CONVENSATION ON SOME TOPICS OF THE WAR. HIS DESPERATE EFFORTS TO FORCE GLANDELINIAN PRISONERS TO CONFESS CAUSES OF THE DISASTER.....

Few months in Culverinia had passed without some war disaster taking place at one point or another of the normal war zone. However or whole towns have been literally aproc ed b, the concessions of explosions, fortresses by hundreds have been demolished during butiles, plantations ruined,, river islands broken up into reefs or blown up entirely, and whole court countries devastated by these terrible disturnables. Thanks to the fact, that Starring will soon discover the real cause of the Abbicann discover, which will give the Abbicannian authorities ideas and means to prevent such catastrophes in the fund future by sending such immense armies as to clear Calverinia of all the clandelinium armies. All the volcanic eruptions in a the world combined, all the met horrid earthquakes, and hurracanes and tornados and other catastrophes put togeth r are nothing t compared to the war horri horrors which have made such mercil ess onslughts upon the inhabitants of Calverinia, the poor unfortunate non-combatant people, and yet all these horrible disasters as Starring knows from his own investigat ions since the war started are even mild in comparison with the appulling cruelty. destruction, that Glandelinian armies have shown to helpless women and children, in their massucres, and other atrocities. hije perhaps since the first part of the war had started, a quarter of a million of little children have perished in these tertirot territories because of these massures and discusters of war, it is no a conservatively settimed that not less than ten millions a perished in the horrors of massuce massacres floods and other discusters, and in the terrible raids, and expeditions caused and made by the Glandelinian soldiery. It was cortain that there were nearly six million child slaves who were formerly r scued by christian armies, that perished in million child slaves who were formerly r sched by christian armies, that perished in the succession of disasters, and many more in massacres and other horrors. General Starring himself in one letter to the Vivian Girl Trinesses written in late mineteen twelve related that whole cities were dop? depolated by the Glundelinians who even used little children as targets in the way that sportsmen shoot birds and pigeons from the traps. He wrote that the Glandelinians fed their bloodhounds on little children and infants, the older children being regarded as food too carse for these animals and so were crucified and butchered. These scenes determined him to stend his ife life so were crucified and butchered. These scenes determined him to spend his life life in behalf of the christian cause, and the story of all his heroic efforts in these volume volumes is to be the greatest of all known. He wrote that the child slaves in the away fared as well a off as lost soulsin to infernal regions. The boys evere condemned to labor and perish under fire while at work, or in mines, or at breastworks, and the little girls to expire in the fields at trench digging and so forth, no matter how torvific a fire from opposing sides may be. Heither grouns nor tears, nor the tenderest calls of nature could move their unfeeling oppressers to relax their wicked brutality and tyrumy. Indeed their provisions were dealt out to them in such stinted quantities that they seemed better calculated to protruct existance and to lengthen their misory than to enable them to live. Oler older wirls applied ander the pressure of hunger and fatigue, clusping in the agonies of death their dead or dying counger friends to their breasts, shruided and contracted with famine. The claudelinians indeed were worst than gruel tigers, solves or lions, and the infurturate were suffering always from a sharp and cruel hunger. For all the time the war has raged on, the slaughter of these infurturate were suffering always from a sharp and cruel hunger. For all the time the war has raged on, the slaughter of these infurturate whretches, whom with divers thind of terminate, matther search or hand of before it will meet blatter. divers kind of terments, neither seen or heard of before in all past history of reality, they have been cruelly and most inhumanly but whered and but chered and elain. Of the three million christian children and grown ups in the six cities near Gravewhite there remains alive scarce than four hundred persons. good sections of the country of Calverinia not touched by filed fire, and explosion horrors, containing as much ground as from gun Franscisso to Chicago, lies wholly rained and devantated ...

The River salends of the Mic Nollester Rum are waste and desolute. The River islands a score of them known as the North Bond Isles neighboring north of Evengeline St Claire city, and others about sixteen in number, that had been as fertile as any part of Calverinia, pure and temperate in air are now totally unpeopled and destroyed, so that any ship going there, but at risk could only find temments of people out of all the half million or more seen there before the war. There are hundreds of other river and lake islands that are totally deserted, for all these months before the graph and the half million of more seen there before the war. There are hundreds of other river and lake islands that are totally deserted, for all these months before the graph and the destroyed these abominable graph that are totally deserved to the second these abominables and destroyed the second the second that are totally deserved to the second the second the second the second that are totally deserved to the second that are totally deserved to the second that are totally deserved to the second to the second that are totally deserved to the second to the se cyneities and destable try tyrannies, there have innocently perished over 12000, 12,000,000 child slaves, many children stolen from all parents being in this fatal i list, worey Moreover Starring also believes that the number is nearer fifteen or more millions consumed in this slaughter.

With the almost total extinction of the child slaves came the assumed necessity of other child slaves, and children were stolen from christian towns and villiages during rains and forays. I' was the policy to use up the slaves by hard labor and ill treatment for to the Clandellines they were a chosp correctly, but by the aid of christians in and the "territie hooded terror" of right riders many of them escaped. The horrors of the carsonal struggle would fill many volumes. Thele while the rival armies were annihilating one another in the fierce buttles whole communities of child slaves fled into the interior of the fores a which were well nigh inaccessable, and where they could either mooner or later find their way to friendly towns or villiages, or christian armies, and also where they could defy capture. Even when Starring and his force had landed at loland number too there was not a remaint left of the cixty hundred was traversed by the flood in about seven days and even here the loss of life and of property was simply appulling. Survivors who passed thro through the experience safely declars its he herrors its herrors even at Dorothy Cale, and Angelinia a Agathia to have been far beyond the power of a million words of books of words to narrate.

After the most thorough possible official sitting, accomplished mainly through the boards of registeration, and inquiry the loss of life in the flood at Angelinia Agathia n and borothy Gule was over the twenty thousand of whom 3,678 are not identified. For Dorothy Gl Gale, more harder hit than Angelinia Agathia, the exact figures can never be hit or reached, as many thousands more reported drowned, are suppose supposed to be missing, without any reports of their conditions or whereabouts. supposed to be missing, without any reports of their conditions or whereabouts. As wellall know captian one of the most striking features of the horror, rus that most immense dam of wreckugs from humseds of towns and from Abbieann too that formed as a long and high bulwark somewhere north and in front of the city of Mildred Greenburg, and extending across from 8t Marie, to Francisanna, and a little to the north, of collen Rum and polarine gostellio cities. This was caused mainly by the formation of some slight rises of ground in this locallity, which though the flood as said was deep enough to sweep over, was not able to carry on the wrockage as elsewhere a dhere the tangled sen of masoes of shattered houses, railway bridges, trees, and all kinds of railway cars, and debris of all kinds, from all ciries and towns, piled up in inextricable confusion, packed to solidity by the sea like towrent which carried thom forward like a huge mountain of battering rams. Hingled with the mass they say were countless of bodies of humanb beings, and animals. It was at this point absolutely impossible for even such a flood to separate or force onward the confused heap, of such an extent, and had the water done so, the cities of Mildred greenburg, Big Girlknool, Angelinia Agathia, and porothy Cale, and others in the same line would have been devastated even worse than Abbleann was by the flood, and mainly by this onrushing sea of wrockage. This prevented the disaster from being quadrupled. This war er far had smitten many Calverlaim and Angelinian cities with fire flood and disaster, sometimes with groat loss of li life and property. But the four recent big flood disasters, thus known, are the greatest of all, and give facts most completely the irrestible atrength f of Natures forces, when forced by the enemy to direct itself against the feeble works of man, even in this age of his greatest material progress."

CREATEST DISASTED TEIRITORIES ARE UNDER THE

abABBIEANHIAN FLAG.

Chapter Fourteen.

It can be said by now that under the Holy Fing of Abbiecomia, Abbiecomia herself remember some of the most desclated countries in the world, and the greatest of all forest fire scenes, and many explesion craters, some birrer than the biggest volcanic craters in Hawaii, and a war that is raging with a fury and a power that no one can concieve. Calverinte paradize of Abbleannia, rayaged now by the very fires of thr the wars inferro, from what it had once been a smilling land of winter and troute boatty and bountiff! I simme in the most ad as fair and protty as those of the American gundary i c witch islands, and those to are devastated. Calverint is now the land of the creel war nod pure, which overwholms all nations in the worst conservation of all and that is were and all itshorrors.....

Angolinia chare, too though so for ensuring met of the discord is a region also of the wars great activity. To make a statement more fair, Calverinia, the immensest state of them all occury a contral parties in the Abbiesmistan major, about two thousend miles went and gouth of the Abyesinkile State. And the famous Plangislomeneon islands occupy a central portion also near the Edy of Vivian Wickey, and the grup group includes wighteen inhabitated islands all of volcanic origin, and having a having all kinds of Bo plengiglomenean greatures, the most beautiful onimals of all kinds ever im imagined or pictured but rayneing in then their fury to glandelinions whom they detest of the grown is gather in tales, and it includes now it three quarters of the countries of the grown in the proof of the grown in the learner, the learner, the learner of the Three ment famous Aprel 100 for peter.

sume names of the lalands, the names of the Three meat femous Apostice. Bt peter, rough and andrew obteined penession of these the war would be lest. But to return to Abbiesan, guarning, effor his visit to the first errorsment breek in the centh caused by the extlesions went to another, a surprisingly monstagous bit, thirty miles in cir comformer, and two thousand feet deep, the wast inregular floor contained all kinds of debris. There were two gaps in the crater, where the munitions that blew up must have torre openings in the side. Met a tree, shryb nor were a turff of grans obstructed the view. Starving was now atricken at this sight, and could not comprehend the three deap than Another well sight, and could not comprehend what went have done this. Another well as must be average was nine miles what really must have done this, another explosion crater he discovered was nine miles in circumference and purhays a thousand feet deep.

Howhere else in any volceno mag there may craters to compare with those, Betther could there existed an explored with ease and comparatively safety, spritche as they proved the evident force of these "eviptions" it is needless to add that no million volumes of description can give any one en idea of the incomparable magnitude and aplandor of the scene. In the center was a hole about half a mile wide that looked like a bottomless lit, but Starring had means of making soundings and found it opened into a cavers or something of the coort about five hundred feet further down. Or was it the opening in the roof of one of the hunge mine galleries. That Starring wished to investigate. He decided to enter the crater, which was affected by means of strong ropes. He let have if dean to the furthest extendity below the dark hole of the pit, but seeing by the aid of a torhe torok water below the dark aperture and not down to see the interior. It was he paye up the intention of landing below but to go far enough down to see the interior. It was not a cuvern undenly part had water which way under where he hung. It looked to him like a cavern however but not made by nature. It was evident the explosion dug this cavern too. All of the debrie of the cratet and around it above was all earth, rocks and stone. Nevertheless it was an awful margin, and as Starring looked down over the crater walls, he wendered what explosions must really have produced such awful big holes.

Beyond him be could see seelly the strange movement of the distant forest fire. The tendancy of the current offimmes if it may be so called, seemed at that distant like a long heal hell, though at times it warled, flowing to one side like a lava stream, while along the borders of the distant forests, waves of darkened apparently slumbering forests, apparently as un unmoveable as those through which Starring had just passed appeared in wringled folds and masses or like dark green clevids, heaped against the distant shore of the big river. Yet if one watches these wavy forests closely however he will presently be observe what uppears like a fiery red serpent uppearing at some other portion of the woods, and uppearently creeping through and under them, like a chain of brilliant flame, its form lengthene as it goes, untill it embraces a great section of the forest. Then it begins begins to spread and rise as though the body of forest had burst aconder, and was disclying into fire, along its whole length into the fierce flood of turbulent fury, which was seen elsewhere. Boon the broad thick mass of forests, thus surrounded, which seemed fixed and immoved immovable slowly burns forward as it seems und soon the whole distuppears in the dreud ful rayenous vortex of the fire. Focasanionally the fire seems to launch huge shricking streamers and fountains high into the air with a noise like the rpar of many firrorks and Skyrockets, presenting a spectacle of wild fire beauty within the entire woods.

According to what gtarring felt about the matter, was that the world considered clandolinia a most dangerous and thou of all times, and she and her numerous reprovinces and states formed a class of wicked countries by themselves. landellnia was proving this now. clandellnia by all other nations was feared more thin any other country, and the nations feared the dread result should landellnia win her bloody and and most wicked of wars. And the history of calverthia in this longest of all stories tells more tales of horror as regards the loss of life and property as may be read in reality in all histories according to the disasters throughout the worlds. There have been since the war started fatal catastrophes, and ruin has been wrought which seems terrible in comparison with di disasters of real history. While at this spot Starring became nervious of the situation produced by the forest blare. He saw from his point of observation hear the crater a large town in the math of the configuration. He knew long before the fire had advanced tward this town, and of the conflagration. He knew long before the fire had advanced tward this town, and

Only gigantic causes on account for the girantic thenomens of this forest fire. Before threatening this town the fire had traveled sixty miles in a straight line, and was from fifty to sixty miles bread, seconding to the forest through miles it be forest through miles it burned. The fires had already lasted for many contast for about thirteen probably probably, end had already burned or move than five handred miles of fees a foresta. Four have forestyfings was raring indeed with terrible fury, the flames surging and rearing threadown its length like a barricane with a power and fury perfectly indescribble. It was nothing else then a hell upon earth, with a speed

From the scene of these confligrations, whose united lent a length was unknown the main confligration in reaching the vinicity of the Abbitoth to the table of table divided itself into four arrows, between which it shut up men and benefa, and all refuses. There it am raged along the river it extended the shore line for miles destroying all before i. it. From the alone of one huming hillside, strangely enough produced by the heat of the flames flowed a rapid stream of red hat me Hed rock, rolling rushing, and tumbling like a aweller river bearing along in its corrent large rocks that made the river of molten alons almost foam as it dished down a precipice, to form into hard substance below.

Starts Starting recieved this storylifrom sother survivor who had experienced the shoc shocks caused by the employing. The men told it thus,;;
"At first, thought the shocks were a series of enthingues, but as the shocks became more startling every minute and so many too, and when their succession become so rapid that the countryside quic quivered like a botlingboot, nearly all the time followed by so many large reports, became nervious. The effects of the trembling was to me like that of a ship struck by heavy raves. Though I saw no such movement the crust of the with seemed to rise and gink like a sea in ze storm. I heard a loud noise and as if big rocks were rent, as if muntains were falling, and buildings and their contents were being chattered, trees ereging like reeds, end eaw unimals run about demented, while the frightened prulation of the town in was near thought the judgement day had come... I was the most coured and did not eleap the rest of the night."

Cometines Discring had inclinations to believe not the reports of the explosions having cracked the country relie in thousands of places for hundreds of miles, but he had discovered that the streets in the town of publics near the main explosion crater, had crached open, and that the shocks and explosions further off were as frequent as he that har of a welfa. The spectable could not viewed perfectly by night from the tallest by lidings of two many two hundred miles away and places of antly within forety miles of the confligration. Across from the north of abbienant which Starring was able to observe from a high elevation, is a continuous chain of explosion gratue, which proved to be a etring of some of the past mightlest explosions in in said the words record however inthis story for the size of an explosion crater is the biggest one which Starring had visited. "oweve Harver a storm of forest fires had prevented his right means of approaching it, and and when he had attempted to reach it by crossing a portion of the road, the fire obstructed his passage.

He tried to reach the crater by means of goingthrough a rowsy gorge, from seven to all eight hundred feet depp deep and averaging seven hundred yards wide, but this too was forested. The fire persued him and his followers through the gorce, and the flames porsued him all the way has the region of the crater. Tremendous explosions somewhere followed, throwing ricks to ernormous heights. Starring knowing the fir flames had spread over the forested plains below in great seas of fire many lemmes when somewhere to the forested plains below in great seas of fire many lemmes when believed its satisst to try and find the crater and seek refuge in his confines. He passed a region were twenty r vill larges were in danger of being destroyed by fire, and by afforts managed to warm fifty blousemd inhabitants, who not away on time. The confineration following him was fifty miles long, and in places twelve to lifteen miles wide, and theybeight of the flames was from eix hundred to one thousand feet feet is couldn't find the crater yet and had to trace his step back to Abbieann for antity. How soon if ever, another such disaster may burst forth no one can predict.

thousand persons whom the rading rading and fierce landelinions had found there a week before. Their pitiful tule was told only by some caves where thousands of sampled human bodies of men women and children strew the ground. The Clundelinions in this was told the nainthophone armsind analysis of the property of the this neighborhood remained unsubdued, and no force had yet been able to dislodge them. Outside of Abbieann in the hilly country where some Glandelinian forces, and Starring believing these knew something of the Abbieunn disaster decided to try and surround and capture them all if possible. He had still over 10,000 of his men followers, and therefore the expedition started. Starring offered to each Ranger's who should capture a Clundelinian officer a commission in his rank of work. The force employed against these Glandelinians consisted of four regiments of Calverinians, and the whole force of Rangers with him. He learned that within his stay here in Abbieann the Glandelinians beyond had greatly increased, noth notwithstanding all the measures that had been concered for their supression, to the great terror of many inhabitants of neighboring towns. The clandelinians of which number Starring knew nothing about, was under command of Colonel Coddoe, and he was a formidable landelinian guerralla. Under his leadership the various bodies of fierce Clandelinians were formed into one great force and well organized and brave as lions. Coddoe was as dangerous as well as he was a military head of his force, no party could be sent forth by the christians but he knew it in time to. lay ambush or descend with fire and sword on the region left unprotected.

He was thus always a supplied with arms and ammunition, and as all his men were excellent murkemen, never wasted a shot, and never risked a battle in the open, his forces naturally increased, while those of t his enemies were desciminated. His men w re never captured, and never took a prisoner it was impossible to tell when they were def defeated, and the only men who could obtain the slightest advantage against them as we will soon see were Starring and his forces. Yet the rebels had every topographic topographical advantage, for they held possession of cockpits. These highlands are Turrowed through and through as by an earthquike with a series of gaps and ravines. These chasms vary from three hundred vards to a mile in length, the rocky walls are a hundred feet in height, and often absolutely inacessable, while the passes at each end will admit but one man at a time. They are thickly wooded, wherever trees can grow, water flows within them, and they communicate with one another, forming a series of traps for un invading force.

It is not strange a then, that in many parts of the war zone, that the highest military authorities, at this period have pronu pronounced the overcoming of the fierce clandelinians a thingboore difficult than to obtain a victory over the biggest army of evil spirits. But how to execute such an expedition through such a ruinous country devastated by explosions, forest fires, and floods was also a difficult problem. mo assault such a position without annihilation was impossible. Starring was willing to try but most of his higher followers were inconvientiently cautious, as the expedition was exceedingly dungorous. In case of misfo tune would come Starring selected one of the most difficult passes, posting in the forests a series of large outlying parties to signal with their whistles one by ne the approach of any of the Glandelinians on the rear, which would warn Starring, and he would retreat. Through this perilous country Starring and his band bands bravely advanced, but whistle after whistle they heard scunded, but just then there was no other human noise in the woods, and they advanced till they saw the smoke of distant glandelinian rifles before they caught a glimpse of any Glandelinian soldiery.

In his very first attack, he was miserably defeated, and almost had to fly for his life amid a perfect panic of the bands of m n in which some fourty or fifty were killed and wounded. Starring had been disguisted by this defeat, and he desired to have revenge. He hated these Glandelinians most because despite all things their bruvery were overshadowed by the shockingcruelties they committed in their expeditions and he firmly believed there were many glandelinians among them hat either knew or even had something to do with the ernormous disaster. He learned that these glandelinians in an attack upon a town compelled a number of priests, monks, nuns, and even children their crisoners to carry and plany the scaling ladders against the parapets of a high earth breatworks, hoping to see these poor creatures killed by the fire of their own c countrymen who defended the town. A Convent hold by soldiers that had made a bold resistance, on surrondering, was set on fire and burned to the ground with the garrison in ot it. In many prisoners had died under the tortures that these glandelinians inflicted on them. In the brilliancy of the success of this glandelinian commander many others on chem. In the prilitancy of the success of this Glandelinian commander many others had joined him in great numbers. There was ne large Glandelinian war cruiser in the river, but the men who were in charge got of the and the ship was suddenly blown up whether from the drumkness and careleseness of the crews, or the direful revenge of some Calverinian citizen remains a matter of doubt.

It was said that nearly fifteen hundred men on board this ship had perished.

Starring had followed the news statements of the attacks of this clandelinian hord, and knew that his next operation was an attack on La Polama before the disaster, which town however repulsed the attack. Yet these merciless clandelinians fierce than piratical depse desperadoes were accustomed to shut up their rrisoners, even children in Carlolic churches, where it was eas to either keer guard over them or terture them. At the captured villiages of Tli, and El Toro in this instance so little care was taken of the captu ed that many of these unfortunate cut captives were actually starved to death in the churches, while the Glandelinians were revelling in their dwellings. In cruelty and wickedness many a a Glundelinian general made the famous Pirate Morgan seem like a great saint.

General goddoe was near by being destroyed on one of his expeditions for a consider ab e force of Calverinians had had time to put in order a fortification at the entrance to the town of Colso, and three extensive buttlerecof cumnum were stationed on all r roads to cut of the generals retreat. But the Claudelinian general fought a d battle as desperate and as terrific in losses as two Cettysburgs put into one, the two Calverinian batteries were captured, and he took the third. He then captured the town the risk of starting a new forest fire. Preparatory to this ardusous undertuking, Starring made preparations to surround the whole region. — hen the Calverinians approached again, the cliendelinians fired again from all hidder recesses, but the Calverinians were now to weel acquanited with the habits of these Glandelinians to be discomposed by them, and this time the terrific Glandelinian fire did not seem to have much effect. The Glandelinians however terrific Glandeliniam fire did not seem to have much effect. The Glandeliniams however made a more desperate and obstinate resistance than was expected, and finally at night starring himself and his followers had to give way again. During the long battle starring had givel orders to rive these Glandelinians no swarfer but the Glandelinians and fought doughedlinians. Six hundred of his men fell, while he believed the Glandelinians did not lose a single man.

During his advance tward his strong holds Starring and and his followers had observed further signs even in this district where one of the most violent parts of the disasterous floods had swept over. All shipping be longing to the town of La Polama further north large and small had been seized and torn by the onrushing waters, and shifted about like pieces of paper, many had been aground in the deep mul completely, some thrown high and dry among the trees on the sloping sides of hills shifted about like pieces of paper, many had been aground in the deep mud completely completely, some thrown high and dry among the trees on the sloping sides of hills and many others haveled no on the other pellmell in frightful confusion. In the town in which the enemy was in possession, and countryside itself there was not a house that was secure, and besides the bas of life attendant on the shipwrecks, numbers of people had been killed either by falling walls, the crashing down of the ruins or by the masses of different objects which had been wildly driven onward by the floods.

At the lowest estimation over sixteen hadred lives had been lost, and two hundred and seventy seven vessels wrecked and destroyed, and the surviving population had abandoned seventy seven vessels wrecked and destroyed, and the surviving population had abandoned the town and no now general colose occupys the remainder of the ruins as a position.

The scene all about the countryside near this town even now was most frightful. In every direction masses of vessels appeared above the water still remaining, standing up one might say like blades of grass in a field. Countlous does of wreck, boats, fragments of houses, trees, boats, spars, cases of cargo, and debris in every shape covered the stan standard water in a manner that define all description. hims of all kinds and sizes were scattered about in all imaginable positions, sometimes in most incongruous positions and situations, one a large steamer had taken p its station among the remains of a large grove of pine trees far above even the high water mark of a river.

In another part of the emmining flood, alongside the austance and of the town, were

In another part of the emaining flood, alongoide the eastern end of the town, were a score of ships piled literally on one another. One a calverinian brig of some fifteen thousand tons was seen to go down against the river docks at the outbreak of the flood and was lying entirely under water no part of her showing, and when she was cleared later by the receding waters on her was discovered a steamer of nearly twice her weight with one part of a topmast above the receding waters, on her again, two other big ships, each two thousand tons in weight, and on top of all, and resting on the latter of the two big ships, though herself half under the wreckage of all descriptions desposeted there by the waters was the huge Abbleannian war cruiser, called the Columbian.

Starring found an eye witness of this terrible section of the disaster, as he saw it from a vessel that though caught in the flood survived the experience. He told Starring; exploding noises in the distance recedied, nothing could have been more natural, and in one sense peaceful than the whole scene. A day afterwards what a change there was. Several of us were leaning over the side, watching people inspect the partial wreckage of their town, when without the slightest warming, suidon as a flash of lightning came such a shaking of the timbersoof the ship as jet perhaps no vessel had every experienced. It was not a quivering as produced by an earthquake, or by the shocks that night before but a downward and award shaking which threatened to be not one bolt in its place, nor any planks together in the ship.

Many funcied that the machinery had gone wrong, and run though this was not very sast to look at the engline room.
Yet to make it more strange to us the firemen and engineers swarmed up from below, the crew were on dock in a moment, the passengers made a simultaneous rush for the hulks to the ship, and crowded the quarter dock, constrination on every face and not a word was oppken till the ship was again quist quiet, when a marmar went round" semathings wrong with the river. It's running off its course".

And so it was.. And persons on the ship who had live a on the river sho. a for any many years and who were in Caiverinia for fourty years, declared that each an action of the river surpassed anything of the kind that they had ever seen before.

Over the action of the river there was no composure among any one on board, and

Over the action of the river there was no composure among my one on board, and many of the more timid women became alomst almost mad with fright. Some of them climbed into the rigging so as if possible to float clear of the ship some went forward to the bows or went to the puddle boxes with the same intertion. But the timid ones, half wild with terror before became perfectly immamanageable now. About twenty of them almost blind with fear, rushed headlong into one of the life bouts, and their examls induced one or two ladies and some men and children to follow bouts, and their examls induced one or two ladies and some men and children to follow

Most fortunately for us a out a mile cutside of our position, a long stretch of the helevation ended in a low point. This expl exposed to the fill full force of the torrent, met it like a wedge, and it was ov observed that at the moment the sea of ruging vetters reached this point, it first hurled up a cloud o of or wreckage or every description with a desfening roar, that shook the ship then broke and dropped so that when it struck the ship it was not quite so high. We had been lying all morning morning head to the north, but the water receding from this portion of the river so that when it struck the ship it was not quite so high, we had been aying all more morning head to the north, but the water receding from this portion of the river by the northward suction of the flood like a militace to meet the wave, turned our being round, so that it took us on the stern. "During the stravels like this starring recieved another witness of the unusual catastrophs, and he told it this way! way!

"During the night of June or any the last which ever day it was, the weather was even unusually warm for such stime of the year, the sky in the south was actare as if the however was raining down fire and brimsetons at the end of the world, and overhead the sky was overcast, but with smoke, and far off in the north there was a flash and a sound like thunder. con afterwards the sky darkened in that direction, and debris of the land, stones, fragments of trees and what not poured down in torrents, while a strange powerful oder of comething like powder exploded prevaded the atmosphere, the flashed in the distance increased in vividness, and the thunder of a most peculiar sound and with an unusual v reverbration crashed for nearly twenty minutes in the distance sound and with an unusual v reverbration crashed for nearly twenty minutes in the distance terribly and deafoningly loud with intermissions so short of duration as to be unrecognizable entirely.

By the large of about five minutes after the uproar ceased, the darkness began to increase and then it was seen that the strange butthly and wrockage showers was bringing down fragments of buildings, torrents of crops, and and even water, mud and clay. All this debris fell for about an hour, covering the ground to about three feet, and during that time overything despite the darkness had a dull leaden aspect, while the falling mus stuck to the roofs of the houses and the leaves of the trees.

There was no concussion of the ground here but nevertheless the windows in the houses of the town word blown out and roofs shaken of f, and some buildings wrecked. The calverine River which runs past my home became immediately a raring terrent The calvering River which runs past my home became immediately a rating torrent but going contrary to the direction of its current, bursting one of its leves and flooding the land through which it pussed, and creating freet af of estruction but its waters became of a strange muddy color, and for three or four weeks after the unusual event the calor of the water remained though in a decreasing degree. It is worthy of notice that the great body of water came from the vinicity of the big flood,, for the lower tributaries of the Calverine River were very little swollen.

We found that the scone of the explosions, which we at first throught yought thought were cruptions was about eighty miles oast of our town and the debris was hurled to the west. I heard that a small vessel which was about thirty miles down the river from the scene at the time of the explosions, experienced a shover od debris similar in every every respect that fell in our town.

The area then over which the debris fell must have been at least a hundred miles. Starring in p inspected inspected another explosion crater, and saw that at a great distance beyond the crater the tree were destroyed, and the cart was covered ten twenty feet deep in some places with earth debris. Here and there et umps of blasted striking evidence of the force of the explosion.

Most of these stumps were quite shattered even by the debris, and in muny were found embes embedded large pieces of rock. On removing away some of the debris from the ground at some distance away from the explosion crater large splinters of wood belong ing to houses, and bloached leaves were discovered. Beyond this zone of desolation, the forests were destroyed to a great extent as if by a whirlwind. Brunches of trees, broken and twisted off from the parent stem, had fallen to the ground, and by their weight crusheddown all the forest undergrowth. In spite of the heavy ruins of debris and mud and water and other ejex ejects of the explosions which were almost continuous during the uproar, the leaves of many trees still tanaciously clumg to the branches.

Some etreems which ran through the ravines radiating from the explosion district were in many places dammed p with large ammodratmounts of wreckage and with splinters of wood.

The immense pine trees with such a cloud of leaves which had been so thickly growing here were now guant smoking skeletons, threatening to fall upon them as they passed by They plunged into a depth of smouldering ground, and to make it easier to travel they had to lift themselves up by successive broad steps and cling to rocks and ground for aid. Energing from a portion of this cooling but smoking desolation they came upon another und more warmer zone of the fires pust rage, where the biggest trees with shrubbery and brushwood once so twined together that a path had to be ciet with a cutlas was now mere dwarfts and the region was cut h such a sea of smoke that they had to turn off till they came to a path washed in into deep ciptern like cavities, down which they descended on one side, only to climb out at the other.

They followed the narrow path over heatened ground, and they could not see at any location in the distance, and blasts of hot air tainted the atmosphere for many miles around. Starring and Angeline Riches peered into one smoking ravine, glowing like an even or fire place, and it was like a glimpse into a lava filled volcanic crater, for the whole interior and bottom of the ravine was still full of glaring smadges and up came cuch blasts of heat, that they were glad to escape with only a few elight blister burns on their hands for their paine.

The crater they reached shaped like an immense deep ravine, six hundred fest down and had a lake of water in the bottom.

The starring had heard much details of the furly of this forest fire in this whole region, and which had raged when he was so caught in Abbieann and coud could not get the ship to peas North gend. The town of North gend had been in its pa typath. It was on the morning of Stempter September Ioth when slight apprehensions were felt by many persons of the the town by not the only unusual violence of the wind, and the increasing warmyth, accompanyed by smoke, but by its crazy actions. The preceding evening had been hazy with smoke and unusually dark, but at first nothing serious had been appreheneded.

all efforts on the parts of the Glandelinians, and the ascallants to theirwender and surprise finally gained acons to the places and drove the Glandelinian before them copturing many prisoners. They continued to rush on, and now found nothing in their way of of proceeds, till the three attacking parties met on the alopse of a small hill. The alabelian soldiers up above, poured down a hot ire but the parties taking advantage of the thickness of the troops andbrush pushed on, and finally the foe atter resisting stubbornly for a who a day fled with haste and precipitation, and gave up their fair positions to the mercy of the advontuerers. Starring was severely wounded, and two hundred of his men were killed, and two thousand wounded, but neverthele nevertheless the conquerors set about securing their position, but neverthele selves, turning the deptured gums of the position a so as to swoop all the approaches from the country. A portion of the Glandclinian force were still in position to the left, too much unerved by fear to make any exertion to save their position from being awaulted by a mere handful of sensities. When night closed in they glided by steelth from their stronghold and joined their panic stricken men in the interior. The next day starring despite but injuries took further measures to secure his conquest, which he help hold in aboleute possession for a month. The clandelinian increased in numbers however, and he ordered the Glandclinian positions he captured to be destroyed.

But Starring pesitions were world fortified, and the utmost efforts of Codious men produced nothing but sorious logses to himself in killed and wounded. Finding his object beyond an easy attainment commenced to easing heavily on his enen, negotiations were commenced and Starring demanded of him to surrender, but the orrivance occurance of an untward event exasperated Starring, and suspended their progress for a time.

The following evening the two murderers were sent to him, and he made their very own countrymen held as prisoners hang them. Coddoe then wisely surrendered unconditionally, and having discovered the real case of the ruins he marched these prisoners into the ruins of Abbicann unarmed, devoided of belts and suppenders for their trousers and made preparations to question them concerning the disaptor. Active exertions were now made by all to force these Glandelinians to tell, but to the disappointment of Starring, who expected much information, these Glandelinians either

Starrings par patroites methotism was aroused at this vaunt, and the Glandelinian commander was informed that should the real cause of the disaster be known, all of the Glandelinian armies would have some difficulty to rain any part of Calverinia they now possess.

Chapter Fifteen

ANOTHER WITNESSES ACCOUNT OF THE SCORGE OF THE ABBIEANN DISASTER, AND ITS EFFECTS.

While reaming there, starring more than once heard the story of the appalling disaster at Abbieum, the beautiful city situated between the two rivers of the Arronburns Run and the Mic-Hollester. Starring to save his life could not comprehend how it could be that in a very few minutes hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of the inhabitants were killed or drowned. Yet he came across the little black haired girl who in that city had befriended Angeline nichee, and her venturesome friends before the catastrophe and who with them had survived and was indeed a perfect eye witness of the whole catastrophe as it actually occured, having not been in bed that night for fear of a dread event, as at that time the sky far off was lighted like an inferno by the distant forest fires and she had dreaded some sort of a catastrophe.

The narrative produced herewith, and written as the conversation goes be brings the detail before the reader with aforce and simp, simplicity which leaves no doubt to him of the exact nature of the disaster. Starring knew the little girl by the description furnished by Angeline tchee, and the latter had fortunately met her in one of the refugee camps, and bad her come and follow them, as for her goodness to her and her com panions she decided to make her a little girl scout.

Starring first asked her;

"Are your purents living ittle girl?"

"Where are they!"

"They are in Pandora sir.. "

"How did you come to be in this camp. "?

"I came myself sir. I refused to go home untill . Ifound Penrod who was so good to

" hat is your name child?" "Jume Georgeiana Torio."

"I would like to question you about the disaster, since Penrod, says he knows you, and that you of the inhabitants, including your parents were the only survivors. There is reports in news papers, magazines, and so forth that this disaster, was a big "earth earth quake_followed by a severe volcanic eruption. I want the exact truty little girl whichI know you will give me, for you look as good as a little suint."

"I'll tell the truth sir. Cross my heart and hope to do and die if I tell a le."
"Was the disaster an earthquake, and a volcunic er ptica!"
"no sir. The shocks were too sudden to be an earthquake, thy sir as bad as an earthquake is, it would give you more time than this shock did. According to the way it reemed to me there was no earthquake. There was a rour like explosions, and the effect upon the city was more like a terrific cyclone. I felt no con cussion below t my home at all, and yet all the building suddenly felt. Ly home didn,t."

"Well I won't question you for a time now. Tell me as much as possible of your experience.

"It was about twelve oclock sir, and I and penrod had just left each other about half an hour before, and I returned home. I did not go to bed, and neither did my father and mother because there was a terrible forest fire raging southeast of the city and the wholecity had been alarmed and fedred it would strike the city. I was seated in my bedroom, just readying my prapr prayer book, when there was a loud crash like thr lo deet thunder but far away. The noise was miles away, but it sounded as terrific is the most loudest thunder would when crashing right overhead. Believe me I was scared, the windows went out, the house jumped as if there was a shock more in the air than elsewhere, and the table at which my mother was sitting rading a bible jumped high, and knocked her and the chair pulmp to the floor spilling all the book books on top of her.

The shock was like a terrific cyclone, there was no earth, tremble, and yet building fell us if they were blown down, and I could not percieve a breath of wind stirring.

while my sister ran in to terror to the door, was reflecting with myself what could be happening as there was no shock from the ground, but without having the least fact as to the real cause just then, there came again a long roll of such loud thunder like a volley of cannon, big enough to stretch a mile, and the whole house shook and swayed to its foundation, and a frightful hissing and thundering noise came from the very sky above, and a terrific glaring fiery cloud came down upon all our houses and into the street, and there was then a something like a horrid blast of hot wind. We threw ourselves down the stuirs almost scorched, and suffocated, and there we remained in suspense, wondering whether we should stay in the cellar or chance the perils of the hot cloud in the streets, as the danger in si inside a inside and out seemed equal. In a moment I was stunned with a most horrid crash, as if every building in the city had fallen down at once, while at the same time came thundering that was four times as low as before and rolled long and fast. The house shook with such violence that the upper stories immediately fill fell, and though the collar which was almost under the ground did not become enthomyed us we found, yet every thing was thrown out of its place in such a manner that it was with a no small difficulty that , or my parents and sister kept our foot and expected a pected nothing less than to be crushed to death, as the walls continued racking to and frr fro, opening in several places, large stones fulling falling down on every side from the crucke and the ends of most of the beams and rafters started out from the colling.

And sir what added to the terror and horror f of the scene, the sky was covered with each a cloud as to make overything so gloomy that though it was night outside with such a cloud as to make overything so gloomy that though it was night outside before it was now no lark that , could not see anything at all, it was like to me of the awful Eyp Eppytian darkness told of in the Bible, and it continued for many hours. As soon at my father summoned nerve enough to a light a small candle which he brought with him during the flight into the cellar, the first objects, saw in the cellar was my mother citting on the floor with a cruciffx in her arms, all covered with dust, pale and trembling. My father looked worse, and my sister appeared to frightened to even scream. I seked my father whether he thought it was all over, for it was silent cutside now, but his consternation was so great, that he was not able to give me an answer. My sister asked me in the utmost agony, if I did not thin think he very world was at an end, at the same time she complained of being checked, and begged me to procure her some water from the callar faucts. Boot his I went to the faucet, but procure her some water from the cellar faucet. Upon this I went to the faucet, but found the water would not run. nowever recovering his composure my father told us all that we must not think now of quenching our thirst, but of saving our lives as the house would cortainly bury or e.tomb us all in the collar and we would never get out.

We hurried up stairs, father and mother forcing us girls to go first, but keeping close b hird, and leabing leaving the ruins of the house made directly for that end of the street which leads to the Mic-Hollester River. "

"Did you reach it!" angked Starring.
"I'd giv, the passure "a was entirely blocked up with the fallen houses to the height of their five stories, and all that sen of wrockage gir was emoking like a cloud and bright liemes pierced those clouds and the shoke blinded us. To escape that an ul heat we turned back and proceeded to the other end which lod to entral Avel Avenue, and there mother and father helped us over a yest hemp of shocking ruins, with no small there mother and father helped us over a vast houp of shocking rufne, with he small hazard to urn as well as their lives, and just was we were join, into this street, as there was one part we two girln could not climb over without desistance of my father and mother, and the help of our hands use fest too, I desired mother to lot go her held for a moment, which she ald resulting three or four fest behind me, at their mount there is a burney missed us all. If it had father does not stone from a tot tering wall, and burney missed us all. If it had father does not jetser, mother and a father would have been crushed in the set degrees, but the dread we were in of shering the sa fate curselves, and the helpest degrees, but the dread we were one discaling the sa fate curselves, and the help of the light of the fluxus, were one shocking us to make me think nothing slee but of the horror. The same kind which we were forced to observe all around us by the help of the light of the fluxus, were outle sleen to work give the misses of house on the work give the misses of house on the light of the fluxus, and the result in the truck as of house on the light of the fluxus, were outle side if led six or eight stories high, the highest to and underly tuilding and threatening us within our view, or my can part air, as destruction appeared to be unavoidable, I only wished that searthing would happen to me at once, and not have my legs or arms

only wished that something would happen to me at once, and not have my legs or arms broken, in which case I would except nothing else but to be left upon the spot-lingering in misery, like those poor unhappy war wretches, without recleving the least help from any person, as none were there to render aid, and my parts and sister would not have been able to help me.

And then as self preservation is the first law of nature, these sud thoughts did not so fur prevail as to make me or my of own parr parents totally despuir. We proceeded on as fast as we could with any convienice convienience, though with ceeded on as fast as we could with any convientee convientees, thou he though with great care and caution. We at length got clear of this horrid passage, and found brackves safe and short in a large open square, which had been thrown down a few minttle before. Here we stood for some time, considering that we should do, and not thinking ourselves safe in the situation, we came to the resolution of climbing over the roins and get back to our own home, in order to get to the rivers side, that with the help of any, we might then be able to see our way and get as far away from the tottoring houses in case of a second crash. This with greater difficulty we finally accomplished, and here Perrod found me and brought me off to his girl scout companions. We we reached the lower section of the city, we living on the north olice, we found a prodigious swarm of people of all saxes, of all ranks and conditions lying dead and the rooms of houses half fallen or half exposed in the ruins. There were several ricests who had r m from the at alters in their saccredatal vestments lying in the ruins of a church, laddes half dressed, and some without shoes, all those laying and the ruins, with the terrors of the horrible death they came to in their faces, buring the awful shocks that night the constraint among the dying in their faces. During the awful shocks that night the consternation among the dying people had been miversal, and the shrieks and cries of the people killed first in some other district of the city could be heard for blocks. At the same time we could hear the full of the tallest buildings, whereby many persons were killed on the gipt and others mortally wounded.

"Where every one in the city as far as you know killed outright?" asked gturring.

"Why then was it reported in the papers that the whole population was destroyed.!"
"I he flood did it." unswered Jane." We with Penrod, w and his girl scout friends were crossing over a small section of the rising flood by means of a long windrow of wrockage, when on a sudden I heard a cry from Gertrude." There is a deluge coming. It's like a tidal wave of the sea coming. Hurry everyone. We must get across or we ure lost."

Turning my eyes northward tward the slowing increasing flood, which at this place was sufficient to be about ten miles broad I could be releve the water in the distance heaving and swelling and increasing and spreading in a most unaccountable manner, as if waters were coming in tremendous torrents from some hoge dum of a big lake that had bursted. Then in an instant there appeared at some small distance, a large body of water rising as it were like a moving water wall mountain high. It came on feaming and rearing, and rushed tward us with such impetuousity that we all impediately raced across that wrecking jam running for our lives as fast as possible. We got to a high section of the city on time but then we were above our waist in mater, though we run up thelve blocks from the bunk.

For even my own mart, I and my parents and sister had the narrowest escape, and we would certainly have been lost, had we not grasped a large floating beam, that came within our grasp, till we mag managed to o work it to a higher section of the struct, which we did with great rapidity. There now appeared as much danger from the water as from the Land, and we did not know where to retire for shelter, as the flood was quickly rising higher and higher. By f ather took a sudden resolution of returning to our can section of the city which seemed too high for the flood to come and this we all did, with our clothing all dripping. Here we all stood for some length of time, and observed war; ships of the river tembling and toesing about as a tornado on the river had struck the, cano had breken their cables, and were carried our of sight, others were whirled round and round with great swiftness, way arge boats were turned keel upward, and all this without any wind, which seemed the arge coats were there are the powerd, and all this without any wind, which seemed the more actoniching. """"""

"Well so far your description slightly differs with those of others said Starring.
"But there is one thing I have heard of which I do not believe, what happebed happened to that part of the city facing lake Anceline!"
"It was swallowed up with all the people in it in their bods by the lake" gaid the Girl. At the same time all the lake wharf boats and small vessels anchored it the harbors, all full of people going out on midnight boat excursions were all swallowed up as in a whirlpool of some kind, and never more appeared."
"Such a thing copys are accorded and and a child starring." "Panned do you helieve that really

"Such a thing seems exaggerated" said starring. "Penrod do you believe that really happoned "". Penrod shruged his shoulders." I was in that part a few days before the disaster came. " he finally said," and after the disaster I never saw southeastern Abbiesan no

"Maybe the flood swept it away." suggested Starring.

"Irobably." submitted Fenrod.

"Itrobably." submitted Fenrod.

"That do you think of it.?" to Angeline Riches.

"That do you think of it.?" to Angeline Riches.

"The lave of lei over the city during the disaster" said Angeline Riches. From the spot where we were then but myself had the account of it from many mesters of surviving ships who were unchored lithin two or three hadded yards west of that portion of the city and the whole catestrone from their lockest stations. One of them in and said they saw the whole cutastrophe from their lockout stations. One of them in particular informed me that when the last and main shocks and crashes of explosions came on, he could percieve the whole city waving backwards and forwards, like the came on, he could percive the whole city waving backwards and forwards, like the sea, when the wind first begins to rise, that the agitation of the parth was so great and the criations so tremendous, that the shock even under the river three up his large under from the mo oring which as he tormed it acted as if it was swimming on the surface of the water, that immediately upon this most extraordinary concussion the siver rose at once nearly fourty feet, at in a moment subsided, at which instant it he suw of as much of the southeastern part of the city as the darkness would permit with the whole conceurse of buildings of every size and height sink down beneath the outskirts of the great lake and at the same time every one of the boats and vessels within sight were drawn into the cavaty or the lake which he supposed instantly closed upon them in frightful waves in as much as not the loant sign of a treek was seen after the disaster. He says that any persons who do not believe it, can make soundings of that part of the lake and they ill discover buildings under the water."

after the disacter. He says that any persons who do not believe it, can make soundings of that part of the lake and they 'Il discover buildings under the water."

June herselfthen went on;
"We had not been long in the partly flooded area of northern Abbieunn, when felt a shock of some kind produced by the flood, which however was lees violent that the concussions the night before, the waters rushed on up higher, and all of us for a time remained up to our waists in water, though all of us had gotten upon a small platform above the street at some distance from the river with the ruins of many intervening houses to break the force of the flood. At this time we all all took notice that y the waters were rising so impetiously that some ships were teing forced into the streets of the flooded city. The flood we could see was rushing on at terrific sweep carrying away whole swarms of wooden buildings, and throwing down the remainder of the ruins in such sort that it was justly dreaded Abbicann would now meet the same fate which a few weeks ago had taken Heidi quantion and other cities. We were all in a suchitia such a situation now that we did not know which way to turn, we were faint from the constant fatigue we had undergone with a whole night of not sleep, and we had not yet broken our fast. Yet this had not so much effect upon us as the unxiety we had of getting out of such a horrid place of death. And we were in the most greatest danger. We determined to go and learn if possible if there was a way out of the ruins. We proceeded with some hazard tothe large space before a ruined athedral hich also had been thrown down. Passing through this section which we only alightly flooded, we found it full of wreckage of every description, even of night coaches, wagons; autos, horses and mules and auto trucks, deserted by their drivers, and attendants. From this dangerous square we found our way through a long steep and vide street, Here we me the weens of horror, which exceeded all we can think of, but all was stillness in street, Here we met new scenes of horror, which exceeded all we can think of, but all was stillness in deaths. There was not even the sound of a sigh, or a groun, and we could not hardly take a step without treading on the dead, we expected here to at leant meet with some survivors who would be crying over the deaths of their relations or dreeded all vass silent. It was a street of annihilation, In some places lay carriages, wagons and even autos, with their musters, horses, drivers, and riders almost crushed inpieces or buried almost out of sight in the ruins. What struck us most was to see many mothers with children or infants in their arms, buried under rubpish, or even women and children richly dreesed, with also priests, and friars and gentlemen of all kinds either in the same horrid exposed condition or entirely or almost entirely buried. Those seen had their backs and bodies broken, with many great stones on their bodies. We came across an orphan asylum where all the children we felt sure were alost all buried in the rubbish, but there was not a sound, for they shad all perished with the rest. At length we arrived to the spot opposite to the school I used to go to before I and my parents moved north, and finding this as well as all the other buildings blown or thrown down, and seeing the flood was ever rising foot by foot overy hour, we thought it was high time to hurry and get out of reach if possibles in less than an hour we reached an International house, kept by the city auxthorities, near a big city burying ground, about a half a mile from my own part of the city, where persons of many nations usually gather. This building has leveled to the first story, and it was or had been a five story structure,."

pld any of the city that might have been spared from the flood burn?" asked Starring. "Yee, and an awful fire it was. We were in the city for a whole day and night before we get out, and as soon as it grew dark, we were harrified by observing a terrific glare in the sky that we have never seen before, or at least I had never seen in my life. The whole city north of a not to reched so far by the flood was in an autil conflagration, and the glare was so bright that the very stretch of the flood and a good section of the lake was lighted up. It looked as if the city not touched by flood was on fire inat least a thousand different places at once, and after we had left we had hured the fire heard the fires had continued to burn for many days altogether without it intermission, and there was no one that livedthat could have stopped its progress. It was an awful fire."

"It must have been" said gtarring. "For from the nature of the ruins , observed the fire had consumed everything the flood and the shocks had not destroyed."

"what caused the fire I wonder?" asked Angeline Richee.

"hat caused the fire I wondert" asked Angeline piches.

"I could never learn but believe the forest fire had struck it somewhere," said Jame. "Some believe it was caused by that strange cloud of fire that the explosions hurled upon portions of the city, but I believed there were other causes, which occur ing all the same time, will surely account for the prodigious havoc it made. The forest fire that had kept me worried all the time since I heurd of it coming did strike parts of the city not hit by the flood from the northwest, and the conflagration quickly spread to the neighboring houses, and there being joined by the fires starting through other causes among the ruins increased to such a degreeo, that it easily destroyed the whole section of the city not swept ways by the flood, as it met with no interration. But six what would appear am almosth; incredible to you were the fact moreotorious and proble is that immediately after the diseaster, gangs of hardened plandelinian soldiery were buelly at work in setting fire to those buildings, which stood some chance of escap ing the general destruction. I cannot understand what could have made them do such ricked things, except to add to the horror and confusion, that they might by this means have the better opportunity of plundering the ruins with security. But there was no need for the enemy to go through all this trouble, for they could have easily have done all their vandallism without it, since the whole city of population is believed to have been annihilated within that ten or fifteen minutes that night, that I believe not a soul except us remained in it, escepting those dity scoundrels, and other roving clandelinians of the same stam. I believe it was possible some of them might have had now there motives besides robbing, as one in being particularly apprehended they say he was a foreigner, confessed at the gallows that he had set fire to the ruins of an orphan asylum with his ornhand, at the same time glorying in the action, and d-claring with his last brea

"I heard, and read,,, "" said Starring "That the whole number of persons that perished including those who were burned of evept away by the flood or crushed to death while in their beds is supposed on the loswest lowest calculation to ammount to more than eight million, and though the damage in all respects cannot and never will be computed. I suppose, jet you may form some idea of it, when you know this extensive city is now whothing but was what has been, that there were no survivors. Do you may child believe that such a horrible thing has happened."?

That is hard to tell, said _ane." It may take many years before such news can be confirmed. Fut in order that you may partly realize the swful havoc that has been made, will mention one more instance among the many that have come under my notice. This I witnessed myself during the first explosion from the window of my bedroom. My bedroom window faced a high arch passageway, fronting the last door of an ernormous galace, on the left hand was the famous pribunal Building, and on the right of the street many houses ten and fourteen stories high. The street was wide but did not provent the disaster I saw. At the first shock, numbers of night roving people who were then passing under the arch, fled to the middle of this street for shelter, those in the dwellings who were awakened, and as many as had time to get out did the same... Then came the first awfulest explosion of all, and at that instant the big arched way, with the front of the two ernormous buildings, and all the skyorapers all inclined one tward the other, with the sudden violence of the shock felll down, and before my very eyes every soul as they were standing here in the widdle of even that wide street were buried under a mountain of rubbish and wreckage."

"Rell whatever may be the facts of your statements said starring," the portion of the the earths nurface that was convolsed by the snocks of these consul explosions is estimated by many various newspapers, books, and magazines, and by many persons in general who experienced them in all directions and in every city and town, to have been four times greater than the whole extent of our distant friendly countries, gurope and Asia. The shocks felt ike air vibrations also were felt not only in parts of Angelinia and Angeline vine states but in Flandclinia, and Abbicannia they were one third as violent. All Culverinia was shoken nearly as violent.....

At a place about twenty four miles away from Angelinia Agathia city, (Calverinia) the side of a great mountain elipsed down from the shock, and the entire villiage of wenton with all its inhabitants, upwards of I8,000 in number were buried under that awalmache."

of the westward as the Being in Deenean Tellands, of st Johns, Catherine leic, and Rebonnia Ieland, where the tide which relaily rises about three fee t, was suddenly elevated about fourty feet, the water being at the same time agitated as if a storm was raging. Even the lengigloemean Creatures were terrified, and kept in the sky or in the waters for days afraid to return to land, and this not only in the islands but they fled from Calverinia and Hengall state. Twurd the north est in Abbieannia State the shock was noticed as far as Concentinia Province, whose great in Luna lakes rivers, cities and towns were all disturbed with enough force to drive all the people out of bed and into the streets in panic. Tward the east it extended to Abyssinkile to Porndoia, risonlongolia, he where houses swayed as if a cyclone order loos. Loose and in notthern Amgelinia State the waters of all the rivers ruse and fell repeatedly, Tward the scutheast, the shock was sensibly felt throughout the flat forested country of calvernina, in jessica city, and in pig Cirl knool, and along the country side of the Mic-nollester Run. I even heard that at sea, one hundred and ten miles west of Vivian Wickey, ships were strained as if they had struck on rocks, the seams of the decks opening, and the many compasses were upset.

On board a war ship one hundred and twenty miles south of the pelngiglomenean Islands the shock was so violen t as to tose men up perpendicularly from the decks. The great sea wave proor produced by the concussion rose along the whole southern and western cousts of Calverinia and Angelinia, and the eastern coasts as well, and at Vivian Wickey it is stated to have risen to a height of sixty five feat.

At Angeline junction on the north western coast of Angelinis gtate, the tide rose and fell a hundred times in rapid succession. At gertrude Angeline City, where the

At Angeline Junction on the north western coast of Angelinia gtate, the tide rose and fell a hundred times in rapid succession. At gertrude Angeline City, where the small ebb and rlow of the tide is six feet, it being low tide at the time in all probabilities, the great wave rolled in sevety feet f high, and at once not only raised the level of the water many feet above high vater mark but flood gertrude Angeline city destroying many "chouses along the shore. This immense tide rushing into the city caused great damage beyond comparison, and several other large cities along the coast were similarly flooded.

The tide was also suddenly raised on the southern coast of Abbiemnia, the shock was sensibly felt at Andrean Island, and a sudden rise in the waters followed almost immediately after.

That is what was reported" said STarring" and all these tend to show that the convision which produced this greatest of all disasters must have its origin. from some other gource then a natural eruption or an earthquake, and that the disturbance was more violent than any carthquake ever estimated and far more sudden. The shocks continued only for fifteen minutes, and yet all that destruction was done. This catastrophe will long be thought of as the most disasterous of all, because its force was spent on a big popullous capital city of abbieannia, where national and, nternation commerce, and travel and all railroad centers, and show houses, and every convence convenience made the facts conspicious at once. Artists will paint, and aurthors will write of its horrors for many centuries to come. The scene of the disappearing part of the city under the shore of take lake Angeline where so many were in their beds and drowned lke rats in a trap is and will ever be considered one of the most dramatic and terrible incidents in the whole historynof all disasters.

STAPLING TIMES THE EFFECTS OF THE EXPLOSION SHOCKS, AS FAR AS ABBIEANNIA, CALVENINIA, AND AN ULIMIA STATE.

Sterring continued the conversation saying;

"The concussions of these awful shocks produced by the explosions, though said to have

"The concussions of these awful shocks produced by the explosions, though said to have been felt in Abbieannia and Angelinia tate were not as violent as as felt in pengull tate and calverinia. The portion of the Vivian Hills in Rengull state I read were devastated by the shocks, and the whole of this zone of disturbance appoared to be connected with the great explosion horror around Abbieann and at Adelehanida."

"It seems strange for shocks to have reached so far" said the captian" but it is absolutely sure. I have mys if on the maps traced the extent of this concussion, which in its worse effects throughout pengull state, and parts of calverinia extended from each to west not only to within a short distunce beyond the shore of the Calverinian and Mic-II Whirthian seas, to getrude Angeline City and Wivian Wickey, but so far an one can juage, twarm the planging comencian islamas, and also the boyking satings and through the region of the Catherine Islaes in this wast region the shocks were most visitent in _encall ctate and Captral Calverinia." violent in pengal 1 state and Central Calverinia."

"From the a way Abbicann is wiped out, that seems evidently true." said starving. "The first news of the disaster told that the concussion had destroyed the town of La Polama and that a 11000 limished the disaster. The snock was left throughout all of Calverinia, and it extended upon the other side of the Angeline Vine State, to Angelinia Agathia, Jessicia, and the Abyssinkilian mainland. The highland in the neighborhood of Fig GirlKnool was violently convulsed by this shock. The earth shock in secondary motion with each explosion, and the reports that the earth there endulated likea sea, portions being raised from eighteen to fourty feet aboe above their former level, and then depressed as far below it seems improved. Yet it is stated that the level, and then depressed as far below it seems approved. Yet it is stated that the concussions caused the opening of great fiscures in the river discs, whence water u issued and flooded the land. Even Vivian Wickey experienced a hundred succession of secondary shocks for fifteen minutes, and nearly two thousand houses were everthrown, the enemy and besigging armies were thrown into constemnation, and the sea rose so high as to flow flood the new front of the city..."

"That part of the news access unformede" said the captian, 2" but, do not doubt it neverbhelesses. I heard the coast line of take Angeline in the northeast boundary line of Bengall state was also viblently shaken, and that the force of the explosions formed large openings in many places in the ground, from which were ejected loth of water and and. A large river was draied at Aldeen, whe while near the same place, near the lake, a large piece of land sank down was and was totally submerged, drowning two omall viblaces and all their inhabitants. Sixty square miles of the coart subsided. It was said that one small mountain sank down untill its summit only remained visible, while another dea disappeared altoscher. Several other hills were cine. visible, while another doe disappeared altogether, geveral other hills were cont. were rent asunder, and chasms from thirty to sixty feet wide were forced near and connecting with the craters by the force of the explosions. The many towns upon the land that subsided were overflowed, and one was submerged upward of twenty foot. he districts of Mullementt, were also agitated very much by these successive second may shocks. It was reported that the undulations of the ground was quite visible, and It was with great difficulty that soldiers on guard in camps could keep to their ist, and the camps were thrown sown. The town of Idrave was overthrown, and when the board of the Inhabitants were said to have been breahed in the rules. governed named of the inhabitants were said to have been crushed in the rulne, goveral other smaller towns and villiague shared a similar fato... At a great mobelization camp a fort withinto towers and walls fell to the ground in a mane of rulne, and even at purner much further to the west, the great fortification of gt inn, was eventhrown."

"When went to inspect one of the explosion craters, said starring, I came to the hills in the neighborhood of abbieum west, and observed that several large masses of rock and earth and forest debris were detacted and hurled into the vulleys but neverthelesses the newertheless of the landaux areas and results. but neverthelexes the appearance of the landscape around was otherwise not much injured. The sustain channel of a stream which hame; countries which flows through this region tward the Arronburge Run, sank to a depth of five to seventeen and twenty five feet near the region of Adeleheid lying to the northwest to St John, and from ten to twenty feet in the other parts of the channel. The fortifications and the town of Also Aronburger north of Adeleheidwere at the same overflowed, having sunk down so muches that only the tops of the houses and even the walls remained visible above the water after the shocks, which however at this section had not thrown a over any of the buildings, nut I discovered a tract of land, over three or four thousand square miles in area, was at the same time so much depressed, according to many reports which were confirmed, that the waters of some big rivers and inland lakes rushed in, and converted it inct a large lagoon, whis inundation overwhelmed many villages and towns and there remained above the water little more than the upper parts of the town which having sustained no injury, afforded temporary shelter to the inhabitants, who escaped

This occurance seems to be the more remarkable from its having happened so far from the explosion area," said one of the rangers. The nearest site of most terrific disthe explosion area, said one of the rangers. The nearest size of most terrific distance is at a distance of upwards of two hundred miles from abbieann, inthe south custern corner of nengall State. The strange phenomena which resulted from this terrific terrific disaster are highly instructive. They illustrate the manner in which similar interchanges of land o and sea many have been produced in other parts of the country by the effects of the tremendous explosions but of which no record yet has been obtained. There are also manifold traces of suspensive similar depressions on the shores of take Min-pollester. The force of the explosions might have undermined so much land as to pru produce effects similar to natural earthquakes. The city of Lateri suffered severely, a considerable portion of it having been almost blown into epots where as of the explisions occured, and the town had been almost blown into the air. A large part of the town of Contendor was destroyed by the same explision in the same way, and some mountains in its neighborhood were thrown down by the con cussion. At game town, the concussion of the explosion was attended also by a strange fire cloud and a violent gust of wind. Also from the sudden and though secondary concussion a mountain in the neighborhood was apparently cleft in twain, and one of the main halfs sank down considerably and buried a villiage under it.. If ny Many houses were blown down in the town and many neighboring villiages, and the lose of lives lives never will ve known. The Ban galnketburg Peninsula was violently shaken, and three hundred severe secondary shocks were reported to have been felt at mindedule in fifteen minutes, and as many at Ricksenville. The center of the disturbance the reports reporters said seemed to have been in mental State, where the shocks were acompunied by as many loud thundering explosions. May housed were everthrown at Ricksenville, and at other places. All of the Central parts of Calvarinia were severely shaken, particularly in and around the Big Girl Knool egion two hundred miles south of Abbieum. The succession of shocks were said to have continued for sixteen minutes a hundred secondary shocks per minute, the earth andulating like a storm tossed sea.

idount alverine in the neighborhood an extant volcane let loose an avaien avalanche of rocks and stones down her slopes and the burying of two towns occured there. Hany houses were overthrown in Heardick and the neighboring villiages, for a circuit of, more than fourty miles one villiage was engulfed, by the big flood, and the loss,,, loss of life was unestimated but severe,...."

"I can relate much more declared Starring. "I know it is reported that all of the central parts of Calvorinia was violently shaken, but the greatest concussion have have comes between rengal and Diny tates. Hany good sized cities were evertured, and no one can say yether not whether all of the inharitants regished or not great rents were formed in the ground, and even in the solid rocks. All witnesses say that the waters of Lake Angeline was much agitated during the commettion. Yen Even Mt Joan and its very neighborhood was violently convised convulsed. The secondary shocks were quite noticed, and great landslipes took place from the big mountain and did immense damage, thirty small villiages being overthrown, with much loss of life. Even all of the bi, state of Angalinia was considerably disturbed by the uwf I concussion . There were repeated accommany phocks felt at Angellain Arathia and a number of the concussions were severe. The shocks to the come degree were felt at porothy Gale, and Jossica and its neighborhood were severely shaken simultaneously and thousands of houses were overthrown.

"That seems unusual but it the reports are true it will be more unusual yet" said the captian. I was at Angelinia Agathia, near midnight June the First, and the shocks proved somewhat calculations. I noticed shocks were repeated at quick intervals for nearly a quarter of an hour, and nearly one quarter the number of the houses were somewhat damaged or overthrown, and a number of the inhabitants killed .. Large masses of rock were detuted from it pickeonia and many houses were crushed by their full. I heard that halfvof the remainder of the city of Heidi Junction was destroyed by the consessions and twenty two thousand of its inhabitants buried in the ruins. Then the ensue ing flood des p destroyed the rd rest of the town and killed nearly all the population. courteen big fourts in the vinicity were so completely swallowed up that not a trace of their wreckage could be discovered. The concussions and ensueing floods worked similar havor in the neighboring towns and villiages, and the entire loss of life caused by the two almost su simultaneous catastrophes is not known.

I heard a large portion of the city of Lucillie Ricksen was affected if not totally I neard a large portion of the city of nucleif access, was alreaded in not destroyed, causing much lose in human life, and great distress among the surviving inhabitants. Loud rumbling noises more like in the sky preceded every shock which continued for the same length of time. It was said more than a third of the city was totally destroyed. The great St Michaela Cathedral fell, burying however no one in its ruins as it happened nto be night and no one was in it. Most of the inhabitants fled the city at the beginning of the flood, and then scarcely a house in the city was not injured to some degrees or loss. ortunately the inhabitants then encamped in the hills, so that there was no such fatality as during the shocks, when a great many perished, eleven thousand six hundred being recovered from the ruins. The Michael Cathedra and the state of the state Hollester city was also spriously affected, and here the havor was fearful by both the shocks and the floods, about nearly a million houses being destroyed, and many thousands of people killed. In the town of nosana not one house was left standing and all of the inhabitants were taken out of the ruins dead.

The confusion which prevailed in the neighborhood of Mic-Hollester City owing to the nature of the frightful war raging close to the place for several months, was still further increased by these conclusions which did so much damage to property, and caused the death of many people. A claudelinian fleet of river warships was then anchored close to the city, and the waters of the ernormous river were agitated enough by the shock to lead to a request being sent to the Glandelinian admiral by the comm commander of one of his ships, that he might get notice of an attack by some christian fleet. of fleet came. The concussion caused the death of two thousand persons in the riset. O liest came. The concussion caused the death of two thousand persons in the city of Slorinia, yet the town of chamberstor suffered the most severely, and of all its houses not one was left fit for habitation. A great many villiages in this may be borhood was destroyed, and nearly all the inhabitants were made homeless and destitute. Be ause of the enemy, and the flood, and combining forest fires, no one could come to to their relief, and although the shock had also been very severe upon the opposite neighborhood near glorianna, it was from the there that the first boutload of provisions, tents, and timber were dispatched to be saized by the enemy. Hore than five thousand persons perished in this part of the disaster, an as the population of the villiages were annihilated, and among the survivors over fir risteen thousand were more orviess severely injured. As it was impossible for the survivors to clear away the ruins, the town aurthorities had to be content with alling down the walls which were still standing, and to prevent a plague they spread posions over the layor layer of stone and lime beneath under which more than a scores of thousands of corpses were believed to be still it lying of course all of the country was said to be severely agitated, and again there was n one hundred and fifty persons killed in the town of Perkins. The shock was also felt as fur south as Angeline Junction, which though less severe caused great alarm, and at the same time the count of Angelinia state was much distribed, and the town of Handersburg was a good deal injured, and the houses of Point Furn was again were again much damaged, while the town of central was cald to have been completely destroyed ... The series of secondary concessions, wrought torrible havor in gertrude Ab Angellne City. The first blocks however were the olight est, but the last with the accompanying soulds of thunder in the distance did the most injury, and the uncertainity of the danger and the cause was much alarming, ospecially when the sea swamped and flooded the city also. During the prevalence of these many accordary convus convulsions, the people for the most part fled out of their homes and for the rest of the night and the day camped out on higher elevations, and thus it happened that the flood from the cf y sea, although doing most immense durage damage to property did not kill many people. The total loss to human life was not known, but o thide the city a great number of cattle on swamed farms perisjed the great death rate among the latter, being due to the fact that at night the animals were housed nder the lower stories of the cow burns or in roughly built sheds in the fields. The towns of perdrame, and perpool were completely wee ked, and the inhabitents a reare living even under any shelter they can put up, mats, boards, ld clothes, or bounds of trees. "Such Such de descriptions seem exaggerated, but it may possibly be so" said Starring.

"But nevertheless the whole of nengall State, and central Calverinia felt the severest,, of the shocks, for in these sections every house in every town and city was leveled to the ground, and every public building, bridge, and work of masonry as was destroyed. The loss by flood fell mostly on planters, and manufacturers, All kinds of farming cultivation was destroyed and famine threatens calverinia, All the largest factories of in all in Abbieunn were totally destroyed with their machiner; fifteen hundred railroad lines were wiped out, and the villiages erected by the farming communities destroyed teyond redemption. Abbicann is entirely destroyed, as we can see, scarcely a building in the portions of the city left to view escaping more or less injury and almost almost all burned. In all about three or four thousand cities were completely demolished, The loss of life is unusual are than all our battles made t put together on each side of fighting combined. Abbieann is the center of the horror. And the enemy is to blame but we cannot yet find evidence. what do you think about it Jane!" "I think if it is true you'll find evidence yet." she replied.

THE FIERY TOUCH OF HATURE

THAT STARFING AND THOSE WITH HIM IN THE EXPEDITION FINDS.....

STAPING now was in probably the heart of the region where the greatest of all calamities he had ever seen, had fullon upon calverinia, and her sister states. He wrote down in his dairy stating that the disaster as far as he cun comprehend is most complete, that as a city Abbieann has ceased to exist, and that no war or catastrophe before in the past put together has ever brought on such a loss of 11 e life as in this city, not mentioning the whole countryside swept to destruction as it was. He was firmly regolved to hold to the opinion of his believe that ever 10,000,000 to thirty million people may have lost their lives, and that over fifty to a hundred million are a were and are still homeless, and facing all kinds of complications of horrors, starvation, disease, the perils from the enemy and forest fires, and the various weathers of winter and sammer. The situation was more than he cold comprehend, and though there is even from the start the most urgent need of all kinds of comprehend, and though there is even from the start the most urgent need of all kinds of the contained and though the lower of the could be forthcoming.

And what vorried him most was that the governer of Culverinia while expressing his thanks for the marked success in his work so far informed starring by telegram that Pundora and even the whole of Culverinia is still throttened.

Curinn'to every of Culverinia given repageting Starling the fort of the process of reasons in the work so far instructions of the process of the communication in he can as soon as possible, so that the results of the process of the communication in he can as soon as possible, so that the results and one appairing a form in all calverinia. STAP: ING now was in probably the heart of the region where the greatest of all calamities in calverinia.

The Governor stated that the En peror himself has directed the department of the Trackury of war and of the many to take such measure for the relief of those scores of millions of people as lie within their executive alsoration, and he earnestly commended this case of when earnestment disaster to the generous consideration of the great christian general Starring.

This seemed an errand that garring had not been sent out by violet and her sisters, out out of human kindness and sympathy for the affilieted starring did not intend to refuse, for he had a terrifire terrifile realization of a most stypendous calamity to oven be impending, and that the whole nation needed to prepare to meet a still most appalling situation with unbounded sympathy and generousity. He knew that even at the first sayful news it made the nation the leadeder in the movement to relieve and succor as far as possible the hungry and homeless survivors of one of the worlds most greatest of all disasters known, and to care for the cick, and injured that increased terribly in numbers with each report from pointecof refuse, besides to have to keep an eye on the enemy too. Even from the beginning of the disaster in November 1912 untill these of now the Abblesmian covernments has been continually characterized by the promptness and liberality that distinguished the Abbisamian people.

Even now still the Abbisami people actining as individuals or communities were still continually engaged in the work of raising funds, and supplies, and from one end to the other of the nation the appeals of relief committees always met with quick and liberal responses.

Even when the news was finally spread broadcast the hereible calvegrainian disasters

Even when the news was finally spread broadcast the hervible Calverinian disasters likewise struck a symputhic chord throughout other nations, and within a few days from the time the first news of the awful Abbieann horror was recieved, the sufferers rrom the time the first news of the awful Abbigann horror was recived, the sufferers with sead the grand and onobling spectacle of the entire civilized world rushing to their relief. One big fiery touch of nature caused by the enemy had made the whole world kin. The Governor of Calvernia to which the population of the stricken state belongs releved many messages of conditioned and amnouncements of contributions from the rulers of other states, but not one of these was more touching than that wirl written by Starring hi in his reply to the Governors rlead; He cabled as follow s, as cable was the only means of communitions,

"Pandora, Calverinia,

I pray your Excellency to accept my profound sympathy, in the appelling calamity which has come upon the people of Calverinia, and which cause and result I am now investigating for the good and safty of the cause. I had been many wooks before profoundly profoundly moved by the news of the terrible catastrophe which had overtaken Abbigann profound: moved by the news of the terrible catastropie which had overtaken Accident and the whole of central and southern Calverinia, and which has costs the lives of I nearly as many soldiers as petished in the battles just past. While I am performing my dangerous work here in Abbisum and vinicity, May Almaghty God and His Elessed Hother confert the hearts of those that weep for their irreparable losses, and aid me to succeed in my efforts for discovery as to the cause and blame of the calumity.

I begine the accept my warm thanks for the complision you have offered to me, and I like the comply to your pleas as far as possible for my own good as well as to the good of the cause.

Your Loving friend And servant. General Walter Heidi Starring. General vivians assistant.

Starring before he would proceed on his adventure looked over his list of those of other nations which had rendered aid to the stricken of Calverinia and her sisters and other provincial states. The Czar and Empress of the mation of Protestentia he saw in his records had telegraphed to meeror Vivian, that they shared with him a liver lively sympathy and feeling of grief at the great catastrophes that Calverinia was suffering and stated they believed that Glandelinia was becoming a danger to the hole world in granul and that something ought to be done to bring her to her

The King of Blomlinia Count y had a unmoned the Abbienumian Ambassador to his own Palues, and expressed to him his keen sorrow on hearing of the grant Abbicann disaster and also suggested that Glandellini should be made to pay if she was guilty for, it. He also requested that he be kept well informed regarding the details of the enemys ways and of the disaster and it foult are. It is to eather the disaster and it foult are.

King Handon of Mormonula gave the same ammount. Even the frightened people of all the neighboring of ties and towns of the same state were the first to do what they could to give practical rollof. The fleeing services from the vinitity of Applicant took retuge in the largest numbers in the far northern cities. This is the letter that Starring had recieved from the Universitian governor to which he had answered;

To General Starring; My dear sir;

"This concentration of refugees in every one of our northern cities and towns threaten threatens a calamity as direful if not worse, than the explosion herrors, and the flood disaster at Abelgann and throughout central Calverinia, for unless they should be quickly provided with food they would surely periah. A number of correspondents who came to Pandora at the time, total of the conditions of the people still mable to leave the disaster district. They are on a verge of staryation, fear of the enemy and the changes of the weather for the seasons, and the forest fires which threaten to wipe out the little the floods have left them. Many of the refugees coming into the city of Pandora to day are badly burned having been almost overtaken by fires. The city of Pandora and also other big places have become cities of v of mourning. There is not a single refugee famil family in either that has not ne or more members who had not perished in the disaster. The distraught crowds block the star streets. Thousands are given shelter in big factories and schoolhouses and Cathedrals, and every public clace is filled with them. The sight of even old men crying bitterly as they walk, and "This concentration of refugees in every one of our northern cities and towns threatens are given shelter in big factories and schoolhouses and Cathedrals, and every public place is filled with them. The sight of even old men crying bitterly as they walk, and of women collapping of hysteric in the streets is even though very common more than the real inhabitants of the city can bear. Fou cannot look at them. Great fits and convalsions of weeping sweep over the throngs untill everythmember in the dense throngs are inn in tears.

Frantne, fear of the forest fires, the enemy, and the winter weather too redoubles the the misery. The neighboring cities and towns are doing all they can, but the food qui question is desperate, so ernormous are the masses of the refugees who must be caredded cared for. Hone of those who have crowded in Pandora has any idea of returning to the cities so wantonly destroyed. It is more than doubtful if Abbieann will ever again bb rebuilted. I do no longer a city, and certainly no one whi who is in calver inia will ever live there after with seing the scenes that are all about us.

If you can open and restore communication on your own line of route I will appreciate our work very much.

Starring however could not understand how boatloads of provisions from other sections could reach the disaster districts when flood and forcet fires and other horrors cut off communications by boat and train. The terrors of fune confronted the whole state because of the dinaster, even though kind hearts and open hands were trying to provide succor. Thugh the great Abbicannian Covernment had brought its matchless resources into play that did not do any good so far as the endargered ones could not be reached. Even the River "qual Tugs and other boats, which had been sent speeding tward the disaster zone loaded with stores for the refuses in the disaster zone in the disaster zone in the disaster zone in the middle of june had never returned even now By order of the Emperor the national Treasury Department was instructed to co-operate, which meent the employment of every ship of good northern towns and the medical officers of the marine hospital service, and the army were to be withdrawn from military service to aid the refugees of the disaster, and these could not even now reach the scene, and only got as far as grancis Atlanta, and was barred the rest of the way by waters of the still raging floods floods, interfered with by the enemy, or stopped by the forest fires, and other complications....

The partiese Department with its well organized supply departments, was regarded as in better position than any other nate national institution that to take charge of the relief measures, and what could it do when there was no means of transportation qualities when all communications was impossible.

The Secretary of the Abbicann Mays, had immediately telegraphed orders to the captions of various ships, to ship all supplies to be offered them, and to sail at the earliest posible moment for the districts that were in dire wart. They were also authorized to extend relief to other sections if they found any necessity in doing so.

These ships never came back, remaster general, commissionary general, and surgeon the adjutant general, quartermaster general, commissionary general, and surgeon general, were charged by the Secretary war Hanson, with the arrangement of that part of the relief measures portaining to the war Department. Also efficial orders were dictated for the gundiance of the threees supply departments, giving the sceme of distribution as follows;;;;

Three chief medical officers, with over fifty millions of dellars of medical attrees, act... one or .wo subsistence officers, with over seventy five million dellars stores, act... one or .wo subsistence officers, with over seventy five million dellars worth of stores, consisting of every food material on the market, one officer or maybe many of the quartermenters department, with 100,600,600 worth of cluthing supplies, for mostly only women and children. The orders directed that those officers and stores be sent on ships. They were sent on June the last it is now nearing the and of Sepatember and they have not been hard from yet. That happened!!!!!!!! The character of the Emperors instructions to the departments concerned in the relief? work may be gative gathered from the n x n text of the following ince letter, which was delivered to the Secretary of the wavy, after the pureers had heard of what caused

Indee d Emperor Vivian had been so eager to sot the treemendous work of relief in sotlon, and to have the disunter invostigated us far as possible, that his Royal Cabinet had difficulty to restrain him from going ahead in advance of what was hoped for of restored communications. He had orders cutting all red tap into shreds already, for the army and navy and all shipping departments to utilize all the supplies they had on hand with the utmost speed forthe reals su expedition, when Count De Biff found it

He had been even in his earlier due a resident of the city, and now howers the most picturesque city of the Calveriain State had of the city, and now in where the most picturesque city of the Calverinian State had stood, he and his followors found only a perfect headomb of wrickage, birned boild ings, and natural immense fineral pyres of charred bodies of heamon beings and also animals. The scone was more appulling, then the desolation of Adeleheid, for in the latter city the victims were buried at of eight entirely, beneath the wreckage of the buildings, while in Abbleann they were to be seen in every conciseable position, lying us they were killed, in buildings partly standing but wells torn out, and the wreckage of fallen buildings or in any place and in anywhere where the Read Explosion death dealing horror overtook them. And Starring also was surprised to have heard and even to know that among the first of any vescel to reach the scene, and which braved every danger know that among the lirst of any vescel to reach the scene, and which braved every dan of the trip even in the work of rescueing refusees from forest fires, and still facing dire poril, was the Mary Jame the very ship of which captian he amployed. No other vessel had even so much as dared to precede the Mary Jame, and so from no other source but from the Mary Jame could come any grahic description of the sights and scenes in the stricken country and the city itself.

And the members of his party were only two real military officers, the Rangers of whom each number took turns for each day out, some Volcano Scientists which were or much value at that, and others.

Starring had now been in this vinicty for four days and all this time partial darkness overhung the town, ever since the Mary Jane entered the roadstead of the city, ow owing to the pull of forest fire smoke which rested above the scene long seas of clouds forwarning the approach of a great storm; the coast wriver front was alive with all kinds of wreckage floating past, and at times the water was even now filled with w swollen bodies and masses of debris from the wrecked houses from the upper parts of

They had first entered the city from what had been the scene of the main shipping and had remained in for four days, and then went on board the board, for a day or two and then were in the city again. Her the curve of the river, several small houses were found but little injured, but their occupants had all perished. They had apparently died from suffocation, or by the shock of the blasts. They were not burned, and some were found sitting in ositions as easy and as natural as though still living come were lying in bed half so skeletons all of them. The extreme northeastern section of the city which was thought to have perished altoegether without even a sign of a house remaining was found to have escaped almost entire. The flood of waters stopped and turned remaining was found to have escaped almost entire. The Flood of waters stopped and thread added within two hundred feet of this section of the city.

Starving and all with him went through all the principal streets of this part of Abbisann, including central Avenue, Abbisann Avenue, and Crossroads Street. The residents residents or residences on upper Abbisann were utterly annihilated instead of spared as the note said. The lower section of the northwestern part was still swimming in flood waters. Complete destruction had fallen upon all parts not even touched by the lived waters. Complete destruction has laiden upon all parts not even founds by the flood, and the wreckage of many houses not belonging to Abbleann had been swept down into the level below. Starring believed that the upt uproving, twisting, and breaking of the trees was such as might have occured in a tornado. The trees were all lying bent tward the south, what astonished the party most however was the comparatively small number of bedies found, and yet it is known that probably the whole population had parts bedieved.

perished. He said;
"It is written in the news that some 30,000,000perished in Abbieann alone. Evidently Evidently millions of bodies were created by the fires smouldering for weeks in the wrockuse or of those who were swept away by the floods. Indisputable evidence of his has been found. In numerous cases of parts of bodies which we or others of our follwers have found the rest were consumed. It is believed that the majority of the people died in the ruins and those who may have sunaied to escape into the streets up here, were killed by the positionous smoke harled by the explosions. This has been indicated by many of the corpses, many of which we have discovered with their hands lifted to their mouths, as though to avoid sufficiation."

The whole clustry has suffaring from the general demoralization, Decause of the disaster the whole nation was inder a most formible strain, and showed the results..... At every other disaster clusted linium prisoners of all kinds had been brought to the wrecked cities and present into service, shy not here! Indeed it seemed as if the whole of Calverinia was totally demoralized, and it was almost impossible to preserve order unfor the awfulling are unformed by the service of the control of circumstances.

"The only living persons who we believe have come through the disaster alive are those who were in this river roadstead on some of these ships said Starring." "Yes and it is repule that many has hemores from the seighboring districts the second of the still semaining flood were lost in a maddened remaining rised whe had seen which they determined in small scatts. From some of the garvivers it is laurned I presides that in the income punic, which attended the forest fires the people seized pon even the frailest boats to get away. In this way I am same lost who might otherwise have been saved." Talks with garvivors of the disaster had confirmed the awful sudlenges of the catastrophe. The explosions must have occured near the edge of one of the forest fires and therefore in ernormous quantity of gus or heatened aid was harled forward the city, producing great atmospheric pressure, which overwhelmed everything before it. As hour after four went by, for time pusses even in a scene of horror, their work of investigation advanced with varying speed. Cometimes the forest fires were apparently near, and then again they would close in on the scene, darkening the path way of the explorers in the desolated city.

"It is only possible to penetrate the city from the so th" said Sturring. There the houses were more thickly built, the debris harled by the explosions have the great est depths. It is now hardening into the depths of the failed outsiting probably hiding the bodies of the countless n abers the farling buildings buried and ong lied in ir indescribably herro herrible doom."

Exacting any evidences of the rejects that cases absorbed by the bodies of the victims caused the to burst, and the flames coming in the wreckage soon afterwards combanized them. On every hand here and there the wreckure had formed immenseand and imans and horrid foneral pryes, and scenes beganing description was here and there.. In the narrow streets, in the gardens and the fields, partly covered by the deposit of explosion debris that settled after the crushes had caused followed by the whirlwind of of fire the sounds of bodies are lying. Above and beyond the present horror there was in the mind of Sturring a still greater horror. The plug o stulks in the wake of this ernormous disaster.

"It ought no lone longer be a disagreeable duty for us now" said starring. "It is a duty to the cause. The many large numbers of the dead in this city must be disposed of or the country will be given over to a o most tremendous plague that will sweep the whole world, and blot b the country of calverinia from the world entirely. put we have not the means and the material for the work. It would take a forest of wood, and a a sau of ail to help us in our plan. There are countless corpses in every direction and unless the nation soon provides means to get rid of all these bodies, a terrible plague will sweep the whole nation. It has not been possible for us of to apprough the center of the northern section of the city, and our own work has not been progress sing. It is not fame that we are neeking, nor honor, but trying to render our country a service. It would be impossible to do anything at all but for the despairing nergy of the mon who have lost family and fortune in the catastrophe. To one has any means of telling just we how many died in the overwhelming destruction of sc big a city."

"Many cities are being crwoded with countless refugees of all disasters, pust and present." said one of the fungers," and food op north also is becoming so scarce that ulars one felt that it would all be exhausted before sagelies could reach there. I have hourd that refugees from forcet fires arive by boutloads every day at Pundora. _very chip obtainable and small river coasting vessels as can be found are busy in bringing in the referees to that city. A a result of their efforts the people who flad to the hills behind the villings of Herdride, nearly four hundred thousand were brought there. They are all in a not pitabl condition imaginable, hundreds and thousands of them frightfully burned, and in argent need of modical care. And all the doctors and nurses in andora were said to be working night and day among the injured, natioted by scores or "of voluntoer nurses, many woman o of the woulthlest families of randora giving their services. Many of the refugees said, that approaches to any of the towns of the flood zone is still impossible, and that it is feared an awful famine is raging. A week ago sir, a number of steamers, including the government Vessel Rubistor, sta started from pundors for as I heard for the fleed zone. They carried government deligates, a number of marines a detatchment of regular infantry, and thirty priests and twenty name. The vennel also carried a quantity of fire wood, petroleum, and quicklime for use in the necessary cremation of the bodies of the flood victims. This ship never reached its destination. Storring took a walk up and down the shore of the river for a considerably distance, and saw the river as far as he traveled was devered with the wredage of the time, and saw the river harbons of Abblicans at the time (get your dine) of the disaster, and achors in the direction of the explosion area only a few trees, all best riverward by the force of the explosion air waves were left standing out of a gigantic forest of those days before, all consided in the firest-phile investigating this, starring noted the thickness of the forest on the opposite shore, and thought to himself, " if the forest fire ever strikes there!'ll claim the world is torning." The heat from the smoking r dus beyond was a flocating, and the stench from the corposes stream steems streets was simply dicadful. This had not been looked for but on all sides were found portions of corpses, which were still remaining all half skeletons or entire skeletons. Not a drop of rather could be had, and the darkness caused by the cloud of m smoke continued to shrout the town, and continuous rambling sounds added to the hear of the scene.

At the linding place by the river some burned and ruined walls indicated the spot where a custom house had formely stood, and traces of many larger ships shops could be seen and in that neighborhood hundreds and thousends of skeletons or half skeletons could be seen and were lying in all kinds of attitudes in their half burned beds could be reckupe showing that the victims had met death as if by a lightning sto stroke. Curiously enough, the features of those still not too totally decomposed were generally calm and reposeful, but grim plies of half skelentons were almost stacked overythere, showing that death had stiken these while they were vainly seeking escape from inside the down crushing houses.

And as a result of his inspection, granting reported to the captian of the ship, and who wrote down the reports, that crevices and valle shad been formed by the armoral force of the explosions near the northern section of the city of Abbieum... Fortunately that part of the country had not been inhabituated at the time,, but nevertheless that that kind of a change apprared to be remarkably unusual... starring also recorded down that kind of a change apprared to be remarkably unusual... starring also recorded down in writings of the fact that the dearth of provisokas provisions was beginning to be felt throughout o the country, and recorded also the numbers of the numerous families; whice which had been completely ruined by the disaster, and who were without shelter, while the means at the disposal of the galverinian aurthorities were absolutely absolutely inadequate to cope with the unusual distress.....

Though even now it was so late in September all communications were still practically cut off with alverinia, and the whole world by bout and rail, and wire and telegraph and so forth, except by stray river vessels seized upon by the inhabitants of the flood region to fleefrom the disaster zone and seek rofuse further north, and to escape also the fury of the enemy. Starring also said to the captian;

To morrow I want you to make a trip into the city and see for yourself. The desired tion is more appalling than ever the greatest descriptions of the news, and the magazines even gave. The streets are in many places ten foot deep in debris and smoking cin dark cinders, which covers countless thousands of the dead bodies, scorched black and shiny as if they had been placed into beiling litch. Hamy of the dead were not touched by the fires in the rains, and many of the bases and woodwork shattered by the concaction of the blust shows no signs of burning. At Center Street the only street navagible to some degree, in the southern portion of this northern section of the city, the city hall is still stunding as high as the third story, while the Jawinile court tailling some distance away, you can see the most magazive stone work is alclined. The chrick tower of 6t Andrews Catholic Cathedral built by the money of the people over a century ago of Cyclopean work, mostly maconry, is now like a huge heap of old metal.

The stench throughout three sections of Abbieum is terribly offensive. All the streets I have gone through are all obstracted by hulge hage riles of debris and dead bedies all half or whole shelentons by this time.

died in the field by driving, accumulate to the Angeline!" caked the caption. "ghat became of the section of the city near Lake Angeline!" caked the caption. "They say it saw microthe water." said Starving. There is save avidance of that happening. The Arbitannian State Core 1 at Punr Pundern, Signer Palema, recognized evidences of this and so did his darghter who came for the punjone to see what the evidences of this and so did his darghter who came for the punjone to see what the steens was like. Vest of the lake I hear many houses we are soon partly subserved soons water. The scene is manual more like that of a natural sarthquide. Ir investigating the spot it was found that a section of the city housing over two million

The way to Center street was almost impassable, but the next morning starting and the caption went there, followed by only Angeline Riches and Jennie Turmer. The streets leading to the central division has also almost impassable ever for one on foot but they strove to go through. The streets were filled with the trunks of trees, and general wreckage hilled hurled from the hillsides, and the debris smouldering in places were exceedingly deep. The entire hillside west of the city boked dungrous, appearing as though it might entirely collapse. From a careful inspection of a dead horse and rider is was apparent that their limbs became ridig rigid the moment they fell. The mans left leg was in the air anothough it had become stiff thile he was in the act of falling. There was seen to be mother corpse under the horse, showing only the portion of one leg.......

There was very little oder perceptible in this vinicity. This was probably due to the fact that all the exposed parts of the bodies were burned hard and arry. Starring hit one of the bodies with a stick and it sounded as though a stone had been struck. He also observed that under the fallen truck of a large oak tree many bodies lying in a perfect line in beds also arranged in line. Now those got here in this position was a appetery. The structs here only contained charred and burning romains. Starring recured some relies from one of the Cathedrals at Attieums. He took the relics for safe keeping on account of hearing that alandeliniums were really around. Starring had at last began to ake up to the fact that landeliniums were coming into the ruins, and that they were on the look out for him.

Once already he had to call his admintants to him for help in buttling off the flandelinians who were once closing in on him to capture him. Eventually about fifty of the flundelinians were shot down, and the rest dispersed. The glandelinians however still kept at work among the reins of Abbiteam keeping an eye on him, and glauring not being able to cope with the situation, athough he was doing his best, kept a watch on them too, and many were killed or wounded in the course of fights with glauring and his ands, and the landelinians were to be seen occarationally in considerable numbers. Among some of the captured landelinians was a former deputy mayor of the town of galisb ry num. These trailors were sentenced to face the firing shquads for glandelinians shadwing granting received no quarter.

Fire as mobe of starrings men tried to linch blandeliniums caught shadowing starring and others, and cries of linch them filled the air, and it absolutely was done when they were caught. Even by these landeliniums many bodies, sades and strong boxes in the rains were robbed, and spouls began to overrun the burned city, so that Starring and his followers were in constant danger. If thering crowds of pangers and soldiers on the ship rouned through sections of the city in search of these landeliniums, and causanamy justice was doubt to the vandals when they were caught red handed at their fearful work which was done on purpose to frastrate Starrings investigations, and rifle fire was heard continually.

About fourty of the claudeliniums were numbrised and cuptured, and brought before Sturring, who ordered them brought on the ship and place placed in chains in the hold and to be guarded. He decided to question their being there as he was suspicious. He was sure now Blandelinia was responsible for the disaster for why should these Claudelinium soldiers Strive so desperately and persistently to frustrate him in his work.

During the time of this excitement, the distant forest fires again resumed a more threatening aspect. On the slopes to the far mouth, three luminous seas were visible. Similar pints were observed several days before. Starrings non-showed renewed alarmation of the skirmishes with the gland linions, Starring passed a railroad station where a large pile of bedies were 1 ing face down and as if the victims had fallen while in the act of running to escape the fate impending over them.

One one wround distillory a pamity of the was found into t in casks. Outside of the skulking landelinious no other person was seen anywhere, won late as it is since the disaster, many belidings in the city and the surrounding fi dis district were still burning.

A large statue of the Virgin on her halter was harled ands distance from its base. This toegether with the fact that hage trees were torn up every where around the Cathedral and laid flat scarce one being left standing, and other existence a chard that the concessions of the explosions may have preduced air waves of extract hundrane velocity. Every house, not excepting those that were made solidly built of stone was absolutely in ruine. The streets here were piled twenty five feet high in debrie, and harden of shoteons. A large hour of bodies were observed in this ept. One house sheltered party by a tailer building escaped almost without injury. The windows of course were gone, but inside the furniture, papers, books, clothing, and the flooring run unscathed...

Starring and his investigating parties discovered suffer, and other precious metals in stores and human dwellings of the towns, ear by was mother Cathedral all down, with the exception of the loft tower, and of the Priest house the walls alone remained structure. The convent near by which confained over thirty els humans girls, and two hundred nums, had disappeared, as did the college where a hundred and fifty bous, and twenty six presits preists and professors were touching,

Starring and his followers discovered and strungs incidents, as investigations went on, paddes often were found in bed. In another house a mana skeleton was found mitting at a table with a pipe in his charred fingers and opposite him and the exceton of a child. A mothers skeleton skeleton was found with two skeleton children in her arms. Another skeleton as found with a well preserved commy in his hunder. He had been killed while Saying the gosary. All of the oldest families and generations of Abbi ann were wiped out.

Starring therefore knew that in Pandora there were many women and children so nearly starved that it was feared they might die before relief a came, and indeed Pandora and even alleverine became important centers in Galverinia bedalse of the annihilation of Abbieann which had been the greatest commercial and industrial and railway center and the point of distribution of merchandise and every article for the entire country. If Chicago and New York would both be wiped out in the inited States, the effects would be the same. AND ABBLEAUN, THE "AIN CITIES AFFECTED BY THE BIGGEST DIRACTERS OF THE WZR WAR SO FAR ...

HEVER before has the whole of Calverinia yet experienced such disasters. True there MEVER before has the whole of calverinia yet experienced such disasters, are there had been real natural froguent earthquakes in alverinia and the other Abbieunnian States, and all along the Angelinian Goasts, and also accompanying some of the cructions of their volcances, and occassionally only slight tremers have been felt in other sections but the dama s done to life and property in every instance was nil. Therefore these horrors at Abbieunnia and elsewhere because of the Abbieunn calamity took the people of the nation by surprise, and Starring himself could not understand how the city of Angelinia Agatha so many hundreds of miles from Abbieunn could have been so seriously dimensed by the same shoulds. We was there bineals on that any all distance how the duraged by the same shocks. He was there himself on that awful midnour hour when the city was rent asunder by a series of profound shocks, that curried death and destruction in its path, and at first he took had the natural inclination of believing it was a real certiquake, as the volcano called the Big Catherine Hill was in alight eraption at the titue. It was a relief of the control of the c the time. It was swidently a warning of some calentty, but Starring and the population at first suspected the volcano for the disturbance and expected tit to break out into violent action. There were twenty distinct violent shocks, but was surprised the inhabit ants most was the dull thundering roar far away to the north that proceeded each concerning.

The force of the concussions may be inferred from the case that the whole country between the two coat lines of the c States and as far north as Abyesinkile felt its power to a greater or lesser degree. Angelinia Agathia however, was unong the felt its power to a greater or lesser degree. Angelinia hatchild hatchild was in ruins apecial victims of this strungs elemental destruction. One third the city was in ruins apecial victims of this strungs elemental destruction. One third of its houses was dumaged beyond hope of repair, and one quarter was and two and destroyed. It unitabilitable for wooks. Reilroad and telegraph lines were torn up and destroyed, ir fourst forth in different soctions of the city, adding to the horror of the panic of the people, and then to make it worse a big flood inundated the city. Many hundreds of lives were lost, over 10,000 were seriously injured, and property valued at nearly five billion dollars was wreted by Insa is the balance to the city. The property was the city of the balance was wreted by Insa is the balance to the city.

THEY WERE ABLE TO JUDGE FOR THEMSELVES INDEED THE EXTENT OF THE DISASTER MORE CLOSE, Y when most of the forest fire smoke had cleared off considerably by the aid of a strong westerly wind. All the country north of Abbieum through which they had passed had been laid waste. Larre muses of all kinds of rocks had v been detathed from the mountains and obstructed the course of streams which had overflowed their benks, or changed their and obstructed the course of streams which had overflowed their bonks, or changed their cil course. Whole villinges for from Abbieann had been destroyed, and all directions still even now, rose some luma lamenations of the unfortunate inhabitants who could not get over their distress so quickly. The region over which the floods of "aters had even carried was no longer to be identified as the same, covered as it was with debris of every kind, and withat hick layer of sand and mud. The concussion of the explosions had overthorny everthrown all the houses in the towns with the exception about twenty had overthorn overthrown all the houses in the towns with the exception about twenty in the irgest town largest town, and even these were badly damaged.

All of the buildings which were made of solid concrete and iron and brick and other solid manoury including the manufer churches, were heaps of ruins, and most of the very inhabitants had perished. Starring realized more than ever that in calverinia, disaster of whis kind was invariably causing the inhabitants who could to emigrate to other constries. Old men, women and children, formed themselves in groups, and traveled through the country. They even set the drama in which they all have taken part to music and they journeyed to one villiage and another, singing or shouting the rude vorses they had composed, and then sending the hat around. Many of those who could by boat raft and so forth leave the flood regions of the couth did so but it was alow journey full of perils and exposure.

The western half of pengall State, as Starring traced on his map is also a part of the disaster center, including some of the largest and beautiful towns that have been injured or destroyed. Stretching from northwest to southeast, the strings of ruined to js and towns and villiages beginning wi with Cosejose and Veigolumu reaches well into the big flood region. On the northwestern shore of the flood region lies the town of Monotombia, while between the flood and this town is the city Maya. gix of the best towns have been literally blown up, one of these explosions being heard as far ad previously mentioned, and the force of the explosion threw dust and lighter dirt ad previously mentioned, and the force of the explosion threw dust and lighter dirt and fragments of buildings and forests over an area outlanted at 1,300,000 square miles.

E Even in the State of Calverinia the big city of gun Balvador, once the capital of Calverinia, also mas injured by the concassions. It was to the sizes and width of the streets of this city that many of the inhabitants owed their lives, as they found in the center of these streets a refuge from their falling houses. Of course the city never tholess was reduced to ha a heap of ruins, not a single building being left standing. There were pro premonatiry shocks before the greater ones, and many arouned from their beds took head of the warning and escaped to places of safty or otherwise the loss of life would have been even more terrible than it has. There were many ore towns totally destroyed than can be listed here and many lives were lost.

The clarks which caused the most daments and though produced by the capitations has

The shocks which caused the most dumano, and though produced by the explosions has or had at first a strange kind of ceillatery movement lasting over fourteen minutes and ending in a general ope upheaval of the oith, the result being that solid walls arches, and strongly branced roofs, were brok broken and severed or split like pipe stems ...

In the vinicity of Classplania it was said that a large number of small villiance villiages disappeared entirely. The city of Culverine was such shaken considerable damage was fo done to buildings specially to buildings and charches and other chifices of large size, several of which were reduced to rains. The lose of life however was waite quite small. Neverth less this was the most severe co nvulsion of the country for the shocks were felt over almost all the nation, causing many deaths feathering more property than can be believed. In Begunll Bengall gitte over 100,000 people lost their lives, where theconcussion fore down all the buildings of every town and villiage.

It is stynned too the magnitude of the disaster, for callysting softes and towns

It is strange too the magnitude of the disaster, for culverinian cities and towns are famous for their size, the smallest villianes having a population of eighteen, to twenty thousand. And yet so many have been dest oyed or wrecked.

these successions of tremendous shocks, which although the logs of life was smallll were exec dingly destructive to property. At the midnight hour of June The first, the inhabit ents of this district, were aroused from their bods by the occurance of a fifteen minted succession of the most peculiar and most sovere shocks over experience, and never succession of the most peculiar and most sovere shocks over experience, and nover before had the oldest inhabitant ever experienced such a thing an an our inhabitant soldest inhabitant of the property of th

In many places even, the rails were were bent or corved, as if they had been intentionally beht. The first checks were less nevere than the last, the last shock narming the population of every city and town, and driving the inhabitants at opec out of their beds, and from their houses, into the streets. This curthquake shocks produced by the terrific explosions were also felt at Tonanda, where it lasted fifteen minutes also, moving many buildings from their houses, and creating the most intense la larms. To what extent this tendancy to the explosion concussion shocks threatened the whole of Calverinia it was difficult to say. Beyond question the concussions did do a great deal of dumage to many far away towns undeities, and therefore so intense was the cutastrophe, and so far extended that all efforts are being made to learn its real causes.

Indeed the e.g.y keeps the whole of Calverinia continually disturbed by the disasters and various calamities of the war. Even around the deep bayd of this vast and splendid region, upon the shores laved by the waters of the Calverinia sea, and also about the large inland lakes accured disasters of every description produced or caused by the enemy. The firem also that consume the forests, so etimes turns even far beneath the soil because of the torrific heart, and all often causes serious trouble to the very landscape. In all probabilities three times within the two years, the city of Angelinia Angelina and also broothy cale have been alighty destroyed by the far reaching conclusions of the most tremendous explosions of the war, and there is not in all calverinia, Angelina and also to the tarts are only other central State of Abbicamina a single capt that has not been visited by one or are of these violent disasters. To thisse disasters exp especially of the Flood horror starring had specieved the story from another eye withese. He was a engineer of bridges entrusted with an official micron, who had witheseed the Abbiequalua, horror in the morning at about six colock and thoughing sought to congeal his destrictation of the special field in the special field of the special fire, some or them declaring that a disaster of this character had jus voccured somewhere in the distince.

The Mayor who acted as host and who was an elderly man much esteemed in the district for his knowledge, went on to describe many such catastrophes since the war started which he claimed he himself an had witnessed. He spoke more partic larly of the big floods just past in 1912, and other horrors. He also told his gests that some acc caption of some steament had told him that upon the following day, when more than one hundred miles away he had found the whole country covered by a sea of smoke, and had experienced great difficulty in threading a way for his ship down the river through this dones for of smoke, which you could not see through even a distance of ten feet.

The try one, including a criegare had his story to tell, and while the party were still in converse ion, a terrible noise far to the north like a series of long thunder rolls was heard and a shaking of the earth followed each detonation.

Af At first the shocks seemed to te ricing upward and then descending down ward, but after a few more moments they became transformed into indulations travelling or thin ward. Expecting it to be a sort of artinguake they wondered thy the soil did not no undulate like the surface of a stormy sea, but hevertights at the first within sight by the films of lights from the house were seen to rock a and for the sort of danger were able to fellow with over increasing interest and some a ethe strange rapid.

were able to follow with over increasing interest and some a e the strange rapid phases of the disturbance, then it finally caused. Lut none ever went to bed that night not a single person in the whole town.

It was not till two days after that the flood came, as it took two days to travel this far down from its gource even at a speed of fourty miles an hour; "Our attention was culled" related the engineer "To a terrible commotion in the direction of the river, but I cannot express what I then saw, but I dod not know whether I a was awake or a proy to a terrible night more, or whether I was in the world of engineer or an engineer of the river had reace reached un inusal height, threatening to overtop the highest levers, and then ward the north an unusal neight, threatening to overtop the highest levees, and then uvard the north an immense roll of water was seen moving down over the whole country side, which roaring and flecked with foam reached no high that it intercepted the sufficiency, and the second as if the c will of water collapsed, there was a noise like this containing waves oblitters of the river in one sweep, and cambed I tward the plain. I could ing waves oblitters of the river in one sweep, and cambed I tward the plain. I could see people fleching from the towns but the wave was too ewift for them. I and my own companions would have perished also if we had not been standing pon highly elevated

Indeed the outbrook of the war itself had brought a great accession of googlesion and an other disactors, also to the number of recorded explosion escale and flood horrors but Calverinia alone had furnished almost innumerable instances of the various disactors. At some points the heavings of the earth were quite perciptable to the eye. The sea rose and fell to a great extent in the harbor of Cilvarine, and the hitse hadreds of them a peared as if they were first forced through the water, and then struck on the ground. The town of Anna Aror Aronsburg, and neveral athera, are, and to be somewhat dumaged but not completely overthrown, sounds like the loudest thunder at a distunce accompanied by the shocks, and it was felt all along the whole extent of the two cast count lines. The shock a however were most immaterial in Calvarinia. The garles of shocks were ines. The shoc a however were most disasterous in Galverinia. The series of shocks were felt to a slight degree throughout Abysainkile overfa large extent of the country, stretc stretching from the boundary ine, on the northwest border to Abbicania Abbicannia a distance of three thousand four hundred miles. The effect was set severe about three the southern portion of Domdobin State, where a score of a towns were shaken the pough of right in eight to escite the populace, and in Horthern Calvernia, the cities of realismen, Plax Pisconna. Arieuma, Tennama, Port Ilayanna, and several others were somewhat damaged, and in the vestors rarts, many places were shaken badly. A small city called groce was engulsed in the ensueing flood, and its site will always now be occusied by a lake formed by the flood. Owever it is claimed in this locality there was no loss of life, or any one injured though hundreds of thousands were rend-

The conqueston shocks were exportenced, and of a serious character, over large areas around be light's function. At simplem a function, the shocks of the severest hat we lested over ten minutes, comewhat with a veritical metion, as if the ground not only danced under foot but made the buildings what do many funny and yet strange atles. east of the city broke out into ficrce conflagration, the fires gaining in such immense quantities of conflagration that the city was threatened and all surviving men of every town went to fight the fire and fortunately brought in under control, skm some of the severest shocks of the concussion was also felt throughout Mullecatt Mate, which destroyed a considerable priton of the rown of Miles entur. The worst shocks only lasted twenty seconds but in that time the portion of the town facing the direction of the sounds was laid in complete and total ruins. Every one of the ropulation in that section were killed. T.

THE FIRE HURBICAME CROSSES THE MIVER

MIAT OCCUPS ON THE MARY JAME.

TERRIBLE AND HARROWING SCENES.

THE POADSTEAD OF ABBIEANN SWEPT BY A WHIRIWIND OF FIFE. BAILOPS SCONCHED TO DEATH AT THEIR POSTS. SCENES ON THE MARY JAME, AND HEROIST OF CAPTIAN SAINDERS AND STARRING AND CREW OF THE SHIP. ..

To begin with on the twenty eight day of geptember 1913 starring and all those on board the ship waiting for another ravorable moment to enter Abbieann to explore the Luke Angeline Section which was said to have sunk beneath the waves had the worse and most tryingexperience of their lives, a when a whirtwind of fire that burst in fury from the southwest and east simultaneously swept the citys River roadstead clear of everything within sight, save Starrings ship which though set aftre and badly dumaged was released from her morings by the scorched and burned survivors among her creating pitifully away with dismantled rigging and charred sheets, an unrecognizable hulk gray with ashes blown from the forests and with with dead men lying where they fell among her decks. The vessel had been on the west side of the river harbor when the flery conflagration of the forest wraped the shrouns of the densest forests around eastern Abbleann in sheets of flame.

As if in terror of that withering sea of fire, the waters of the river seemed to change its course. The force of the f hurricane accomplished this and for a distance of a hundred feet it swept backwards in a wrong direction seemingly tward the vortex of the fire hurricane, which rushed in persuit of the fleeing waters. In another moment the mighty river returned to its course and like an energy turned upon its persuer, and like a fearful tidal wave it swept back tward the north lifted the burning ship high into the air, and engulted a part of the ruined city. When the strange river tiad wave had spont its force, the waters of the river were thick with the burned wrockage of the shore and city, and in the midst of it the salions of the Mary Jane were strugged ling desperately for life. And as they fought and chocked, and fainted and sank, the fiery harricane raged furiously and hot around them, and yellow sulphurious fumes and thick chocking smoke hastened the merciful h end for many.

It was a terrible experience for starring for few of his followers came out of that arful bat baptism of fire and water alive. The experience goes as follows;

The Mary Jame had cast anchor and held in the rivers nondstead ever since the arival of at Abbieann, and Starring had investigated the city for about six days with some findings which seemed to prove the indications that the disaster was not caused by volcanic eruptions. She had passed once already through a terrific cath of fire on her way to Abbieann and with some loss at that time.

Angeline niches was in a boat alongeide the steamer chatting with starring about the adventure so far, when one of the Rangers on deck noticed it was growing very dark as if a thunderstorm was coming, and a great great winustorm was rising while in the southwest there was a terrific sheen of light extending from the horizon from end to end. In another direction about the southeast there was a terrific wall of roiling smoke and it seemed to move forward with the speed of a cornado cloud.

Thinking it was such he shouted" Tornado. " Angeline ichee with her heart almost in her mouth from the shock looked, and saw the tramendous cloud of smake spreading with terrific rapidity over the southern n and eastern section of the great forests near Abbieann, a forest so thick that only you could go through by roadways and paths, plasthere a bady could not squesse between the trees, ghe doked in terror and juickly or an instant later the corner section of this forest was enveloped in a sheet of flame that spread like a flood, and the terrific wind rained sparks and flaming embers on board.

"Quick for heavens sake get on board" s screamed the Rangers, " and she did so. She had just time to climb on board, when her boat disuppeared, and the terrific hurricane had just time to climb on board, when her boat disuppeared, and the whole wall of increased to a cyl cyclonicwind and before you could wink an eye the whole wall of forests before their view burst into flames.

"clear the deck every one of you" shouted gtarring, grabbing Jennie Turmer by the arm and pulling her along with you. "Captian get the ship going quick."

Several of the crew started for the pilot house but were quickly scorched to death. Starring rushed to the Engine room yelling frantically;

"Get the engines going for heavens sake."
"giv whats the matter"! Cried the Engineer. "Are the glandeliniums attacking, ?" and he asked this question as he rushed to obey the order. "No its worse than that" shouted Starring. "The world is on fire." "Good God" cried the engineer, and by supper human efforts, having steam up fortunately the cable was slipped, and the steamer bucked away from the shore, and then started some worthy for a million dollar moving picture of this drama alone, some worthy for a million dollar moving picture of this drama alone, while the ship started to back off, the Mary James officers and crew had a thrilling while the ship started to back off, the Mary James officers and crew had a thrilling experience which never again o would they wish for. As the ship started a rain of fiery embers began to fly all about, and sulphurious ps posionous fumes from the burning pine and hemlook trees, began the to envel pe the Abbieum harbor, and the flames reaching clear across the river, and sheting the very sky overhoud with a cloud of booming flames threatened to envelope the ship.

There was a terrible uproad on shore as if a tornado was lashing the burning forests thich became like a molten planet, and the cuptim ordered all speed shead, and dashed for the plotet house himself, and steered for the open waters, closing the door to keep out the heat and the wild windows also. Amid the terrible excitement the officers and crew jumped below, and closed all the hutches to shut out the flumes and smoke. The cuptian remained atbhis whoel too cas finally forced to go below, budly burned, and the of ip with no gaiding hand at her helm run her own ruge for oufty, but seeming to close in more neuror to the borning side of the shore. The chief clerk, five of the crow, and the supercurgo, jumped overboard before they could be restrained and were scalded to death in the auter.

The suddeness of the an smal catastrophe merved Starring and for a time he was not courageous enough to dure take the hem holm himself, and when he then samened courage, to try it, Jennie urmer threatened to shoot him if he placed himself in that dangerou place. Five sallors were seen to full dead at their post, while accisting in the work of slipping the anchors. As far as eye could reach the fire ran along the short like the speed of a hurricane. The river was moving back on its course at the time instead of running its usual war.

The water was 'inally coming back however and the ship was tossed high in the air on a crest of water like an upheavened ocean, whirled around, and its deck houses rint in splinters. The gagineer with str steam on, crowded on all speed for the open river to escape what did seem like the fulfillment of the biblical prophecy of the end of the world but as there was no guiding hand at the helm the ship wa was drifting closer to the rouring sesthing hell on shore.

Those during to take chances experienced the greatest difficulty in trying to reached the burning pilot house, and appailing rounds were issueing from the flame event valleys and hillsides must of the city, which were shrouded in smoke and flame. All the Pangers were up, and some despite the peril were trying to obtain photographs of the scene, and Anceline Riches and Jennie Turmer thought they were foole, suddenly starring and the others neard a tremendous explosion on shore and wondered what the live nad struck. The wind blew thick clouds of red not asnes on week, and ne or would are a black a cloud sweeping down upon the river. He ran welow into the lower capin, taking the two girls with him, and sprang into the room and shut the goor to keep out the heat, which was almost unvegravie. The snip rocked, and Starring expected that every moment it would sink.

"gor heavens sake open the door" cried some one outside. "For neavens sake wopen

Starring had to summon courage to open the door, out he wid. and uragged the first mate in quickly.

It soon because unpearably hot inside, but as it seemed the wind had died down Starring took the courage to go on the lower dock. All about to his horror were lying dead and dying, come of them were meaning for water, and Starring did what he could for them, while a sailor took the helm. Starring obtained water, but when it was held to their swoilen lips, they were unable to swallor because of the heat which reasted the inside of their throats. One man took water in this method, and rise rinsed out some of the dahes, but even then could not swallow, so padly was his throat burned.

He sink tack inconectous, and a few moments later died.

All aft the ship was after, and from the owning landscapes came drafts of most terrible heat, and the distant hillslopes looked as if they were covered with glaring laws. One man becoming crased from the heat, flung himself into the river, out graring jumped overboard after him. The water was almost hot enough to parboil him, but a wave of fresh water soon swept in from the north bringing with it cooler water. Starring and the man he had resolved was caught in the wave, which was of tidal velocity, and carried down the river, and was washed against an acturned sloop to which he clumg. The can Starring had rescued was in dreadful acony, and kept one included the clumg. The can starring had rescued was in dreadful acony, and kept one included the put back on the ship. Picking up some wreckage, and a floating tool chest, gtarring managed with the aid of others who came to join him made a rude raft, or which he placed the man he had rescued. Seeing an upturned boat, He asked one of the cix men to swim for it and bring it over so the rescued man may have an opportunity to live. The man succeeded in getting the boat righted, but instead of being able to return the current of the river swept him and the boat down stream and he was drowned.

Seeing the ship coming back for him, Starring made the raft head for the ship and he and the man were helped aboard. The others had taken to the choreward of the and the man he had rescued was caught in the wave, which was of tidal velocity, and city to escape the biting heat.

The gangwayman whose life was saved, by Starring, told of a woman and child on board the ship was was who was burned to death while she held her aby inher arms, protecting it with her own body from the fire that filled the air. The children were alive long after their poor mother had ceused to suffer.

Another officer of the wary Jane who was saved also by Walter Starring, was Henry Altothe the second ,ate of the Steamer. Hile the rescue work was going on, there was a sudden and most terrific report, and a part of the forest seemed to give vent to an agily mass of dark rolling smoke, which spreading over the entire region for about seventee seventeen miles suddenly croke into a solid flame of tire. The fire had struck an cil and tar bog in the forests, and this flame spreading with harricans speed, spread the densest black smoke over the river and forcets and over the entire city, enveloping all the view in a perfect maelstrom. A tidal wave of shooting fire passing over the river , and fire, mud, flaming oils, and hot stones rained upon the decks of the Mary June. Starring was again forced to take return in the cabin, burying himself in the bed clothes. The men however who were not dead now disabled fought the ships fire desperately, while the cartian again took the helm. The auf at cloud of fire togoling rising and surging and rouring across the sky from the bizing forests was seen to sweep with lightning spp speed up the hillstates, and found the city and the Worth pend of

"My God, if it reaches there and cames we are trapped" shouted starring. "Engineer put on full speed. We must race the fact. " five."

"I've got on all the steam should give, the confineer cried. Everyone was scattering before the rain of tiery debrie, when again with a frightful rear, and something ike a like a terrific fireworks display, mother evelone of tire awayt up over the straight north burning all before it, and saking a racing appeal for the porth gond.

"We have to beat that have id riery checking which wind of fire before its envelopes with Pend." and Sturing. "Ruman Tumor point shocker and see if you can aid the engineer put on more about but he ship in after aft, and the rem are finding it forward. We must a second or we cannot enough and entitle our include.

One of the firemen who was a off duty at the time and who had been on deck admidships and who had ascaped the horror rushed below, mother man got to the windlass, and some thing knocked him flat. The caption though oficking to the ships helm was horribly burned. It seemed he had inhaled some of the rlames, but he hing on to save the ship and the rest, even though some of the other crew wanted to jump into the river. Indeed the ciptian was a praye man too praye to be burned to death. It was now five minutes since the terrible scene started and the captian finally got the ship into the middle of the streum. One of the seamen who was no frightfully burned that he could not live havi having theled flame, said in weak tones that no one would pull through the "hell".

"Starring same hoped to beat in the race with that " cyclone of smoke and fire, but such you the positionous checking nature of the smoke that it seemed to burn worse than the fire, and no one of the survivors could remain on deck. The cloud seemed pigger than the piggest storm clouds, and the fire seemed to purn the forests everywhere at once and the heat was so tremendous that some of the rules in the city far away began

A nother member of the err escaped death, when after being thrown overboard, he fastered himself to the bowsprit of the vessel, which stood out of the water, when the ship for a moment or two ran aground on a river shallows, and he as saved, just as the vessel plunged i to deep water again. Just as he was saved there was a roar that rent the air and sky, and mas made they wasts of the ship to quiver, and the ship to shiver as thoughshe were alive, we one could describe the noise for it left some of the hearers sense senselens for an instant. The whole sky was black, and there was a great upright sheen of flame, that must have reached for numberless miles, and which pierced the great rolling clouds in undurating waves.

Once the ship was only a few hundred feet from the shore, and it seemed only an instant before the fire began to come clear μ the t to the very edge of the sh where line owning the trees now at the very waters edge. The whole forests seemed swallowed up in an undulating sea of fire. The fire streaming onward also reached the edge of the shore of the River condition, and there was an arrill hissing sound, as the burning trees and fire brands fell into the water. The air was seething with flames, the say was all aftre, and held indeed seemed to break loose.

The mad race for north and was on. As the ship stramed on with her engines rinning almost above their agend, Angeline Biohes teking the chences after wetting her clothes went on deck. Just us she did so some one hollowed;

"Look at the forest on shore."

An one reached the deck she saw the vast cloud of smoke and fire, and the same man shouted "It is coming over the river to below for your life."

Indeed she rished to the saloon. Just as she reached it she experienced a feeling of suffocation, tollowed by intense heat. The ship broke into flames at mother quarter as just as the flames aft were put out. The shipe carpenter assisted Angeline piches and Jennie amor and the two boy scouts to a petter quartor, with the help of a ranger he brought down a cot, and upon this the two girl scouts were placed. while this was being done another sailor died. The carpenter brought the two little girls water at great reasonal danger. The two girls suffered some burns, it was a long rim for the ship to pass through the shower of embers and fire and clouds of smoke to race the conflagration to worth pend. The ship had half war more to go get, and the ship was covered with a mass of fine gray ashes from the wind blown smoulders from the places. In some places it lay in drifts on the decks. This had rallen in a rad hot state all over the steamer setting fire to everything it struck that could nurn, and when it tell on men on board nurning off limbs, and large places of flock. This was shown by finding portions of h man remains, when after the excitement was over and the decks were cleared of the debris.

The rigging, rops, tarpualins, and ammings, were charred or burned, and most of the upper stanchions and spars had been swept overboard, or destroyed by the heat of the fire on shore. ekylights were smushed, and cabins were filled with smoke. The score of ruin was deplorable. Faster and raster went the ship, and suddenly Starring observed the black squall of smake to a greach the ship wa from the land side, and the air grew darker than ever. Starring knowing the nature of this saffacating smoke, relied out to everybody to stand clour, and almost in an instant the whole ship and landscape was enveloped in total darkness, and the air again seemed to be filled with flame, and railing patches of fire, which ignited everything they struck. The fire tack hold of the ship in all parts and the remainder of the crew who had dared to come abourd on deck again reshed about front c with pain and fright. Stauring of course had gone into his cabin and short the short the door, and closed the port before it admitted the hoas heat. As soon as he could get at of the cubin, he rushed to the engineers telegraph, and signalled to the engineer to keep the engines at full speed, and maited for an answer. The cable chain had been metted away by the rierce heat of the fire on shore. Starring tried to help the cartian work the wheel to stear the ably which was again drifting for shore, but the steering near seemed to be stuck or tarmed, and would not work. Hevertheless the engineers was keeping the engines going whead and astern afternately, haping the ship could thus be headed to the middle of the river. While the captian and Starring were mane wering the ship, it nearly coilided with a ficating house in the river.

Huge tongues of flame was rising from the mover section of the house. Tuny of the cres had rached below, and after a time Starring having the eronger stronger hand got the steering sear to work, and the ship was headed from the burning share once more. As the sky again cleared a little, and it was possible to see around the deck, the

as the sky again elected a strine, and it was possible to see around the deck, the sight was phospit, here were bytes acroaming and writhing in again agony all around. Starring halfwed he immedif was in a bad state, almost smaller to lift his hand, and the blood from his reside and burns on his forehead, kept remains into his eyes. Starring decided to win the race for north field at all costs, and with the help of

has distant, one on theer, and the bonds win, he succeeded in to the design of the stream. Turker this territic run all sound were every printer out the thica, working in the store hade raising steam, and traing to do what the could tor their agins, shipmater. The chief mate area a harriple anoth. It escaped iron the first h writtene, he they endeavoved to get the entr from the chove. Not their his men nellow he came on usek to look for them, and was struck by a falling limb all aflame, which burned one side of his face completely off. And in the time occupied on this terrible voyage, the experience of the survivors was still worse than that already gone through.

voyage, the experience of the survivors was still worse that that areas given through.
The brave captian and his men fighting the fire, exhausted and burned by the heat, str struggled and worked trying to do something to acrist their dying shipmates.
Those working below strove to keep up the steam. The performance of both the captian and sturring was most wonderful, and the more so, with the formers pittle condition.
The cone could understand how he kept it p up yet they did, even when partial darkness

Everybody who survived was badly frightened for they feared the fire on shore would win the race.

"Crowd on more steam," setarring, again signaled to the engineer, and he needed no wring. Faster and faster the ship drew away through a suffocating amosphere, gaining on the fiercely racing five, foot by foot, yard by yard, and at last the curve of the river came into sight through the haze. They were passing outside the hells mouth. It was like an escape from hell. When Starring looked at his watch he had found that they had only been about an hour reaching the bend. It had seemed an eternity, whatever it was the decks of the ship was covered. The blistered effects of the heat could be observed on the surviving masts and woodwork, and the more timid of the passenger passengers on board had not yet gotten over their fright..
Starring said that no curiousity would ever get him near the fire zone again.

During the swift speed of the ship, Penrod was among those who miraculiquely e scaped He was thrown into the water, with four satiors, and almost soulded by the near boiling water. Penrod held on to a piece of floating wreckage and saw a scene of most magnificient horror. There was an incessont blizzard of sparks, and the air whistled and cracked as if a heavy fuestlade was being fired.

Heanwhile the boy had been drifting down the river, but the wind shifted and he was carried tward the Abbleum side of the shore. He and his companions kept affoat on their improvised rait for two hours and finally saw a burning ship while drifting about. After being adrift for about three hours, the boy saw a boat, and swam to it. It was a cames. He found it full of water, but he managed to empty the craft, and he got into it. He could see none of his companions. gome hours afterwards, they wer he was discovered from by those on board the ship just as it neared north pend. He was picked up. All this while the smoke was still troublesome, and ruins of the city was burning. With the wind drifting the smoke it became dense like a fog, and shrouded everyt everything out of sight.

The ship made signals to the shore at forth Rend but no replies were recieved. The ship then lay off for the time being to enabled the dead ones to be buried, and while this was being accomplished, those recieving treatment for their injuries and others with ossed a most remarkable specatols of fire and smoke, and many dead fishes were I floating on the river. They were cooked. Everyone on board were covered with ashes the reyes were weeping from the smarting caused by the smoke, and the heat was intol-eraple. Despite the plight of the bout the crew of the ship were forced into a rescue

As econ as north and was reached crowds of fratic people were seen on shore, and these were rescued. Some of the refugees came in small boats, women and children nearly naked and all were crying, some of the children r brought dogs and kittens as all their property. Their clothing who had any was thick with cost. A number of big pans were filled with cooked food and placed on deck, and they were surrounded by a crowd of the refugees. They were all on board within an hour. The ship was still waiting for the last ones when there was again a tremendous report of an explosion in the direction of the fire, quickly followed by a series of other reports. These explosions caused great excitement among the others on shore and the last boat returned to the ship bringing the remainder of the refugees. including the last. They had been frightened by the reports, and jumping into the river swam out to the boat. The ship after this trying experience saved sixty women and children from the endangered parth Bend, where on account of the wind there was not so much heat. Let the reader take pride never heless in the fact that Walter Starring and his followers were the first ones at the scene of the Abbieann disaster.

flaming addies, whoseling about in whirtpools of their own, and hissing and rouring in hellish factor, all this showed the heat of the fire, all this also showed that the heights of the fluxes were not disturbed by the temposy, even to heavey the flames forward in all the rashing con vulsive violence of the general and most terrible commotion, noth mountain and valley in the path of the infuriated flames were covered now with white clouds of smoke, against which the f wind first struck , and which from high pints, was lifted up like spray, but in all other places, was h hurled along with the intensecrapidity of its motion untill the whole prospect, seems seemed one sea of driffing white smoke, dusning along furiously to its dark borders by the howling fire storm.

In the meantime starrings followers below, had guthered themselves together in then len undnavine below, and yet austained through the fire atorm without loss and in tru triumph. It was not the least remarkable, and by far the most comfortable edfr circumstances in this combination of all that is grand and terrible, that furious as were the winds, towering and threatening as were the trees all aflame about to fall tward the brink of he the ravine, they properved their coolness against the fury of the one, and their maintaincece in despite of the alternate heat from the other. True it is, they were made to fight for their very lives. True it is they were made to retreat from one part of the ravine to the other, still they continued to fight their way through At such a mment it was a matter of profound deliberation which ment to admire, -----the majesty of cod exhibited in the wind and fires, or his goodness and wisdom in enabling his creatures to contend with and overcome the flarce fire elements, even in the florceness of their

might have said to himself;

"I'm like an accupad soul in the midst of the flumes of perdition and yet they do not touch me, may ye indemitable wares of fire, shall bear me no harm and ye winds shall not waft me onward to the heart of the flames."And yet there he was in the fullness of this fourful experiment.

He never could beliebe it believe it possible for any forest to be swept by such a hurricane of wind and fire, without the very countryside also being laid to ruin, for he was remarked had the same forest fire passed furiously upon any big city, during the same length of time, only twenty five minutes, the flames would not have scarcely left a single house standing .. Hence where Starring was, as long as he remained there, there was little danger, but if he left his perch to go anywhere else he would have perished. His way to the ravine or glen was cut goon however the atmp atmosphere became so thickly curtained with smoke that gtarring lost sight of the pavine, and the gnewglen. Thereforev tarring called loudly to those in the glan and ratine ravine, to know if they were all right, buththere was none to answer as nothing co could be heard above the roar of the destruction. wingly seeing a subsidence in a part of the fire, starring took the nerve to climb down the tree, and therefore wetting his clothes by a small stream dashed brough through the leaping tongues of flames and fairly threw himself into the alopes of the ravine. inally recovering himself to see if he was not injured, and seeing all of his followers still safe, he walked up to them and asked; "What are we going to do now. ?"

All were for a time silent as they did not know what to say, and now it began to rain ambors down into the rayine, and trees crushed down with noise lke thunder, and flumes roofted the ravine in a very dreadful manner, and the heat increased stillil. still greater.....

"Then Rudeliffe said;

"Oh that we had kept on ur way our way."

"who could have thought that this path should lead us into the western western path of fires. " said one of the guides. It" I believe the whole country is burning. So it vecems anyway ..., "

"I was afraid of it at the very first, said angeline Riches, and therefore gave all of yourthat gentle caution I would have sp) spoke more, but it seemed of no use to do so. "

"Good girl scout be not offended" said the captian" I am sorry to have led all u of us out of the way, and that have put ameelvee into such great danger. Pray my dear girlscout forgive me, I did not do it of an evil intent. Who could tell what move the fire would take."

"po not worry about it now, we all forgive you, and believe too this shall be for our good."

"But" said _tarring," we must not remain thus too long, let us try to go back again. I know a point there fire is not heading for. "

"I am glad" said nadeliffe, " we have with us a number of good leader leaders, a d and suides. "But we must not remain very long here, for the fire may scorch us to death when it reaches its worse. The clon is saftest. Let us try to get into it before the flumes surge over us. "

"But" said Starring; " let me go before."

"No" said madeliffe, "lot me guide our way through, that if there be any danger I may be the first to be in it......

"No, said gtarring almost starnly "You or no one else shall go first if I say so. for your minds being troubled, may load you out of the way mentirely." Then for their encouragement, they heard one of the other guiden saying !!!!!!

"Let ; us lead the troops tward the slen."

But by this time the rading flomes had greatly rises about all sides of the ravine, threatening to even out them off from the avenue leading into the deepp gles, which made the way of going back very dangerous.

Yet they made attempts to so back, tward the glen, wetting their clothes before they before they did so, but the heat was no fierce, the smoke so black and dense, and the flames reaching all about and searing up to being, that in even attemping to go back they had sked to have been scorched nine or ten times, or overcome by the funes of burning wood, and ground.

And they could not even with all the skillthey had, get again to the more sheltest sheltered part of the ravine. Now there was not far from the ravine nor the glen, a large stream and beside the stream a forest rangers shack, where explesives had been stored with the purpose of us use in blanting trees and stumps.

somehow or other feeling a sense of some vaknown damper Starring climbed part way up the alopes, to fithe ravine, and in looking over the collection of the burning forest caught sight of the explosive sheds which were three stories high... Seeing the words on one of the burna plainty written in Red""High Explosives, he yelled to his followers. They in terror maked him whence the sheds were, and whatthey did in this part of the grounds, and when he told them, he said; "Good God boys dangerous an it is well have to fight the fire from getting to these ou Gants or so are all heart manner.

" owever Radeliffe maid;

"We are out or luck anyhow. We could not get there in time. See the fire hits them already."

They were therefore forced to be propored for what might come. But they were usurprised to see the sheds flore up in torches and no explosivion explosions occuring, when said starring;

"I believe the shada are empty, and therefore the fires does not cause any blasts.
We will have a to force our way to the glan however for more safty. Who's brave smough to go alone with m of me first."

They all felt they were forced to go, for fear of the explosions that might yet come was stronger than that of the flames. They also had but little to say, for they had known themmelves in a fault for suspenting of seeking refuge here in this dangerous locality. Starring and the men first cut their way before them, and finally all managed to flight their way through the burning rubbleh and get way down intothis into the deep glen where it was much cooler. It was manty and stinking down here because of the smadges, and here they would be trapped here no one can say. They remembered especially starring did of a friend of his who trapped in a fire was forced to remain in a deep ravine, for sis days six days without one bite of bread, a drop of water to drink, and how he survived was a wonder though for a time he had gone stark mad. They were therefore here in avil conditions also, facing the same torture as he had, and were for from help and succor.

But fortunate for them a shallow stream ran through the glen, and from its waters they kept their clothing wet. Finally the fluming embers and blazing logs from above begun to full into the glen, and they had to fight desperately to save themselves from this new peril, but some were not even able to help themselves or to stop the blazing embers from coming down, while the sky above was all of flame and smoke. They were forced to fight on and condole their misery, and to mourn and pray under their distross. Starring also fell upon every blazing log that came hurltling down, beating at the fire with wet cloths, and meanwhile rating of the glandelinians as if they were dogs.

Some of the other getting more des e desperate did advise some to make away of themselves por me said:

"We are never likely to come out of this aforms inferns alive, that their only way out of the horror would be to make an end of themselves, jeither with knife or gum for why should we choose cot continued life seeing it is attended with so much peril."

Others almost going crazy from the torment and thirst, and the smoke begged of Starring to lotbthe let them go. but he said;

"If you go outside outside of this ravine now you'll perih perish."

Some others too began to consult among themselves whether best to kill themselves or no, and thus they began to discourse:

"James" said as "what in the world shall we do. "The horror of the fight down here makes us discrable beyond endurance, for my part I know not whether best to live or die here, or die out of my own hand. My desire almost is to die now than have to perish so miserably in the flames."

"Yes, said another" the grave is better than co down here below the inferno." ", ut another said;

"Indeed our present condition is truely dreadful, and death would be far more welcome to me thun thus to die down here in torture, but yet let us consider, that our Diessed Lord hath suid"Thou shalt do no murder"No not to another mans person. Mu Much more then are we forbidden to kill ourselves. The only excuse is rank insunity. Bonidos any one that kills another person can but committ murder upon his body, but for one who kills himself is to kill body and soul at once. And moreover dear commade, you talk of the case of the grave, but sarely yet have not forgotten the dreadful heil, where surderers cartainly go, for no murderer has eternal life.

"An this is a monomorable eight, it came opportunely to us to see if we combly '97 5 necess a text to cross the river in. If we seems one and its over no we desired and which we are inclining to so, we can probably jet off from the path of the great firms after all, and press pressure our adventage without so such discomment and and particulation we have for aught, know be saide like no maken, if we be surprized by the sain one of the fire."

"I'm sorry, anid padeliffe that you had been compelled by some missed wenture to place yourself into the way of the flame, and j am made to wonder that all of us seven now had not been feeding cursultee to the Bod demon, for you know we all are in what we can mane. "The Fire Country". Let prace and the help of God be mane feets manefeeted, and let us never cease to pray with all our heart, bet's hope we can secure boats."

"Let us take notice of what we see here for our holp, for time to come. I escaped the fire a number of times, twice with Gortraie Ang. line after two Professional Spies had shot me, for the forests fell not b, the destruction of windstorm or ax but by fire--us we see since our adventure started."

"True, and this may boto us both caution, and example, caution that we should shun the most dangerous portions of the country, or a si-prign of what dangero will evertake such as she had a contain ranger with two hundred and fifty fifty followers that portions are a contain ranger with two hundred and fifty fifty followers that portions to became, but above all, I make at one thing, to wit, how many refugees can flee as confidently through large portions of the woods with the fire not foot behind, and jot occupe without a single injury to any me, while those two hundred and fifty one rangers perioded in the flames for allowing evercaution not to be their lot, specially since the fire evertook them aid make an example for others within sight of where their bodies charred beyond recognition were found, for many could could not but help one them. It is a sud thing indeed."

"It is a thing to be wondered at" said Starring, and now it is said that the hearts of all the people of the nation have been prowing so desperate over all these disasters, that something unusual will soon occur. It may be said that Colverinia is turning t into a vast Bodom for the plague of hot fires is as that as the fire of the Lord out offliouven and Hell combined could make it. The qlandelinium nation is an exceeding sinner before god and His whole Heavenly host -- that is in His eyesight, and notwithstanding the kindnesses that me bath shown it, for we known the land of alandelinia is the the garden of adon heretofore. The sin of glandelinia , makes the s n of godom soum like no sin at all, and it is rationally to be concluded, that such nations, even as such alandelinia is, that shall sin so like so in the sight, yea and that too in despite of such examples that by history were continually set before her of other nations and their dreadful downfalls, to caution her to the contrary, must aconer or later be a partaker of severest judgements. Clandelinia I know it, positively in the long run will, not, nay cannot win. It looks like she is surely winning now, but in the end it will be uttorly impossible. I cannot be done. Our cause cannot o lose. That too is impossible just us impossible because our cause is also that of the pleased and Holy Catholic. Church, the Cause of God and His pleased Mother, which Clandelinia also trys to overthrow. Therefore we cannot lose. Glandelinia is not able to win. That is also true he knows it, and therefore resul resorts to the plan of di saster making. An | not right?"

"Doubtless thou hasth said the truth, but what a mercy of God it is, that our own nation am not made this example, therefore it is for the whole of Abbicannia to thank god, to fear f before Him , and always to remember what in the future may befall glandolinia."

They continued on their way along the banks of the river, .. Here they rode on but with a little feeling of misgiving, and when some of them stopped to drink of the river they found the nater unusually warm, when it should have been pleasant and enliveing to their weary spirits, besides on the banks of this big river, the forests of pine and other trees were much thicker than usual, being all manner of pine, and to be able to walk along the edge of the stream they had to follow its w sandy shore as to go through the forest here was nigh next to impossible, and the leaves of the trees were so thick together all pine needles that the forest f was half as dark as night, but below on the ground at some openings large brush brish brush thick withe a clusters of black berries grew, and they had a good feast of these berries. Once they thought they were approaching a meadow, but it only turned out that the river spread out wider almost in their way of travel and the water was overspread and curiously beautified with big grass and lilies. Starring suggested that they should all lie down here and sleep, for here they might lie down gaftly, whilev some of them would take turns to be on guard duty, when they awoke in the morning, they gathered again of the berries, and drank again of the water,, of the river and then lay down for a while to rest themselves. Finally when they were disposed to go on, they again ate and drank and then resumed the way. However they had not journeyed far but the river and the way for a time parted. At which they were somewhat sorry, for they felt sure they dured notgo out of the way as they might lose their bearings and go the wrong direction. And this way from the riverwas somewhat rought, and their horses hoofs were becoming somewhat tender by reason of their travels, and therefore they all became somewhat discouraged, because of the change of the routees routs, but still as they went on, they wished for the sake of their horses a better way.

Yet not far bef. m them there was on the right hand of the way a axiden road coming into view, following along side a rocky forested glen, and semetim semething like a stile to go over into it. Then said gturring to his companions;

"If this glon lies along by our wage side, let's go over into it and look it over-

For should the Western arm of the fire take us by curprise this glen might afford us some proctection.

Then dismounting he went forward to the stile to investigation it, and behold the glen turned into a hage ravine further on, and a path wide and rocky a lay a along by the way on the other side of the fence.

"Tis according to my wish." said Starring. "It is not easy going, neither do . wish to continue the journey in this way, but if a fire comes up it would be best for us to be prepared. Come, Rudeling Radeliffe and Angeline, we are all good tree climbers, let us climb up to a high tree top and see if a fire is coming over.

"But how if this gath should lead us out of the way?"

"That is not like, said the other"But we are not going to follow it. We intend to use the refuge or the glan and ravine as a refuge if need be. Why , speak so ix is because I have mingivings. Don't you notice it getting hotter and the air hazy with smoke. We are again in its path I'm sure, confound the luck."

Bo Padeliffe and Angoline being persauded by starring went after him over the stile, to where a hundred foot pine tree stood. When they were gone over and were get into the path, they found it not so casy for their feet, and as they looker before them gtarring caw a lone ranger riding a on a horse, and they called after him and asked him whether the lan was a safe refuge in case of trouble."

"He said "yes providing there's plenty of water below."

"Look " said Starring" aid I not tell you See all the smoke coming. By this you may see we are right."

So they followed, and finally reached the tree and started climbing. It had grown very dark, so that those who followed had gone into the ravine so as not to be

The fire had spread this time by some change of wind to the northwest more direct and while advancing this now way it was becoming one of the most and terriblest visitations to which the two gtates of galverinia and Angelinia were exposed, and unknown to sturring or his followers had extended from the Aronburs un to gicmollester woods, and from there far beyond prengaline St lare city, and north of Instances could never be recorded in any history of the clouds of the devastat ing fmule flumen crossing the Mic-Hollester Run, tward the north of West Calverinia and the gouthern part of Angeline wine, to menunce all the forests of the great Mic-Whirther num Forested regions. The conflagrations were as numerous in their species of devastating horror as it is wide in its unusual rage of territory.

Town followed town in ruin, with a sort of disaster of unusual likeness, yet with distinct attributes.

.The forest fires first came into existance as early as the month of June 1912 but instances are not wanting, as in the present conflagration, of its main appearance as late as when it first struck the biggest town called Irientown. Even one part of the conflagration comprises myriads and myriads of forestes forests destroyed passing imagination to which only the terrors of the Infernal regions are the only fit comparison, and hence it is only almog almost a proverbial mode of expression by way of describing a vast invading army, t to liken it to the almost military manner of the advancing flumes. no dense were the flames that it is no exaggeration to say that they lighten the countryside like the sun at night. And so extense are the fires that they seem absolutely to cloth the whole country side which is being devastated like a molten sea. The noise of the flames could be heard two miles ..

This last characteristic could be stated of other sections of the forest fires, where their terrible devustation can and is also montioned. Terrific windstom windstorms and floods and the brusing and prostrating hail and sleep se sleetstorms had preceded them in their series of vis visastions the years before, but the forest fires do the work of ruin more thoroughly. For not only the crops, and fruits in fields some distunce from the conflugration are rained by the terrific far reaching heat, but the foliage of the forests miles from the conflagration itself, may the big branches, and the barks of the trees start smoking.

guch are these conflagrations --- whose existence combining that with the floods, explosion and other horrors, which many Angelii Angelinian and other 1 leaders brought forward as a good proof that Abbieannia and her gtates were fighting a real evil country, and of who, whom general Dargar, shows his national horror, when he says that the fire consumes everything excepting rocks.

These swarms of fires grew and grew since they started untill they became a compact body of flames of a greath length and size, and yet it was but the van guard,, of a series of similar fires, fromed formed one after another from the embers and burning foluge carried over the forests by the gales, flames rising into the air like hot clouds, enlarging over the sky a terrifically red campy of tengues, and then eweaping along over the biggest of the forests. Then at length the huge mass of flames moved faster over the plains and up the hillsides, and began todouble its curser, darkening the face of day for hundreds of miles of countryside with the heavy clouds of smoke covering the sky thicker than a thundercloud. As became an instrument of Devine Power the conflagration seemed to have no a volition of its own it was swept forward like a storm tossed ocoun, it sped forward at terrific rate before the wind, and thus made northward straight where Sturring and his column were passing through Again they were in its path. Five timer while in Abbicant already Starving again started to visit the vinicity of one of the explosion craters, and returned to the city afterwards nearly exhausted. Tit with attempt to examine the most ernormous crater of all was futile. He succeeded h wever in gettingclose to it. While close by it, he witnessed a frightful explosion he wave in per injudes to it. This was a most important observation and explained in part the racing on of the arful catastrophe. This phenomena is entirely new in forest fire doings. Starring tick --cary thategraphs, but y do not healthful to acknowledge that he was terified. But he was not the only one frightered. Two of his news raper correspondents, who had accompanied him becase scared, can three miles tward the vest, and tustened into Abbiecon. The refreen still semining are still termilified, boarly all of the phenomena of the forest fiven thousalves are new to neighbor, and many of them have now yet been explained. The funcat fires are raging in energy, and even the writer will not not make predictions as to what the confluenctions will next do, to do.

OOTHER ACC OUNTS OF THE TERRIBLE DISASTER. SCENES OF HOROR DESCRIPED BY A WITNESSSS. AIRIFANN AND THE BENGALL HORRORSS

In this history of the great Abbicann horror, probably nothing can be more remarkable than the extreme fewness of the events recorded by the news at the few weeks after the natement of the ernormous flood, in comparison with the other events of the great catastrophe that have been registered since that dreadful time. This may be partly accounted for by the situation that after the disaster was well under way, there was but a small portion of the habitable surface of the Calverinian and other States known to those who were capable of handling down a record of events because of the tremendous destructions of all communications, by wire, land, rail and calle combined as well as water navagiation.

hon the news finally was able to got some accounts of the unusual catastrophe the vast increase in the numbers of cities found to be decroyed destroyed, the unestimated number of dead, was therefore undoubtedly due to the slight of endressent of the nations knowledge of the diseasor, by some slight restoration of some of the communications under ground greatest difficulties.

As starring knows from evidence, besides Angeline pichee, and her other girl friends who experienced the scenes, Violet, and her staters were the only once who knew any thing about the destruction of Abbicann.

As graring knows scenes, violet, and her sleters were the only once who knew any thing about the destruction of Abricans.

There was much to however the disaster throughout the disaster zone which oven k now now is more than the disaster throughout the disaster zone which oven k now now is more than the disaster and the like n know nothing of the occurrance for the too dangerous to explore. Even at the present time know disaster were for the too dangerous to explore. But then he knew full well the craters he had seen, though large, had no shape of those formed by volcanic eruptions, and at the time of this tremendous convulsion in engall atte, and the vest tract of country comportising so many cities and so much land north und south of them had been violently shaken and overturned ther. The much land north und south of them had been violently shaken and overturned ther. We was no evidence in mater materials and anything else of there had seen any such thing as the volcanic action. He recalled the written statements by some witness witnesses that strange men had been ucting as suspiciously around the region some vitues before the disaster.

Of a large section of the valleys watered by the Mic-Hollester Run, that south of ableann was the largest and most properous, most forested, and the most populous. All the northern and southern part of this valley with its woods and its broad river though not upheuvend by the cracking concussions was totally wiped out by the "RED PLA-UE" not even the akelenton of a burned tree left standing. Iron and steel

All the region of the explanion area itself, with the woods, cultivated fields, and the broad ri ers was underwood uphoaved, thile upon the other side the plain subsided lowering cantern Abbloam; the size of probably the shole of new york with that number of people, under the waters of Inke Angeline drowning every one in their very beds like rats in a true, too this day now the waters of three other streums suddenly arrented by the upheaveal of the soil lower down the atreams, had flowed regidly buck tward their source, again to flow not loss impeticancy along their since untered their source, again to flow not loss impeticancy along their since untermal incline and to findnow the outlets into the great lake.

Then after the disaster, the inhabitants of neighboring towns that garvived came to visit the scene of it, they found the whole suspect of the district altered, and far off conflegrations of terrible fury reging in the Mic-Hollecter Forests. The valley of the Mic-Hollecter Rum, secred to have consed to exist, and an immens one of smoke and fire covered the space which i it occuried, repreted mountains on each side of the valley appeared like many errorsous volcanoon in viology synthesis.

Eeyond the wast reservice of loke Angeline, to the south, six streams which formorly fortliked the country as far nouth as Calverinia tate had also disappeared, and that region was a smoking valley of the chadow of death. The whole country was covered with smouldering rune and scheep, all the cultivated fields, the humber and villages had been involved in this most tremendous of cataclysms.

For the bonofit of the Abbicandam Counce, the record of this great catactrophe was being preserved and rade out not only by visitors who came to the scene as close as it was passed and rade out not only by visitors who came to the scene as close as it was passed, and how loke Abbicann was formed during the catactrophe by the flood over the lower wenter

This some places oveked by its berrid origin, and its mysterious aspect and the wrockage and other debris floating on its surface the delerous image of death. The waters extend over an area of two hundred leagues, to drain out down the former course of the rivers leaded down by waters of the big flood previous, and only in months probably years before it will drain out altosother so as to reveal whether any of the smaller buildings still remained under its surface.

As gearring viewed this stretch of water, it gave him the same feeling of viewing the famous dead again relation. For one can detect we trace of variation or satisfies

As grarring viewed this strotch of water, it gave him the same feeling of viewing the famous dead sea in palestine, for one can datect no trace of vegetation or onimal life, not a sound is heard upon its shores, impregnated with all kinds of wrockage that floated there, even birds avoid flying over its dreary surface. Here and there he could see floating what hemained or had been remaining of a house, or household furniture and other wrockage, and even now human bodies. It was the dead

To one yet gave now of the disasters in ulloncatt State, which also is an event lie one yet gave now of the abbicantian control terms of the time will when is so great that the culverlina and Abbicannian control terms of the time will when is knowledge of it use it in lating cureacous, and nearly all the writings of the horror will tend to cultivate the rising of the nation to the proper situation if it can and is proved that the foe was really responsible. The proper actuation if it can and is proved that the foe was really responsible. The proper actuation is proved that the foe was really responsible. The investigations prove that the horror was their due suspicions of the enemy. For their investigations prove that the horror was not of actual causes. It purper stated to graring that it is estimated that in the Libiarities of the whole civilized world their are more than two to three housand works treating of different arguments of the garthquaken and other natural disasters. But this phenomena is greatly strunge to all of them, even the checks, though by man means of delicate instruments of various kinds, called sciemosters the direction of ourth movements can be traced, and their force gauged, while by means of a simple of ourth movements can be traced, and their force gauged, while by means of a simple made made in the concurring of the cause of the proper without an earthquake in some portion of the globe. If this horror actually happened without an earthquake in some portion of the globe. If this horror actually happened without an earthquake in some portion of the globe. without an earthquake in some portion of the globe. If this horror actually happened and Abbieunn would have been twice as far away as Japan is from chicago, eastward, chig Chicae would have felt the shock enough to disturb these instruments. Indeed Abbieunn, the most famous city of calverinia seen as it was from every part indeed Abbieann, the most famous city of galverinia seen as it was from every part of the high elevations of land, and its neighborhood formed the most prominent feuture of that portion of the frightful and devastated part of Bengalistate. In all parts of abbieannia for many centurels centuries this city had been an object of the greatest interest and certainly not the least of the many great attractions of one of the most of all notables of galverinia. And Abbieann with its Lake shore constituted as grand a panaroma as any to be seen in the world. The mountainous country fores'ed thickly beyond was a link in the historical chain of all beautiful spots of the Calverinian states. Before the days of the disast disaster it seems to have been unknown as a endangered province.

Walter starring resided there when a small boy, and so did the father and uncle of the Vivian Girls too. Violet and her sisters had been in the city several times and admired it, and its strangely pious people very much .

About Abbiemm in the east especially rises many forested hills, and there are forest hammed in plains and meadows well cultivated and inhabitated all around. Indeed Abbieann was surrounded by a galverinian garden of gden. Also Abbieann was a huge Chi Chicago of Calverinia, it had its ernormous established railway center, but yet had all the qualities of New York and Chicago combined, had its elecated train roads, subways, big factories, and every classic building imaginable. The northern part is situated on an elevated ground between the two huge rivers, and its position was considered unusually important, its lake port being as of the best, and its river navigation was splendid. Many villas of great splendor were owned in the neighborhood by Abbieannian patricians, the nother of the Vivian Girls the supress in her calire earliest days resided here on an estate which amperor Vivian had given her. Often violet and her sisters had been in this estate. Abbleam also was a city of great circumstances, its origin being ascribed by Abbleamian tradition to emigrants from northern Abbleamia, but it is not certain that it was actually founded by an Abbleamian Emigrant colony. From what this city is, its destruction has the same effect upon good parts of Calverinia and other states, as would happen if New york Chicago, New Orleans and antennacio and other places would cause with all railroad and other communications cut off. The oldest building of Abbleam was an ernormous two hundred foot temple very much in the shape of the temples formed in the time

This temple by common consent is stated to have been with pomp and ceremony, accompan ied by processions and carnatvals, dedicated to both the Blessed Virgin and Our _lessed ford, in honor of the Passon. The situation of all parts of Abbieann before the great disaster possessed many local and general advantages. It had more waterways than any city in the world, recieved its drinking water from Lake Angeline. And upon the verge of this inland son, at the mouth of a large stream by the citys name. with a fertile country all around, like even many an American or italian town it united the conviencinces of commerce with the whole nation and world, with the security of an ernormous military station and mobi mobolization camps. All this too was destroyed. The delightful position of the city, the warm all year summer climate of the locality and its many attractions caused it to become a favorite retreat of the wealthier Abbicannians who purchased estates in the neighborhoods, unperor vivian himself having a villa there. That villa, as Starring found was the only estate not injured by the disaster. And Abbienn had as many banks, big ones too, as All the big merican cities put together, and fortimately for the Abbienmian nation though the banks were destroyed, ctarring and others with him claimed all the values of the banks they discovered were completely secure, and will be so long as the forces of the enemy do not take possession of the territory.

To give a full description of Abbieann would take too much to tell here, many volumes to fill.

If gharring had not or did not believe some of the eyewitnesses who testified for him he would have probably himself believed that it was an earthquake and volcanic cruption that everthres the cities of Abbicann Mildred resoluter and others, accompanied by a still more terrible entastrophe which completed the ruins of the city and the country side, of the event which he was a ratriving at, gtarring fortunately obtained a singularly graphic description by one who was not only an eye witness but well qualified to observe and record the phenomena, a surviving refugee from a town far north of Abbicann. Starring learning the identy of the person went to see him in a refugee camp northwost of Abbicann. On being introduced he spoke for a few minutes with the man and then said;

" I hear you have been an eye witness of the disaster, How happens it was you were out collate that night?"

"Sir, I was a soldier on guard at Cicero Junetion, and kn w knowing that you are one of the high officers of general Vivians army I will gi e you a story which is absolt the control of the city of Abbieann as Cicero is too far off. I have since however read a good neaded of the news relating to the nature of the dises ter but I could relate a good deal more in order to transmit a more exact relation to it's and its nature, to merit my acknowledgement, so that should you sir intend to make any bigges bigger descriptions of the calamity with your pen, its memory among the world in general I feel very much assured will be rendered imperishable, I belong to general Morinio Mansions command, and was at that time on guard in the camps at Cicero Rum. I was assigned to be on guard at the outskirts of the camp on the midnight hour of that fatal morning and as I took my post the coporal of the guard desired me to observe a huge black cloud which seemed of us unusual shape, and which though it was night was easily seen because of the light reflected on it by m both the moon and the 'glare of the distant forest fixes fires. As I said the cloud was of unusual shape and de dimensions. Instead of moving forward like a big thundercloud, it rolled and bulged and pushed usward, and at the same time there was a noise like a tremedous cannonade, the concuesion of which hulred me flat upon my face and made me accidentally discharge my musket in falling. The whole camp was swayed by the shock, the barracks being partly wrecked and the tests coming down upon the sleeping soldiers within.

Another noise sounded as if the houses in the town of cicero was falling. I Immeadiately arose and the corporal of the guard, aroused the whole camp, and the general and his officers proceeded to a rising ground from which they might more districtly mark this strange and very incommon appearance.

I heard one officer remake;
"I believe it is Mt joan. She must be in eruption. It is from there."
It at that distance; it could not be clearly puricyed perceived from what mount the cloud issued, but it was afterward accertained to proceed from the distant plains and rolling meadows and not from any mountain or volcanc. I cannot better less or the figure of the cloud thum by comparing it to a series of tremendous thunder heads rolling up to an ernormous height, and even extending far overhead in great rolls lighted by the forest fires. I never saw clouds before once up to such a great height and extend itself at the top into a kind of rolled up bridge occassioned

I imagine either by a suddon wind storm up above that impelled it upward, the force of which increased as it advanced upward, or by the expansion of the expansions the expansions of the expans

Tward morning while the army wan still on the way, a note by a courier was brought to him from mostinia, a town nearest blooms, which was in or at atmost alarm at the imminont peril shich threatened the country side, for the note, stated, that the whole city of Ab Abblowan had disappeared, the countryside for many hundreds of alles was being devastated by an encourage flood, and that the forcest fire was b aring down upon the Mic-Hollestor Rum Valley where many hig towns are situated, the fire cutting off all escape by the hills and river. The courier cannotity entretted the general, who really was laughing, not to think it a laughing matter, or that he was crasy and telling semething too big to be true, that he couldcame and see for himse himself it he did not believe it, and to hastes to the assistance of the towns which were either burning or flooded.

The general however had the man arrested, believing him a medman, and then he accordingly changed him fame, and what he began out of curiouslty, now continued continued out of more herolom. Ordering the ambles to cross the river at this point he found it unusually swellen, that the water was traveling against its usual course and that a loves nearer by the yet some distance off was threatening to give way.

He hastened our whole army to the place which leves rungers and rarkers were abandoning abendening in terror, he steered our army irrectly tward the point of danger, and believe believe me we worked like between and asked that in leves.

mills we were working , the general had so much composite of mind that he was able to make and dictate his observations on the changes and aspects of that new and dr ad ful scene.

He released the courier, now believing that the can really told the truth, and the general felt some vague horror that some awful catastrophe was on hand especially when he listened again to the storry of Abbieann disappearing to where heaven knowns where, when he knew the size of that city.

While going further the army got so close to one part of the forest fire, that the burning cinders, came upon us, and the smoke fog grew thicker and thicker, and the start heater the nearer we approached, and the saiden changed course of the river and wast clouds of smoke durkening the morning sky as if a storm was approaching, ob structed our advance any further in that direction. Pausing to consider whether he should three our whole army into a fight against the conflagration, he was advised by his staff to change his course and march to the southwost, and , heard him exclaims; "norture boys always befriends the brave, prowing to the south we must cut through the Red Plague-Have the army fight it as I planned. We must go through."

After marching through the mark for quite a number of miles, we came to la a large bend in the river which separated the army from the other shore, but here the river was overflowing westward, and the region was impassable. The g neral had already sent his baggage wagon train some distance shead for though not at that time in actual danger, yet being within prospects of it, he was dt determined if the forest fires drew nearer to put to the flood or the river as soon as the wind would change. The wind was favorable however for carrying the forest fire the opposite direction, and the army soon came upon a horde of refugees floeing in the greatest consternation. The army halted the fugitives, encouraging and commelling the people to keep up their spirits, and still better to disop dissipate the general alarm, he ordered with an air of concern a part of the army to keep moving on, while the rest should be deployed in line on the opposite stift, side to combat the fire is if necessary. After having this prepared for, he managed the cavarly with great cheerfulness, or what was equally courageous with all the semblance of it.

Meanwhile when the army had gotten some distance off from the flooded some, new forest fires broke forth in several places with great fury, and the darkness of the coming night contributed to render the glare of the awful big flames still more visible or dreadful.

But the general was determined to push on in spite of it, and to soothe the tarm anxieties of his staff declared the fires was moving northeastward, and that the army was not in its path. After this the whole army retired to rest, and it was certain the general himself was so little discomposed as to fall into a deep sleep. The ground which led to his headquarters being nearly covered with water from the ever rising flood, it would have been impossible for the general had he continued there longer, to have escaped from being drowned or making his way out of the building, it was thought proper therefore to awaken him. Many of the soldiers had broke camp because of the spr r p spreading waters, and gone to higher ground. The general in some disguist diagust arcse, and joined his startled staff officers and the rest of his retainers who had not been unconcerned enough to think of retiring. They consulted together which course would be the more prudent, to trust to the fire endangered forcets far beyond the reach of flood, which now were swaying and writi writhing before a fierce gale blowing, or to escape by pontons over a part of the flooded river, or chance a navagitation of the flood, where the waters were already risin in such quantities as netwithstunding its slowness at this section, was threatening destruction.

In this dilemma they decided on the forests, as offering their greatest chance of safty despite the fire, a resolution which while the rest of the staff generals hastily adopted it through their greater fears of the flood, the general embraced only after cool and deliberate consideration.....

It was decided to have the whole army fight its way through the forest fire. all the army dacked itself in the water to wet their clothing, and the wagen trains were loaded with refilled ater water casts, and all implements were not ready for the immercus murch.

Then the army went forth, all having wet blankets or pillows, and sacks tied upon their their heads with napkins ropes, and twin and tyl this was their no sole defense against the falming branches and leaves that might fall upon them. Such an adventure seemed naite serious to me, but I mid not back out scared though we all were. Py morning it was day everywhere else, but there and here a deeper darkness prevailed than in the most obscure night, though it was in some degree dissipated by the glare of the conflagrations. The army was forbidden to use torches. At first our general thought it proper to go down further slong the shore of the flood, to ascertain whether contorns could be made but found the flood extremely high and boisterous.

I know that day was supposed to be rapidly breaking, but when it did come the light was exceedingly faint an languid, the trees all around us were shoking and fluring, and though the whole army was fighting its way through it seemed as if we were a large body of souls fighting our way for freedom out of hell I came to an area that was narrow and confined, even though here was some open ground, but we felt we could not remain without certain and formidable peril, and we therefore remelved to quite the open. The soldiers fought desperately in a panic of alarm and as to a mind distracted with terror every surgestion of how to fight it here, and how to fight it there, before and to the side of you, seemed more prudent than the other. The soldiers pressed on in grant grouped lines, and we got through to a considerable way, but were working deeper and deeper tward the roaring heart of the conflagration. To go on that was was like throwing yourself into a volcano of lava.

while we were get a convient distance from the flames, the whole army halted in the midst of a perilous and most dreadful scene. The artillery which our officers had ordered to follow the roads in the forests were used ut times to shell the trees and bring them down ahead of the fire. gometimes a branch line of the fire seemed to roll back on Itself and to be driven on in another direction by the winds which put the forest in convolsive throos, while we were fighting our way through a hot tempest of wind smoke and blazing shrubbery and trees..

To ar left a black and torrible cloud seemingly to burst withwith with an ingeous surpentine vapor darted out a long train of undulating fire resembling, but much longer and larger than the wave of the sea. soon after the black cloud seemed to descend and enshroud the whole region, as in truth it consealed every other sight from us so that we hardly knew our bearings, and we almost believed we had died and descended into the infernal regions if not for good, then for an adventure. Illing embers now began to come down moon us, though in no r considerable quantity. Turning my head I percised to the left of us again a dense wall of smoke which came rolling trad us and in our track like a torrent. The general now was proposing to his staff, while there was yet some light to diverge from this region altogether, lest the conflagration should overwhem the whole army. Scarcely had we stepped aside when darkness oversproud us, worse than that of a closed night, more like in a closed chamber or closet.

Then nothing could be heard but the exclumentions of the men. some swore at then the enemy over the loss of their little ones, oty others for the sulguhter of their parents, and being only able to distinguish p comrades by their voices, many lifted their hands up tward Heaven, but most imagined the last eternal night had come, hich should destroy the world and the whole population toge ther.

rinally to om some relief a glimmer of light appeared, which they felt sure was an approaching burst of flames, as in truth it was, and not the return of day. The fire however raging at some distance from us, we were again ermserched in great and dense darkness, and a heavy shower of leaves and branches fell upon us, which we were at times compelled to shake off othe otherwise we might have been set on fire. Then after a long while this dreadful darkness gradually disappeared like the rolling away of the cloud of smoke, the actual day partly returned, and with it the sum, though very faintly, for it shone like a red bull through the smoke hase in the sky.

Every object that presented itself to our eyes, which were extremely weakened by the smarting censation from the smoke, seemed changed, as if a world had been burned up and was smoking. We got through the edge of the burning forest, and finally headed acain to the southwest, passing another unxious h night between hope and fear, though indeed with a much larger share of the latter, for the floods far off still increased, while several excited soldiers ran up and down augmenting their own and their friends

Finally when we got far offfrom the fires, we came entirely upon the main flood itself. We encamped upon a high rise of ground within perfect view of the great flood to the west, and the conflagration to the east. Our general began to believe that the graphic note brought by the messenger had been confirmed in every respect for the flood hore, and the forest fire there were terrible in all their circumstances the rolling seas of water, louded with wreckage, the cloud of darkness, the flames searing the distant sky, the roaring of the flood, the night of many floating houses and bodies in in the water, but yet more terrible in its novelty of character and seem ingly wide ran e of its influence. These combined scenes would appear to have exer cised a fatal effect upon Abbleaun, but we hoped ardontly that the reports might have been exaggerated and that all might have encaped. To approach any further was out of the question, and the hills were crowded with refugees from the flood and fire who might have saved themselves by immediate flight. Many sought refuge on the highest part of the hills for fearing the fired would become and overtage them. It seemed the would die of hunger or even sufficiation, as alsowhere all avenues of egress were absolutely blocked up. It is impossible to exaggerate the horrors of the flood we viewed from the hills.

The rembling roar of the waters below, the dense obscurity and marky shadow of the heaven above, the long heavy broll of the distant fires, the strident noise of the blazing forests, the shifting clove which at intervals relieved the blackness only made it more ghastly than before, the het hissing showers which rose and then descended like a rain of fire, the clash and clang of meeting rocks thrown up by fic fire made explosions, the hurrying fugitives, with wan faces and straining eye balls, calling on those they love to follow them, the smoke and wind borne aches, driving through the darknes country, and pouring into the towns, above all that, that fog of chocking smoke and forest times which entered everywhere, penetrating even the lowest cellar, cave or times and against which all homen skill could devise no protection whatever all these things sir were combined into a whole of such immedial and such awful terror that no one can even realize it unless they went through the same experience.

The stoutest heart wasness as soldiers was appalled, the best belanced mind lost its very composure and even from nerves qualled ht such a same of doubt and destruction all around him. Tany mir lost their reason, and wandered through the area gibb ering and shricking madmen, and none of us the survived the peril ever forget the sights and scenes of fleed add forest fires which we witnessed on many days and

Thenty seven days and nights air, were thus endured with all the anguish of suspense and encortainty. On the 27th day the darkness by degrees began to clear away and we found the flood had gone done considerably, and the darkness and the waters too began to clear away. The day appeared, like twilight, but not the sum, ,, , and all nature geemed changed. Esfore out view to the west was a sea of wreckage of all descriptions and there was neither life nor motion in any of the view before as and to the east and south there was a sea of rising white smoke as if a sea of volcances still brouthed forth fire and smoke.

The scene before us was changed, it looked as if all was over, and smoke and wind was still on, and sities and towns in the path of the flood were gone. Though we did get as near as possible to Abbiesna, after more than two months of marching over districts of ruin and horror, we began to believe that Abbiesna was no more as we could not find any traces of the city. In the region of Abbiesna was a desolated forest on one side, and a flood of water on the other side with no monuments visible no house to be seen, nothing but a great surface of smoke and water, which if any northern part of the city did survive the smoke hid from our view. It was not untill just no now that, with some regiments was sent to add the forest fire refugees near here, and where we discovered this part of Abbleaun to have curvived partly but in rules. But I assure you there as no eruption, no eruption did thi. I believe surely it was mines exploded by the enemy."

The region of Bengull State now the scene of one of the most celevrated disasters in the world (in tyl this story) is situated not far from central calverinia, and is one of the Provinces of the wide country of alverinia. Tile gtarring was here, many of his followers often alluded to the numerous cracks that was reported to have been formed over hundreds of miles of the country, and by some it was believed to haw have been caused by natural earthquakes. Starring had wished to explore this region, but for a time the smoke of the forest fires and the heats of the flames made the region almost unapproachable, and as he had seen it had seemed as if in the darkness a times a red rolling flame sweeped the whole country side with the uproar of the sen. One witness claimed to the scene as being caused by explosions of sruptive energy. Many other "itnesses speak of the disaster as the "explosion of the earth". He suid" the flames proceeded from the uttermost depths of hell, the thunderous noises were the exploding of the planet, and a terrific war in hell caused the concussions." while the many "itnesses on one hand had invested the region with various supernatural attributes, and nade it the region of country where hell opened up its fury from the uttermost depths of the earth, others endeavored to show that the "eruptions" and other phenomena of the musual disaster could be explained more than by the efforts of the ordinary operations of nature.

Sterring found mention of the many fissures in the country by Genefal nargar, earthquake scientists, and many other investigators..... One scientist wrote a brick history of the cracks, and described a crossing of one of the largest by bridge makin making. The position of one of the biggest fissures was described at length by the earthquake scientist Palfor, and a brief account of it was given to GBarring by Starring by singigore, who investigated one of the strange fissures at the time. As this fissure was one of the most considerable of the cracke found, it attracted a great deal of attention, and was described by many ere witnesses. The length of this fissure was not determined. The earlier incestigators had very exaggerated exaggerated notions on the subject, and a la length of three or four miles has been assertained. It must be borne in mind that such cracks is liable to variations in length. There are two ruined cities, Cantania, and Prutia and seventy three towns or villiages in the vinicity of these fissures, and no less than one million three hundred thousand and vinicity of these fissures, and no less than one million three hundred thousand and sixty five per people lived in this region.

How many had been injured and killed during the disaster is not know as yet. And and the remarkable feature of the region is the large number of minor explosion A craters which are scattered throughout the country side. They look small in comparison with the great mass of big explosion craters nearest Abbicann but in realir reality some some of them are of large size. The best period gearing pelieved of making an investigation of these or issures was when the sunke or invest times would us ariven out of a strong westwin westerly wind, and before there was danger of the forest fires crossing into this territory. Just nor all paths are obliterated, and in this condition even into this territory. Just now all paths are obliterated, and in this condition even Starrings followers would refuse to accompany him.

A list of the number of fissures from the carliest discoveries has been given to

A list of the number of the cemini.

Starring also took down a list of the number of smaller explosions that occurred in this vinicity that evening of the fatal night before the big ones came. The first explosion probably happened at nine oclock at night, the second occurred at fifteen explosion proceeds an interest at the occord at their, one second occurred at interest minutes after nine... The third explosion occurred at about seventeen minutes after the same how, and it ast have been the same explosion that rocked believe and alarmed the population for a time. An explosion montioned by an en eyewithes happened three minutes later. An outburst of a score of simultaneous explosions of terrific force took place near Meldorn at nine thirty and harled debris in clouds upon the country side and again convulsed the city. He had no records of any further explosions for about twenty minutes till about ten minutes to ten. At that time an explosion occured and the same aurthorities mentioned to him of an explosion within two minutes after, four minutes later Ralso town was nearly destroyed by another explosion. Nother of which he possesses no details occured at one minute after ten. Not: another appear a concussion and blast which took place at eleven minutes after. Then after the passing of two minutes three blasts occured like terrific eraptions. The next blust of which he took record of was at quarter after ten after which things were quiet for nearly half an hour but them a violent eruption of explosions lasting nine minites without ceasing is recorded. In explosion of more violence occured two minutes and fifteen seconds later. Then he had no other record for nearly ten minutes. Then there was an explosion that threatened the ruin of the country side. After another long interval, in this case of more than three quarters of an hour and a half, the explosions amin reared but further north. At twenty minutes past seleven one of the first most disasterone explosions occured. It caused a concussion like a violent sarthquake, which was felt as fur as Wicky Luncin, and which destroyed childs mu in the course of a few seconds, burying fifteen thousand people under the ruins! Everyone like at abbleaus were killed in their beds. There was farther away a great explosion on the eastern lundacape at twelve minutes after eleven. A great cloud of debris descended in the some vinicity two minuses later. Another witness was in Morrir city and witnessed near by a very violent explosion of which he sent to gtarring a recorded report. At about twenty minutes after eleven, the country side was strongly convulsed, terrible noises were heard, and flashes of flames issued from the scene of the crash, mingled with a great cloud of dense black smoke.

A second later a cloudburst of soft earth , rocks and debrie of all kinds poured down upon the town. Immediately after a fresh explosion took place, and then enother which occured five minutes later. In explosion which lasted for twelve minutes occured at the same time at another location. A violent shock of the concussion caused the and the same thing at another the there was quiet until about quarter to twe over trelve. Then again there occured an explosion which two place tward the close of the last minutes of 'welve. A large quantity of earth was hurled up by this blast and saveral holes dug deep in the ground near the town of Algelio.

Minute later another fresh crease occured. A number of new craters were dug and a quantity of debris hurled tward wickey Lansin destroying a part of violet Lansin, and the villiage of Mic Holler.

Three other minor explosions occured within two minutes. Between twelve and fifteen minutes after twelve six explosions again occ ed, and two minutes later a part of Poverty ann was destroyed by a violent concussion, and in the following hour shocks became frequest frequent. He took a more detailed account of the explosions from One to twelve after one. These explosions were in every respect the most terrible on record of any explosions known. For hours the sky was obscured by the smoke and because of the explosions a strange hot whirlwind blew over the forest fires at the distance, and at the same time abbieum and other cities were destroyed, and the concussions continued to increase in violence for over twelve minutes, at the end of which all parts of Abbieum was converted into a smoking heap of ruins.

Because of the concussions as it was reported many fissure opened over the whole country side for hundreds of miles. The fu fissures many of them were only six feet to seven wide but they seemed to be of unknown depth. Six explosions of terrific force occured in a line with the principal river course, and hurled up wast volumes of smoke accompanied by thundering that could never be described and which as estimated could be heard more than ten thousand miles off.

Also after being so long in Abbieann, he obstained from witnesses a record of the course of the forest fire that passed off tward the east after threatening the rules or Abbleaun. The first appearance of the fire presented a front of fourty seven miles, it encirled encircled St AMN city, and afterwards burned tward Jean a town of eighteen thousand inhabitants which was speedily destroyed. Seven seas of fire spread through other sections of the forests, and in three days united into one forming one large configurations a budged which was the state and the transfer of the sections of the forests, and in three days united into one forming one large conflagration a hundred miles in length and thirty in widty width. The sea of fire continued to race on, and it destroyed the town of porestalen on geptember Ith. On the same day the conflagration struck a Cant used by forest rangers to blaset trees in fighting such fires, and the force of the explosions cust up large quanties of earth, flaming trees, and dirt and scattered the fire over new territories. The explosion caused a concussion. The original current of the fire being opposed by some large clearings in the forest had divided into three seas, one of which destroyed gan Pedro the second. Guileine, and the third the forested hills on the left or west side of the Mic-, ollester Rum and afterwards the villiage of gistleton. Fourteon other villiages were afterwards ewept out of existen e, and the fire made its way tward

At St Rose ten miles from the city, an explosion caused by the fire through mysterio s origin underwined a small hill covered with forests and hurled it forward a considerable distance, and the whole region formed into one furnace. When the swething hell came close to Adeleheid, it barnee barned on without stopping, until it came close to the rivers edge and then gave tarring his most stirring adventures o in the fire from there a ll the way to Abbigann and oven thoreanother prion of the sare fire melted down a garden wall made of rocks, and carried death and destruction in its course.

On september 3th, the fire spread along the river at race horse moved, which it endravored to cross to the forest on the apposite side, but a suddon westerly wind prevented the disaster.

On barning along the rivef front how v however the heat was so terrific that the water nearest the shore began to boil violently and cloude of steam arose. The volume of fire raging here borned over many millions of cobic feet within three hours.

The length of this branch of the fire was a hendred and fifteen miles while its avergae average width was between seventeen and twenty miles, so that it was able to progress forward at an unestimated rate of speed. The fire burned up the precipices of the region of delened. cloude of black emoke poured from the ravine, and large noises resembling the dischurge of artillery were heard. The fires heat undermined the forested slopes of a high steep hill and it collapsed buying the town of catantori and its eighteen thousand limbifunts under that terrible flory mass. It is said that in all p to Adeleheld fifty small cities and towns were destroyed by the forest fire since it becam its career in southeastern calverinia, together with the driving to punic and filg t over one million six handred and seventy two thousand inhabitants and burning to death over one hundred thousand others.

Close to Adeleheld a great column of black smoke issued from a burning ravine from hich which great tongues of fire could be observed. Boud detonations of explosions were heard, and two streams of fire spread above the ravine moving in two opposite directions. A new fire produced by sparks and heat formed near the east of Adeleheld and a quanity of flames covered the sky over the city. An extraordinary flood of water descended from some hill carrying all before it, and streving its path with all kinds of wreckage but flowing far from the fire. It was estimated that the volume of which of wreckage our illowing far from the fire. It was estimated that the volume of water was about 176,000,000 cubic feet, probably a greater amnount than could flow from river to the sea in a day. It formed a channel six miles broad, and in some places for thour y feet deer, and it flowed at the rate of three miles a minute during the first fourty miles of its course. The flood was probably produced by the heat of the forestire on the slopes causing the collaspe of some dam near by, probable the walls of the dam may have been almost melted or turned red hot by the heat of such awful seas of flame.

The fire raced on, encounted a portion of St Peters villiags, and separated again into two branches, each of which seemed to nevertheless regain its length. Vast c volumes of smoke were carried over the country of galverinia seeming to form a gi santic cloudy conopy between Calverinia, Angelinia and Abbieannia through which the sum would not shine. The fire pashed on tward North Bend sweeping the cities already mentioned at which Starring came. The fire then was forced to divide into twenty one seas, and then into thirty in a line running northward along the river front only soon again to unite into one moneterous fire. The conflagration advanced on untill it reached within thirty miles south of north Bend, and here it slightly changed its course. Again it divided into three sections the two main ones of which scon for an hour or so became at a standstill, while the central fire continued to move on at the rate of one hundred miles an hour. The heat at the distance of fourty miles II6. F

Then a new fire formed just beyond, and raced on to threaten the city of Morth Bend but it form fortunately encountered a clearing near the bend and was diverted into another course. While the rangers were watching the progress of the flames after their unc unsuccessful effort to check it, the front of the conflagration was suddenly blown up as if by a volcanic eruption.

In an instant red hot masses of flaming earth, embers, branches of trees were hurled in every direction, ad a cloud of singing flame and emoke enveloped everything. Fronty six rungers were killed on the spot, and thirty survived but a few hours, and the rest were too injured to resume their work.

A very aware process of the forest fire was witnessed by a party of tourists whom to tarring who were ascending a hilitop in order to witness the sum rising through a haze of smoke. As they up approached the nearest prion of the portion of the summit the forest fire was viewed in a panoruma of greatsize. In a narrow defile they were met by a vi violent hurricane of fire, which overthrew the horses and the riders, and forced them tward a large forcested ravine. They shelted themselves beneath some masses of great rocks, when suddenly the fire appeared racing up the slopes and the horses field in terror. The tourists head to flee themselves on foot, fortunately when the slope is the slope of the slop reaching the summit whead of the conflagration without having sustained any injury. The fire raced across and into this ravine, branching off so that one section roared on up to the summit, while the other embraced the whole hillside to the left. The conflagration continued with abated fury during the arrival at the summit as the flames cannot proceed down hill as fast as they do uphill and the adventuerers were saved.

The entire mass of fire rearing up these slopes is estimated to be equal to an area sixty miles long, by six miles broad, twenty to the center, with an average speed ephill at fifty six miles an hour.

The conflagration curled around the northeast side of the mountain, and burned onward at about the same rate, and divided into two sections. This part of the conflagration worked around the other side of the mountain burning downward and upward, and new fires increased to seven in number and they were all raging along a line stretching down from the summit. Something buring on the summit caused three loud crashing detenution three or four times a minute.

account for three or roth times a minute.

It will be seen from the foregoing account that there is a great similary similarity in the general character of the forest fires here, to the other kind else enumerative in the general character of the forest lires here, to the other kind else where. Explosions of mysterious crigin accompany the fires, loud indeed, and sometimes fire sweet slopes pretend to be volcanoes in evention when molten sand, etone and rock run down the slopes melted by the heat, sometimes the fire localises itsels rock run down the slopes melted by the heat, sometimes the fire localises itsels itself in one or two big rawines where all the trees are burned out, and accumultue accumulate a crater like appearance full of fiery smoking debris, altimately great clouds of smoke rise from this. Out of the seventy eight stretches of the forests clouds of smoke rise from this. Out of the seventy eight stretches of the forests mentioned to have been wiped out, a comparatively small number of the bigger forests have been endangered, but they too are in the path of the conflagration.

Thus the stronguam and beautiful city of Abbieumithe main and only best commercial metropolis metropolis of Abbieumia was first neduced to a help of ruine and then swept to total destruction by a great flood. The number of persons who perioded in abbieum is estimated at eight million, and three hundred and fifty large cities, and one thousand six hundred big towns, and thousands of towns and villiages throughout culverinia and Angelinia and other starts states of towns and villiages throughout calverinia and Angelinia and other states were destroyed totally and beyondrecovery.

The grouter number of those who lost their lives were either buried amid the ruins of the houses, or in the cities covered up by mountain elides, and by the flood, but many also perished in the fires that were kindled in most of the towns not touched by encuped and many who were only half buried in the ruins, and who could have been saved if help had been at hand, were left to die a slow death by roacting. The Mayor of the town of Phulsio and his family had taken refuge in a cellar, and were entombed in it alire by the manese of rubbien, and Ingored for days, during which their cries sounded till death came to end their sufferings. One great instance os the disaster Starring till death came to end their sufferings. One great instance on the disaster Starring kept record of is that of the destruction of Violet Langin. herself from her perilous position and secured clothing mong the ruins.

Of still more shocking interest was the case of the Mayors wife of that city.

Of etill more checking interest was the case of the Mayors wife of that city, she had fainted at the moment of the first great shock caused by the explosions, and mas lifted by her has and husband, who bearing her in his arms was hurrying tward the open aquare, when a hidden Clandelinian eniper shot him dead. On recovering her senses she observed thather twe little girls and a boy had been left behind. Taking adventure of a mement when the Glandelinian vanduls did not see her, she darted of and running back of her loves, which was still standing, she wred her children to follow her. rushing with them following her, she headed tward the stair case, but found the stairs were aftre, berring all further progress is that direction.

the then followed by her children fled from room to room, chased by the falling materials, and at last reached a belicony as her last refuge.

Bolding up her youngest child, she implored the few passer by for help, but they were Glandelinian vanidals in disguise, and they shot her children dead before her your eyen, and then blew up the building, so that she was hurled into the devoring flames. There were many cases to be recorded of devotion and sacrifice similar to that of this burse woman but manufally introduced by manufally and the manufally in the ma to that of this brave woman, but unusually attended by more happy results. In the great radicults of instances however the instinct of fierce savagery among the vandals overcume every other feeling, rendering the wretched Clandelinian foes callous to the danger and suffering of others. There were two cases of persons being rec rescued alive from the ruins, after a laspe of four or five days, and two on the eighthiday ad after interment. These who were thes reacted, all suffered most from thirst and heat.

Bignring realized that before the very world would nave time to realize the extent of a theastern calverinta. He not al a almost us the world would feel, ever the fact that own before and after the Abbicann horror all of eastern and southern and southeastern Calverinia from July 1912 till new, Late September 1913 had been swept and devastated by other terrible distanters, hornible, beyondcomprehension, and especially passing through a tremendous batizm of fire, a disaster more terrible in the complete ness of the wholesale destruction but only less terrible in the number of dead, than that which followed the explosion, concumulan and flood disasters . ctarring cometimes on account of these disasters, and their terrible results, almost lost faith in the whope hope of seeing belieunnias cause won, for the enemy was in pseession of all of Calverinia except the extreme north, and the disasters were even frustrating the efforts of christian christian armies of reaching the 100.

worse to gtarrings surprise and horror a new forest fire, in the northwestern region purst out in sympathetic fury, although forest fire outbreaks had showed signs of coming even earlier than the time of Starrings arival to Appleann. Unmown to him forest fires had been raging for ninty consecutive days and nights, Previous to the date of his arival of the city, out because of the continued steady southwest and ast east winds had not come down this way. Yet this time Starring and his followers were no now cut off entirely from every chance of reaching the ship, and it seemed as if the city was one springing up out of the Haden Regions. Every day and night for all the time the wast columns of smoke rose over the whole scene, becoming denser and denser and explosions were numerous, and a rain or fire would continually rfall upon some parts of the city, keeping Starring and his followers under cover. The earth shook violently for every explosion in the forest, and then ever the wind changed to the east a midnight darkness screau over the whole country.

The fire storm rearea about the eastern a ction for one whole week without ceasing out finally one morning it became intermittened and further away. So far Starring entimated that the loss of life in these disasters would never be icla in full. He claimed the loss among his own followers because of the enemy and the fires, and accidonts as about twenty rive hundred in killed or injured. They included most of the more daring Culverinian soldiers, which means that he and the rest of his followers would have to be extremely more careful.

From the north of Abbienn the forest fire was visible, though fourty miles away. Ween finally the adventuers got on their ship, the captian tried to force the way to the northwest, to reach the upper subtro of Appleann called "The Meldorn Horseshoe nend but run into such a cloud of dan dense smoke that you could not see an inch ahead. or four hours the ship was helpless in this cloud of smoke and gases from the fires, which was de se than any clouds encountered ever pefore, but the ship finally succeeded. Then Herse hoe Bend was finally reached at the afternoon, it was found full of panic stricken refugees who had sought refuge there. The streets of the ruined city was found strewn with the refurees, which was fitteen miles away from the closest of the explos ion craters. Here the distress arong the raragees was great. The rire as seen has not yet come up to the North mend, though up the sides of some slopes leading to it, there had threatened to auvance strengs of forest fires, which uniting and seperating, formed a network from which there was no possible escape for any living thing esught within its grasp should it come up. By the terrific heat of the flames a river that had flowed in to the Mic-Hollester was arise up, and origins over it melted into peculiar shapes.

Deem the channel of this river there flowed to gtarring a surprise what appear ed to be molten lave, which glowed like molten stone, and which flowed slowly into the main river raising great clouds of steam, and the hissing of could be heard for miles. Investigating this with his classes, Starring observed that the tremendous heat of the forest fire was meltons so much rock on the slope of hills near the river, that they three ike lave and flowed down theoriver channel in a moltan state.

In other local locations the fury of the forest fire seemed to be lessening, but the most severe was raging elsewhere, and to go further out or up the river from north mend would be sucide.

Many searching parties were sent out as far as possible to investigate the rulh. Seventy estates were found to be ruined beyond hope of repair. Two catholic Churches had been provied under a stream of mid and water. Many houses were covered a half under nua open puries under a stream of mid and water. Pany nouses were covered a hair under dibris, and there was hardly a spet in porseehos pand that was not under from six to eight feet of debris. To come up here the steamer the yary June had ran through ten miles of smoke that was so dense that all who would have during on board would have been sufficiently or all that distance the ship had to be left to its own gold made. Some explosions diving the forest fires gave displays of fireworks more j majestic than had even been seen to the transitions. than had ever been seen by humanity.

The day after the ship had reached Horseshoe Bend starring noticing a high hill close by descended to the top to get a view of the forest fires further off so he could tell what the situation was. He say a small stream with its waters bubbling like a caldron and steam arcse from it in immense clouds. It was night when Starring still remained on the hill, and something like sulphuric flamen seemed to play about the sides of another distant hill civing it a weird and terrible appearance. Eteam from boiling streams and small forest lakes continued to rise in thick clouds, and strunge explosions made themders that were joined with them that come from the linter for of a valley-per hours the strange and splendid phenomena continued civing those h no doubt who lived in the vinicity ample time to escape. Starring and his followers seemed hypnotized by this score, and suddenly the main conflagration raged within good view, and to Starrings surprise saven seperate streams of molten rock journel berline boiling down the sides of the hill. Through his field glassen he sur very ledger of works near the edge of the conflagration turning red hot, and destruction was averywhere in its most terrible forms. Great shafts of flame seemed to lear fairly across the sky and fires were seen pouring through a valley. For this great tragedy to the foreste the settings were indeed wonderful.

The forest literally swayed in its agony before heat and fierce winds, and from the slopes of hills, usualta, and from rolling forests on plains majestic columns of smoke, inky clack or varied colors reached skywara in immense rolls and sheets, and pushed through the campy overhead. The scene was if a as it a humared dig craters were vomiting very high inconvescent matter, and something came down the slope or one river course that gave forth prismatic lights as it rolled away tward the river-Great waves of fire seemed to hears about one vig mountain top ten miles away. Such orest waves of fire seemed to heard adout one off mountain top ten miles dway. Note thander from expications as never had been heard by men cracked and rolled through the theavens, and starring wondered what the fires exploded so continuously. From the valleys neavens, and graring wondered what the lives explained so continued all serging in an would come tremendous detonations. These joined with the hinder all serging in an inceaseant necessant room that added to the punic of the fleeing inhabitants within his full view in that great height. This lasted through the night and the day following and the next night, and gtarring remained there all this time, watching clouds so black that they had at times the appearance of spendy arise to his estimated height

shes orn by the wind rose in clouds from the smoulders of places where the fire had spent its rage, and in this big cloud of smoke fire brands, and sparks and flaming enb embers of all kinds were continually carried skyward to deluge other forests for miles around. Each column of smoke would gradually musroom at the top spreading at in out in dense clouds that descended to bring hight at day, and the atmosphere was so laden wi with gas from the numing trees that life was made almost impossible within five miles of the plaze. Starring expected that perore rain ever came the entire forests forests of Calverinia would be destroyed, and nearly every hour was given by to prayers prayers. All that time when the wind was our the east the carkness overhead was beyond description save when everything was made light as broad day by the glare of the flames.

whe earth quakeed incessanty before the concussions of the numerous explosions, and hill on which stood Starring shook-the-gook, and stones, fire pranas and hot ashes never seased to fly perore the wind.. And so terrible were the thunders of the explosions that it seemed to guarring himseif, and his almost terrified followers that the universe was being rent in deces, and he wondered indeed and exceedingly where the explosions came from and decided to have these investigated also.

"Starring gaid to the Cartian" The way the country is being devastated here for hundreds of miles is appalling. Why not say that all the volcances in all the world were at this one spot and all in full and most violent eruption. I am really a brave were at this one spot and all in full and most violent ereption. I am really a brave man, and have become mixed a most of my career with dreadful buttles, spying expeditions and aknown parts of the drama of war, but never have I witnessed a scele scene like this of Abbieann or of these fires. It is dreadful."

"Yes and ack at that wall of smoke rising and completely covering the whole forest as far as the eye can reach. " remarked the Captian. We have rode for hours along this track in this swelthering heat and we cannot comprehend but that the world is coming to un end. PPraying for rain does not seem to do any good."

"From up here we can easily see the rawages wrought said starring. For miles around where the fire has passed the earth is seared and amouldering like incundescent matter and blackened fiseares and cras cracks caused by the explosions appear everywhere."

From here also they could see that to the southwest smoke like from a hundred thousand volcanic eruptions poured up as if from a huge yawning at of hell, while to the east the hill on which they suo stood ended abruptly into a deep va valley with a long forest covered slope, nd from their point of vantuge they could see no fewer than seven seven new forest fires raging ahead of the parent one, five great melted stone flows and a huge fie fire glow of a valley, a perfect scene or hell. uring all the time of their stay up here the heat day and night had been intense. Lyingfull liging full Length and perring over the edge of a fallen log into the depths of the huge forested valley below they now watched a new sight which was unforgettable. It was like peering into a huge volcanic crater.

From where they may the hill sloped greatly all the way down, and thickly fores forested. By daylight only the giantic gigantic volumes of smoke were visible but at night it was an inferno. The whole of this dreadful place, the sheer foreste forcest walls beyond, even the . great distant hills, were illuminated by this new fire, They could see the very pointem of the valley where waves of flame streamed upward upward many hundreds of feet tward the sky, lighting the columns of smoke to an immense neight in the air;

Shundering, remizing the overwhelming force and fury of this storm of nature Starring and his commanded hay there for hours lascinated. They wanted to leave, but an irresting and his command lay ensist in nours inscinates, her wantes to leave, was an irresting forter untill at last it almost singes, inally it was about three octock in the morning, when in a numb condition from laying so long, and with ciothing wet and arenches from sweating, they tore themselves away to return to Acoteons.

They started to Clamber o down hurriedly, holding to jugged coulders, slithering over heat naked earth,, the last hair of the descent accomplished by alluing on their nacks aown a steep wank of time cinder suma, on the side of the hill not too heavily forested country side many days before the explosions occured, and sent a cipher dispatch of warning to the coverner of Calverinia State. It was not disregarded, but who would know of the trounchieves explosion houror coming, and that all parties concerned should perion, and the message itself remains in the government archieves of Pandora and is to be forwarded to miseror Vivian as soon as some communications with at least Angelinia Agathia can be restored.

The Vivians girls Aunt was at Abbieann and had left the city for Angelinia Agathia on the ship called the Pandora, three weeks before the diseaster, he had planned to accord comestime in a ship them to study the good neons there, their yous and customs apond somewtime in ? Abbieann to study the good people there, their ways and customs and diagover why so big a population cannot have a mortal sinner among thom, not a criminal of any kind, but was alarmed by the horrors of the disasters recorded elsewhere and fearing a like fate for Abbieann, finally returned southward. It seems certain her fears saved her life. She reached A Angelinia Agathia just the very morning of the terrific disuster.

Newspapers printed in the neighboring northern counties for some days before the great disaster, included correspondence from Abbieann and Adeleheld, showing that the ruging fury of the forest fires were clearly in evidence, and that as the right center of the Bad Plague was sweeping across the Mic-Allister Rum and raging over southern Bengall state, and heading straight for Adeleheld and Abbieann, that the warnings were ample to permit escape from the forests bluzes in ample time. They had plenty of time, but again heavy who could suspect the other catastrophe more terrible, L there recleved in Abbieannia, and other states in many cities, after the catastrophe, before that fatal day verify these views, and increased the wonderment that there could not be some realization, official and otherwise, of a necessity of a prempt exodus before the explosions occured. explosions occured.

STARILING SURVEYS THE REGIONS SWEPT BY THE DAYS AND HIGHTS OF MOST AWFUL AND HOPELESS DISASTER, AND DESTRUCTION. HE INSPECTS WHAT IS LEFT OF THE DOOMED SHIPS IN THE RIVER HARBOR.

While looking the ruins of eastern Abbleann over, gtarribe believed indeed that few were the survivors, either on land or rivor, who either passed through the fiery ordeal, or maintained life and the wreckage of the fallen buildings, or within the rush of the most mightles cof floods, during the destruction of Abbleann. He had witched to find and interven some of them, to get the stories of their sufferings and the shocking si sights they had witnessed, even if they would not be able to tell of their expariences with acrua acruacy, far from realizing the whole destruction they had witnessed. He also hoped to obtain from trained observors who hactened to the scene of the disaster as fast as swift river vessels could carry them, graphic details of the the disaster as hast as swift river vesses outle darly clear, graphic details of the horrors that met their gaze immediately after theoarived to the scene. and therefore he decided to find them if possible. He had seen a lot himself, and indeed to him the desolation of the ruins of the eastern part of the city blasted by the explosion, can only be inadequately pictured, Not a half of the horrors that he was seeing here could or ever would be told. Even now the whole region with its lofty forested hills, was still hidden behind the thick angry clouds of smoke.

Tooking up and down the river here he observed ernormous quanties quantities of the wreckage of large and small ships, and houses strawing the surface of the waters. huge trees also, and all kinds of furniture was floating here and there ... From behind trees also, and all kinds of furniture was floating here and there... From behind the smoke veil came blasts of hot wind.. He got upon the high wall of some remaining half ruined building to see further, and observed at La morio fifteen miles north of ableann or near there a sea of cloudsof smoke, and it was at this point days before as he had heard that women and children frantic to get away n had begged for a passage on ships going by. ome of the ships had room for no one, but others managed to pick up what numbers they could get on board, half dead women and children, who were so badly burned that they had to be lifted over the steamers side. Many of these had died on the boats before they reached their destination.

We had heard that the condition of these unfortunates was not even as bad as thousand of forest fire refugees in the hills far beyond the fire zone. He knew hundreds of them would die before relief could reach them.

Everyone who were refugees thousught the whole disaster region badly needed medical

Everyone who were refuses thousant the whole disaster region badly needed medical care, food clothing, and above all water. As Starring took in the view as far as easy ould reach from his perch he could see that the whole south end of the country east of the city was covered with smoke from smo smouldering debrie of the burned forests and when ever the smoke cleared a little he could see here and there the skeleton of what was once a good big tree and it as still flaming and smoking.

Furfuse blasts of hot wind, sometimes aghes born by the wind, and smoke ewept over where Starring was perched, but he remained there.

And for sixteen miles along the river front, and for many miles back tward the northwest from the city, and back from the northern limits of the river shore, to the smoking forest ruins or what was left of buildings. Even the scene was as had or worse than what he had seen at a Adeleheld though on the same scale, and streets there were none to be seen. He could not even make out where the site of the large buildings like ten and twenty - story sky scrapers stood, and they no doubt had been hurled down none to be seen. He could not even make out where the site of the large buildings like ten and twenty - story sky scrapers stood, and they no doubt had been hurled down level withthe ground by the terminif termific concussions. The still smoking hills beyond and a big mountain ridge looked like javanese volcances in violent eruption, and the ruins of many trees though still standing were burning in many places, and frightful odors of the burned flesh of animals which had not escaped filled the air.

As far as he could see through the smoke haze, or no whatter where he went Star ing could not see a single house that was left intact. Great heaps of wreckage, almost thirty feat high were seen on avery side. He believed that sure enough under all this loaded with food and provisions of all sorts, and was setn sont back tward Abbicann. But all attempts to got to even the enflooded parts of Abbleaun was barred by fire and forest conflagration... The clonest observation possible showed houses still blazing, and conflagration... The closest observation possible showed bessen still blazing, and streets etterm with churred bodies. It was certain to the cuntian of this stranger that the whole vast city was destroed, and it was found here, that few if any of the inhabitants had escaped.

This is all so far that Starring had kept any record of.

A landing was made at eastern Abbieums on the afternoon of Starrings fourth day there, for the first time since the city was destroyed. The caption of the Mary June, with a party of his officers, and men, and a commission of ariving citizens from Pandora invited to come by Starrings demand, and also this time accompanied by the two girl, and the two boy scouts landed south of Eastern Abbieans. The report about it being spared was a heav. The party made its way through a labyrinth of ruins, and found every huilding in charred blackand ruins. They were shocked to see thousands of every building in charred blackened ruins. They were shocked to see thousands of every building in charred blackened ruins. They were shocked to see thousands of dead bodies, naked, mutilated, and frightfully burned, piled in heaps for every six blocks blocks they traveled in the town, while many other thousands no doubt were buried under the debrie. The searching party found indeed that all of the eatern section of the city ase in ruins. The forest fires to the extreme east continued to move ahead tward the westand east, the great mass of fire and smoke also steadily moving to the northward. Every village and plantation in its path was already destroyed. Streams were dried up. All food was destroyed, and the people who escaped death in the fiery hurricane or suffocation in the dense clouds of smoke, were perishing of hunger and thirst flaming laying that four other layer atoms were destroyed besides Abbisann. thirst. Starring learned that four other large towns were destroyed besides Abbieann. They were Banderville, four miles south of Abbieann, and La Horn five and one half files miles northeast, and Meld orn and urner east. and west Each had a single population of at least fourty thousand people apiece. These towns were crobably the subburbs of Abbieann, but many of these inhabitants it is believed saved themselves by taking to the higher ground as these sections were threatened by the fire before the great explosions came. In this manner. Bet In this manner between one hundred and sixty to one hundred and ninty thousand were awad. or works and weeks they were still in the hills, their escape practically cut off by the seas of forest fires.

How Povorty Row, being nearer the explosion area them Abbievan itself, could escape even from the effects of the concussion, was explained by the fact that it was on the opplete a opposite and western section of the country, and west of Abbievan on a high plateau, and that it was seperated from even the devantating flood, and from forest fires by a deep valley and high cliffs, the valley recieving most of the waters. It is supposed that, not the ctator cruter of Mt from but some weaker point on the side of the mountain was hurled down in avalanches by the force of the concussions produced by the explosions, and that some of the explosions might have occured in the midet of some sections of the forests lives, and that the size of the crustions and their unusual force and vehemence shot and scattered appalling charges of fire and blazing forest andeflory debris, as a cloud of white hot lava, and shattered and pulvorized and erupted uniciony debris, as a cloud of white hot lava, and shattered and purverled and erupted most of the landscapes not skyward altogether, but Itse an enrouse cannon, aimed at un elevation to bembard Abbieans and other cities and towns, and all the territory in the explosion zone. It was like an eruption of Mt Peles a thousand fold etronger than Krakatoa but like she erupted when she destroyed Bt Pierre. Later when the floods broke out the deep gorges and valloys and high cliffs between Abbiesans, and Poverty Row would be sufficient to protect the latter from the flood peril. one of the explosions some of the explosions tore loose scores of miles of ground, and caused the five hundred miles of earthquake like cracks to be observed in the countryside, cracks wide and deep, and dangerous to explore at night for four of any one falling in vener to goet

It was from the few survivors, that the alarm felt throughout the country for a number of days prior to the disaster was sammed, further more when it was learned or believed sure the disaster was caused by explosions and not volcanic cruptions, a large portion of the blams seemed to be indirectly upon clandelinia because of the forest fires, for it was thought and said that probably great stores of munitions had been secreted away somewhere near Abbleann for war use, and the enemy made forest fires struck these munition depots and exploded them. But nevertheless for a time the majority believed they were volcanic cruptions for they could not concleve how the enemy could produce the munitions shough to cause such tremendous blacts. Nevertheless the greatest id indignation against landelinia grew as the p-nic subsided. It was also remembered that while the forest fires was threatening the neighborhood, and giving warning of some great disaster impending, suspicious characters were seen near the explosion area. some great disaster impending, suspicious characters were seen near the explosion area. strong in numbers who refused to permit any one from Abbicann going near their places. Only Only the day before the terrific cast catastrophe, a commission of scientists presided over by the mayor of the city, and appointed by him the mayor being in Pandora on some war cor conference at the time) assembled at randors for the purpose to go out and study the phenomena of the forest fire horrors that were then ravaging portions of the Marie Osborne, and Zoe Ras forests, and heading for the Mic-Hollester Run hell

It was agreed that the relative position of the two cities of Adeleheid, and Abbieann, and the valleys and the country side, debouching on the river fronts, permitted them to affirm no security of either city, if the wind continued to main the direction that was placing the whole region in dire peril. But no one suspected of destruction coming by explosions. However with that statement the governer tried to reassure the people, already be coming frightened, and it is declared called out the military, and drew a corden of troops around the city, forbidding any strangers from entering, and giving aid to all who in fear wished to leave, for any mistaken judgement i he would have had, he could have paid the penalty with his life, over with the people over whom he held official authority, but he was at Pandort at the time. The men nopulation wereb-lieved to be women and children. The number of men were few. The men normal also can be no doubt that science, fear, and mixisty, and the great conflagration itself united to give warning to those who would head, and therefore many men no doubt went out to aid rangers to fight the red plague. Professor longilester of Scientific University of Pandora, excusing excusined the condition of the forested country scone of the burned area agood number of feet thick, and the smoke of the smoulder and the conflagration made the whole country side invisible. On the month of May 1913 the forest fire neared the locality of Adoleheid and was raging south of Abbieann, and destroying the forested regions southeast of Abbieum and traveling along the southern destroying the Iorested regions southeast or Addieum and traveling along the southern forested shore of take Amgeline, and along the Mic- Hollester Rum. In its rush the fiery flood of flames every from its path many plantations, towns and villiague, cattle and human beings over a breadth of hundreds of thousands of acres in a few weeks. At morth bend of the Mic-Hollester Rum stood the town of orth Bend one of the finest in that region. Starring knew the place well. It was completely destroyed in the conflagration. The tall smoke stack of the burned factory alone remained visible amid the ration. The tall smoke stack of terrible sea of blackened ruins.

One hundred and fifty persons were estimated to have perished there, including the mayor himself. As the conflagration rushed headlong along its course, the western arm of the fire moved over thirty miles all along the eastern line of the rivers course a wind blowing with great strength at the time, and a big wave of fire swept over the wind blowing with great strength at the time, and a big wave of live swept over the whi whole eastern front of the lake shore. Terrible detonations on May 29th, heard hundred hun rede of miles esastward, followed at short irregular intervals, and continued at night. In the intense darkness, the leletric light failed and the whole city of Abbieum was only lit up by the lurid flashes of flame from the far distant conflagration. This Starring heard of and kept a written record. The terror stricken inhabitants went to the highest roof tops to see what was wrong, many in their night clothes, the went to the highest roof tops to see what was wrong, many in their hight clothes, the children screaming and wailing mad with terror.

The inhibatuats of the southern section of the city however had no fear of the forest fire, not expecting anything far worse.

The first that was known at even Pandora of the disaster at Abbieann, was at about six oclock in the morning of the first day of runs. At that hour there syddenly spread over the city a thick cloud of smoke, dust and something like powder fumes, which came from the direction of Abbieann. The cloud swept over the city with unusual swittness coming from the southeast, turning bright day light into the durkness of an approaching thunderstorm, with hardly a minutes warning, pring the night before pundora also had been rocked considerably by tremendous concussions, and vessels forcemed to the river wharvas were set creaking against each other with the creat force fastened to the river wharves were set crashing against each other with the great force. A great strungs wave swept down the river, and for days after the water never resumed its normal level, we Everybody in that city at first knew or believed they knew what had happened. The volcans Mt joan, had broken out in appalling eru tion. Throughout the streets of Pandora, and along the water front, people ran thither and hither in the wildest panic, and on all sides there was but one cry. "The volcano. The volcano. It

As quickly as possible in the confusion, the government aurthorities of the city, and the Mayor also, realizing man need there was begun to organize a tremendous system for carrying help to those known to be in dire distress, and many of the inhabitant sinhabitants took boats also to get as near to the scene of the "eruption" as possible to get a view of it. Many shipscheva became alive with activity. They were made ready for a trip down the rivers as quickly as possible, and they started away at full speed down every river possible in the direction of Abbieann, and a great column of smoke and

Troops and p proprovisions also were hurried aboard of them, and many other ships that had arived at Pandora that same morning, made instant preparations to go south. The propropody was excited. The ships had not gone over two days or more, when three of them returned bring back the "cheerful ridings" that Abbieann was utterly destroyed, and that the entire country side from Abbieannia, Abbieann down to the very Calverinia State, and to Angelinia was either on fire, or under a flood, that Adeleheid was wip dout, and that it was impossible to land at any point near Adeleheid on account of the great heat. The river water was at boiling heat. They said everywhere they went the spectacle was most appalling, and looked as if the whole of Calverinia was one mass of flame, or of water, and was sinking into the bowels of the earth.

They also brought the report that in volcano anywhere was in eruption but that it looked as if a whole side of Mt joan had cascadeed down before the concussion of some sort of ground eruptions near Abbieann and elsewhere. At first these reports were hardly believed, but the ships that went first to the scene of the disaster came back to Pandora four days after the other ships, which had followed in the effort to reach the scene of the disaster. On board these returning ships were a few survivors taken from the rayaged shipping On board these returning ships were a few survivors taken from the rayaged shipping in the river ports of Abbieann, and all of them were so frightfully burned and wounded that they died on board the ships before they reached the city of Pandora. Mostly all of these ships played a grave part from the moment of reaching the scene of the unus al dinaster. Fortunately having all steam up there was no time lost starting for the direction where it was evident a great disaster had occured. Throughout many weeks the heat in the vinicity of Adeleheld was so intense, and the faming fires of the forests, and the fine so of the grave of the symmetry and the sandition of the country. and the nature of the ernormous flood raging elsewhers, and the condition of the country so awful that it was impossible to approach the ti town. As the second week passed some ships after a heroic battle with the heat, suffocation, and terrific fire fumes and smoke succeeded in making a dash tward the shore, nearing the land close enough to see what had actually happened. The Abbieannian Royal Mail Steamer, The Ricksen called fr m the north in the vinicity of Abbieann, at ten oclock the night following the diseaster standing off shore about a mile, sounding her whistle and sending up rockets. She recleved no answer. The whole river front up north was blazing for many miles like She recieved no answer. The whole river front up north was blazing for many miles like a hellish furnace. The Ricksen sent a boat ashore bit it could not land on account of the terrific heat, which was accompanied by loud explosions. Not a living soul appeared ashore after the boat had waited waitill morning....

Ashos occassionally was blown over the steamer. This ship then steamed for Pandora Ashos occassionally was blown over the steamer flooded or burned up, all the stockke seeking assistance, as all the country was either flooded or burned up, all the stockke was dying all the plantations were charred, the countrypeople were flocking into the to make the plantations were charred, and a gangal hornor was feared. A WHOLE NATION THAT IS LIVING INDER THE SHADOW OF DEATH. IN FANCIED SECURIETY. VERSELS UNABLE TO REACH APPIPANN.

Starri no had been told again and again that is was very strange indeed that it must always seem to the rest of the world, that those who lived in the very shadow of the terrible war cloud, should not heed its muttered warnings, its premonitory symptons that the storm would reach further than its own zone, but since the last terrible war disaster a number of months had propably passed, since the war had threatened any serious circumsances circumstances, and accordingly out of the supposed war zone the green slopes of all riages and mountains, were as familiar to the population as the forested plains or the meadows and the fields from their very doorstens the very beauty of rivers and takes furnishing them pleasure grounds for their recreation. But as familarity precas comtenut of the greatest cangers till they are thought no congers at all, the enemy then being so far south was not feared except as the remotest dangers at all, the enemy then being so law south was not remove as the removes dangers hardly enough to cast a single cloud over the northern and central sections of calverinia. The war carlier however had showed its frightful anger even in pengali State. The forgets the first most frightful battle of the war, the battle of Abbiegan.

and it a fee victory. The first home of the warnings were ample. Two days after the destructive battle of Abbieum, the Governor of Angelinia state recieved a letter from his sister, and the letter indicated that they appreciated their danger, when the enemy won a nort of advantage over the national armies on or geronican Greek at Abbieann with a immeasureable loss of both sides in killed and wounded, and that afterwards the enemy displayed stone of activity about a few weeks later, which date the letter bears, and had made plans to leave if the occasion arose and which she did in due time. Starring had been shown the very letter to by the Governor himself. The letter had been as follows;

"My dear hubby;

This coming the whole repulation of Abbieum is on the alert and apprehensive, and overy ever is directed tward deronion Creek, where a terrific battle is rading. Yory Eve yoody is afruid that the enemy has taken to his heart to win the buttle, and then burst forth into the city and derroy everything. We recieved reports which terrified the record that the Glandel inlens under general Germania Pranctias Vivian, the trator traitor son of meror Vivian has burst forth with terrific force and furthen of their headen on charges and in carrying all before them, has won the conflict along their left in epite of the christian fire that has due degroved everything for a radius of seventeen miles. The chancelinian losses are will but they are winning. For accord days before the enemy had been raging squabbles, and immense columns of accounts of troops are moving down the left to try and stop the enemy.

Despite the danger all of the braver inhabitants are going out from the city to see the battle. From the noise I am afruid to even leave the buses. There is not a horse to be had in the city, the cavarly having taken them all, and those belonging to the rural detricts are kept in readines to leave at a momenth notice.

At half past ten this morning, I was in my room with little Jenn, and we heard fourtee

At half past ten this morning, I was in my room with little Jonn, and we heard fourtee fourteen distinct shocks that we thought came from a volcanic range that is near the city. They were so great that we may look at first, the volcanoce broke out, the first of the reports being very loud, but the great were so great that all our dishes first of the reports being very loud, but the great were so great that all our alses were broken, and the house was completely rocked.

It came from a tremendous volley of clandalinian artillery covering one of their main chargers charges. We can see some of the volcances from the rear windows in our house, and they were not activie. The buttle was fully ten miles from the city but we could hear the rear, and fancy of seeing the smooke smoke. The smell of powder is so strong that horses on the streets stop and moret, and many of the reople are obliged to wear wet handkerchiefs over their races to rotect them from the strong smell of powder. The best riends of mine assures me there is no immediate danger, and when there is the least particle of danger the whole ppulation will set fire to the city and flee.Or if the situation of the battle becomes very bad, I shall embark at once and go up north to Pandara. owever my dear Hubby the battle raged three days and the foe held his own. The city however is still safe, and we hope the enemy does not come."

Mrs Jane Turner . Your beloved and Loving wife."

Before the letter reached its destination, his wife and the entire family, and the vencel upon which they were depending had arived eaftly at Pandora, Had they remained untill June the next year they probably would have been destroyed by the terribe disaster, which warnings if there had been any, had been unheeded in time... For since the 19th of October 1912,... the enemy who even then is believed to have wro ght wrought all that have, had been causing nature to continually menfast disquisting symmtons. A great list of m smaller disasters came mounting since that time, and there were from time to time great or, smaller losses of lives according to the sizes of the catastrophes. By the month of November the enemy began to show a greater fury, and the first sign of this new and second most tremene tremendous disaster was that hear Sperry ville great columns of dense smoke were seen and on November 9th at night flames, accompanied by rumbling noises lighted the sky over an immense area causing wide spread terror. The horror came speedly and Sperryville was no more. Both the cities of perryville and Schloedertown were wiped out by fire and explosion and some character of an ernormous flood also followed... character of an ernormous flood also followed...

Solicia had been epreading all over the land.

All seemed quited down after that horror, and no great disaster occured except what naturally will occur in tremendous battles. July 12th however during the following year was not quite remarkable excepting in only the showing of the tremendous increase of the southeastern Calverinian forest fires. Hot smouldering ashes covered the whole hight which rose from a new forest fire area, Ryptian darkness enveloped Abbiesum, and an alarming luminous cloud auddenly ancended under this darkness many miles high, and drifted slugh sluggishly to the northeast. Ins Incocount flashes of fire ross on a mountain top, and one severe conflagration seemed to strike about three miles east of Abbieann. Th. th inderous rumblings of so many explosions sometimes lasted for two hours without a moments abatement, and then would deminish untill they became mere nours without a moments agazement, and then work control with they became mate mutterings. Starving usually believed that the explosions were caused by the turpentine trees explosing of which the forests were of nothing else but.

Also Starring could not account for the storm of ashes t at the wind usually blaw into the city. All the time his followers were with him in the city, they had all they could do to pacify the refugees who were continually freinzied with fear, even dreading a repeatof the catastrophe, which caused such terrible loss of life on the country side, and also through out the big city. Despite the calls of the Rangers they would run from the city streets into the open country, crying and praying for preservation fro from another tottatty disaster.....o one in the city elept that night.

Detonations and amoke and flashes of flame from the forest fire continued all night and a heavy hot windstorm occurred at orth gend, bringing more smoke than ever into the district. Starring and every one longed for rain. Indeed the heat and dryness ere mprecedented, and because of the fires there was no hope for the resuscitation of the forest country for years to come.

Even the country for years to come.

Even the country for domestic and manufactoring purposes dried up because of the heat of the forest fire, and the district was desolated beyond comparison. The continuous agitation of the winds in the path of the forest fires, and the absence of the badly needed rain caused the vinicity of the afflicted, villiages and towns in the path of the horror to look like portions of the well known sections of Dantes Inferno. Every day and night it without abatement, a thick smoky cloud overspread the whole region, interfering much with Starrings plans to his disgust, and for his followers the feeling of suspense was awful. Even the frightened refugees passed their time gazing at the eastern sky, where the fire storm cloude had n so long gathered, and where the mournful roaring of the flames were heard. Finally on the 25th Wednesday more than two weeks after the adventuerers had come into the ruined city, the dense clouds forming a canopy over the greater part of the ruined city lowered, and a severe windstorm, accompanied by fierce clouds of smoke broke over the city. It continued for two days, Wednesday and Thursday, causing the fires far to the southeast to reach the very forests eac east of abbleum, and the fury of the wind was so strong and the storm of smoke and sparks so thick and heavy that the refugees were almost suffocuted. Coaring sounds from the wind also caused apprehension of another fire storm striking the forests on the other side, and cutting off their escape also. The strength of the wind also was so great that it distrub disturbed the weaker portion of the ruins, and many corpses not seen before were exposed to

The conditions however were quite different when at last calm was restored or such an approach to it as could be expected after the terrible calamity. Yet here huddled amid the ruins of the northern end of the city were thousands of old men women and children left homeless and without the means of keeping alive except as they recieved aid from those in a position to help them.

During a complete respite vin this awful element Starring alone this time rode up from the city to the closest edge of the fires track, and the sight even on the way of the last few miles of the journey was one of the most tarrible and heartrending that has ever been seen by man. There seemed to be a seu of graves on every hand, not man made graves but natural ones, for where the people had fallen during the crashing explosions there ha they had been buried by the falling debris. And the winds had a purtly uncovered them. In front of every little house not touched by the con-flagration there were a number of bodies lying that graphically told the story of the death of whole families. When gtarring went to this district he had to make his way through a deep coating of still smouldering ashes and debrie which increased in depth gradually untill at the edge of the main fire belt the heat was unapproach. able. It would have been almost impossible to urge the horses through the mers small depth of it had it not been that the animal was not afraid of a little heat underneath. Starring then turned back to avoid the smoke and heat, and came upon a villiage just barely touched by the conflagration. The blackened walls in all instances were the only evidences that once upon this section handsome buildings had stood. And all around strangely enough were those graves telling their tale of the end of those ho who had once dwelt within these ruins. All of the trees, amm many of them oak and elm and big pines had been burned entill nothing but the black ned smoking stum s remained. In one of the burned villiages passed through, only one whole house and it in rains was still standing, and in one was found the bodies of several persons charred and calcined. In front of two remaining walls there were sixteen bodies burned to a crisp which to graving was no unusual aight. Soke still enveloped this part of the country in a haze but there were no signs that the fires vengeance had not been sas satisfied in this locality. In all the villiages through which Starring passed most of the house houses were burned to the ground and ashes blown from the forest fires were more than a foot deep lie returned deeply depressed to the ruins of Abbieann to tell his find.

BENGALL CITY OVERWIEL (ED.....

Starring now began to know for sure that the earthquake like concussions in pengall State which accompanied the unusually violent explosions, were no doubt related to the latter disturbances. He knew many cities were devestated by the offects of the shocks and the accompanying floods, but of all Abbieann suffered the heaviest loss of property and numbers of dead. ildred greenburg soconded the ammount of heavy damages and loss of life. As he had he heard and read that for many minutes the shocks from each succeeding explosion continued tumbling down cities towns and villiages, throughout all of Cen tral Calverinia and Bengall State. The following shocks were the most severe, and in cities and towns not totally destroyed the inhab Rents by morning were wandering about, not knowing where to go next.

While Starring remained in the city of Abbieunnn, he decired to trace from his maps to find out how far the effects of the explosion disaster extended. He looked on the map for where the city of Queenhosodo is situated. This the third largest city in Calverinia he knew suffered by far the worst for its size, gut then he considered that no where in the big Bengall Gity Abbieann was damage eyen slighter . Thousands of the best and biggest residences and public buildings in Northern Abbieann were either totally destroyed or seriously damaged. He at first "could not understand how a loss of lid so terrible a could have happened. In many cities of other countries he knew and had seen with his own eyes, that these cities had narrow streets, often not often three or four yards across, and that the town had been built in even a irregular manner, and if earthquakes and other disasters occured, these streets even served to make death true traps of the houses, and before half of the debris could be removed if a disaster didhappen many dead bodies would be exposed to view.

But in Abbieann city the widest streets is a quarter of a mile , the narrowest more than three to four hundred feet, and only the tallest buildings fell across or part ly acrosss these 5 streets.

He firmly believed the reports had been exactly true and he said to the captian who remained with him;

"It is ac actually true that the inhabitants were killed withinthe houses while asleep, Amatitlan, San Juan,, gun jaros, Escuintla, Santa Lucia, italian, and several other wide streets the wreckage did not even reach to the mille, I middle so that through the middle of these streets there could be traversed a long lane between the two lanes of wreckage. I estimated approximately about fifty thousand people that were probably still left under all that debris. I believe I also could estimate that within the ruins at Quesaltenungo street, about two blocks from Sun Jose, and De Guatemala Streets a out five hundred thousand were killed in bed buried under the wrekage wreckage while all were in bed out of a population in that wide district of possibly eight hundred thousand."

"You are right" said the captian. "I have observed that death and damage was also total in the streets of San Marcus, San Pedro,, San Juan Ostancalco, Tucana, San , Masatamango, Maya, and Curotenango. These streets were wide, and there was plenty of space to walkthrough as most of the buildings were low only three to four story affairs. I observed two orphan asylums which had about three to five thousand children each. One wall of this building was torn out clear as if the building had been side swiped by a tornedo, exposing all the domorties domor r domortories. I managed to get into one of the rooms to see how many children were in the beds dead, and found every bed empty, I could not account for that mys ery. I went through a portion of the safer toom ruins of the other structure, but all bedrooms were filled with debris but I was sure a terrible mortality rare among children was here, for wherever beds were not covered up they had a little skeleton.

Juch damage was done on the big Coffee stores, and at the River ports of Ocos and Champerico streets.

The great Big CEntral Avenue Libery was wrecked and all the great and most expensive and rare books were buried under tone of debris; and the wreckage of other taller houses near by were mixed in with this. I dug up some of the books and examined their contents." "Il looked for one spot outside the city zone to find if some of the reports caused by the shocks were true" continued starring.

WALE THE REAL PROPERTY.

What were those reports?" "thy I rend that the earth rolled up in four distinct waves, and then rolled high ad which still rear their crests where they stood whon the great convulsions coessed. ceased. And between each crack is a wide deep crack, and the earth in every direction is seared by openings of apparently o soundless depths. The river banks p in that locality have been squeezed to ge together I heard, and that the streams are a number of feet narrower than before."

"Did you reach the locality to see if it was true!" asked the cuptian. hundreds of quick sand victims, but there was no sign visible to indicate that gagmine ever was there. Then the explosions came and produce the shocks as it is written in the news, and the force of the concassion squeezed the river banks to together it forced ever, one of the skaletons from the bog, and harled them high and dry upon the shore. This found to be true as far as evidence shows, and I'll show you as soon as this afternoon approaches. The cty city railroad bridge, across the river from oje one street to the other was strangely telescoped by the strange contraction of the banks, and the river wharf, which was the citys pride, now stands and the cance, and the river shour, which was the crops price, now stands a nominent to the ruthless strength of the explosion made shocks, a misshappen mass

"I inspected the streets of San Jose and also Escuintla where all the buildings were were almost completely destroyed. The shocks I believe did in in fourty seconds in this district, and houses not destroyed are partly reased or badly cracked, and hundreds of thousands of slappers have been baried in the ruins, and struck by falling of thousands of slappers have been baried in the ruins, and struck by falling timbers and stones. The loss of life; believe was between four hundred thousand in the whole length of the street of Escuintle and the districts adjoining with all other cross streets. Escuintly gtreet had a population of about five hundred thousand in cluding its districts surrounding on each side before the shock, which cut ravines in some of the districts, and shook many of the houses and buildings level with the ground. Not one of these I believe survived the shocks. The scenes in that street sir and also some of the other streets of that district which suffered ree the most were and is terrible, your of the bodies of the victims have get been dug from the ruins of hores. In San Jose Street, I saw a whole line of big buildings of both sides, which were described destroyed by the concussion, and only three bodies or half skeletons did , se protruding from the wreckage. Street car subvays were not damaged which were mysterious to me, though partly fall of water, and those lower down railway yards, were lakes of water with all kinds of railroad cars partly covered, or floating about. The number of houses destroyed surrounding the railroad depots and yards, as a result of the conclusions I could not tell, but I saw many with all the rooms exposed and none of the furniture was injured, except where fires had raged. I went to the street or para where, had learned that in ninty seconds, I,000 people had been buried while asleep under the ruins of their fallen houses, ever four the usand burned or smothered to death, and the street of Quezaltenango of I40,000 people destroyed

"I was there too" said Starring. For all we have seen of that even survived of "I was there too" said Starring. For all we have seen of that even survived of Albieum only fragmentary accounts of the disaster has been received through the ners owing not only through interrupted committation, but that no one was at Abbieann to see the true facts. I went to para street on and stood on the corner section of Suatemala Boul. taking pictures of the ruins. There stood what was left of a church, only its clock and bell tower, and to my surprise the darn clock was still running for it struck three oclock. Crevices in the very streets was observed at frequent intervals, and once I nearly stepped into one. Locking down I saw it led down into one of the transportation subways of Abbieann. It was full of water, and I saw one of the transportation subways of moreans, it was tall of water, and I saw bodies floating in the water, which evidently told me that 'raine full of people were caught and drawned like rats in the rush of water into those tunnels. The greatest damage, observed so far caption is at questioning street, for all buildings for the full length as far as eye could re reach on every side, and down all other for the full length as far as eye could ra reach on every side, and down all other intersecting streets are practically destroyed. In one building, saw lying in bed a little ek linton helding a expensive doll, and near by lay the skeleton of a dog. That sight brought the tears to my eyes. I could not resist it, and took a picture of that. Believe re all these pictures I am taking will show to the whole world whay what kind of a fee we have to deal with if glandelinia really did this .All the build what were left standing are cracy and shaky. They will have to be pulled downings that were left standing are cracy and shaky. They will have to be pulled downing the ream of one and wreak, a building that looked as if some blust bud rived rived. I the room of one sud wreck, a building that looked us if some blast had riped ripped It upside down, hung the motto " God Bless Our Home." That sign to me was a mockery. I could not look at it a second time as it chocked me. The loss is irreparable. Many beautiful stores of all kinds were on this street and they all suffered in a smillar manner, and in addition suffered a greater loss, that of all members of tye their families. There were as I heard at the ending of the disaster, three most terrific shocks of all following the others, each three more severe than the one preceding followed by a tremendous one that nonthing can compare, but the damage was all done within a minute and half. Among the wealthier class the loss of life was similarly the same if the concussions had occured in daytime when every one would have been up and around the believe many would have had time and a chance to flee from their houses and such refer that the wide middle sections of the streets or in the patics or street courts, and would have been saved but all were caucht in their beds sound as lep, and the those who may have been around may have been killed before thet they reached the streets. The streets are not one quarter as narrow as streets in even Ameri can cities, so that escape from a falling building was abou absolutely possible, .mless they were sky scrapers, The loss of life mostly was found within possible, unless they were sky scrapers. The 1088 of life mostly was found within the ruins as 1 observed showing that no one 1 found among those thousands upon this manuals of skeleting had even as an ample charge to get up out of bod before they were killed b by either the ruins or some ins from the explosions. And most people in Abbleman (except in bot weather) are accustomed to retire early, and nearly all were in their houses as usual whon the great shocks came. The houses are built of the same materials as in American cities, and when they collasped all their

"An long as the corpsus or the skel-mions skel tons are not day ap from the rains in will be practically impossible to give unything like an accurate a stimute of the dead" said give Starring . "It is setima ted by the news that the total populat-

population had perished. That can only be proven when all the dead are recovered."

"aut how can it b.f" asked the caption. "It is stated that sore them three quarters of the city was exept awa, by the fleed, and the lake front of it mak beneath the lake itself, one of those bodies can ever be recovered. It add to the horror of the situation any of the rains have been after, and all the bodies may be bound to ashes. Most of our own followers in exploring this horror have suffered grantly from heat and thirsr owing to the fact that the water sains are all broken. We have been only able to drink of the water that remained in the fountains still working, and what we have taken up and beiled from the river."

"That may be true but we could estimate the numbers found." argued starring. Even quesalteningo street could give as some numbers to start with. I have come across akelentone of all sizes lying everywhore about the streets, here would be a head. there a trunk,, and limbs severed by falling in iron cornic s or timbers, and every where from the piles of debris I have seen protruding arms and legs of skeletons.

The sight was horribb horrible, and one that cannot be forgotten."

"All the additional sights; have seen" said the caption." especially in quatemala street only added to its horrors. There must be districts of dead under-the rains. I examined a part of rapacuhe la Street, and the damage to the buildings was worse on the sides facing the explosion area. The rear portions still stood whole and entire. In San Marcos street, near Quezaltenango, all the buildings facing the explosion area were totally destroyed on the frontal sections, while in the rear they were entire also. In one building which was a hom: for cripaled and sick children I coun'ed six hundred small skeletons in every pose in their half wreckeed and half debris covered beds. Others of the inmates no doubt were crushed and buried under the fallen walls. In La Lachiau street, not a house was left standing. many universities and colleges were located within this di district, but no bodies were discovered in these ruins .. "

This city of Abbieum which as situated near the borders of big Lake Angeline was ver rich in millions of queer and rure relics and paintings and articles taken by explorers from the rains of ancient and civilized races. The destruction of Abbieann was the biggest loss to Abbieamia on record, and the whole country was trying its utmost to discover whether the disaster was on one of nature, or caused by the enemy. Coffee the principal export of the city itself was lost for the many years to follow, and as Auvie Appleann was one of the greatest corre and tea trading cities and ports in the world in this story the loss was immeasured ly great. The sugar and rum productions were also loss, pesides all vegetable and

Calverinia, and her eleter states witht as well be like a human body subjects to all kinus of aissues and assumements. Calverinia can even be likened to some person who just because she is one and Carist like, is crucified by her wicked sister s who are her enemies, and her sisters are the Clamelinian States and Provinces, while her loyal Sisters, and mother Applemania, cut off by the sheary and disasters, is forced to look on, and almost do nothing, and allow her to linger there, in horriste agony norrow that misery. The areadist heat of the forests fire have causes all over the country as far as Appleanta, high agone normal temperatures for even the late summer and carry fall season, and evidence seems that because of it there'll be no winter thin year. And the awful heat of the many forest fires, and the frequent changes which constantly take place because of a the disasters of the war manifest themselves terribly in the form of horror and death in every locality. In other words Calverinia is likened to a person who is being burned and scorped scoarged while hanging on

The fires and other disasters had manistested themselves into a score of complicat no lifes and value aleasters had manisiested themselves into a score of compile ions in the shape of itcome, explosions, massaures, terrific defeats in pattle, and the rain of whole cities and towns, and war made eru tions upon the whole landscape. In other words the war is taking its vengeance upon nature as well as hemanity. All kinds of Abbic achien scientists have advanced many theories concerning the primary causes of all these awful disusters, and many explanations relating to the results and the extent of these calamities. Yet like the doctors who disagree in the diagon cals of a human malady, the scientists of very kind are equally mubble to agree in all details concerning this ferm of all calamities since the war begun, and some even dispute over the state ent that all the calamities were natural and not caused by the

After all theorems relating to the cause of the many disasters, (not counting tangents of children) have been considered, the one that is most tenuble and is sustangents of children) tuined by the largest number of scientific men in Abbicannia is that which traces thined by the largest number of scientific men in Accident is that which it all kinds of disasters back to the old accepted cause of natural meuns, and to the sternal fives in the onter of the earth, and not blaming the war at all. But in the majority then blame it on the enemy. And only in the latter way can the disasters

The youngest atment scrents in the country of alvernia, or any of her other of alvernia, and for legn scientists, or any man familiar with a deen, and also in Appleannia, and for legn scientists, or any man familiar with a clence who examined the or at least investigated the oceans of the great disaster alcovered that the appleadon signature at Abbiecon were not consuled, by any ogrand or outward force caused by volcanic activity as same others had recorded in neuspapers, and found like starring that all the substances were ofno volcanic material to any degree. And these Scientists hundreds of them were with Starring aiding him in is work. They worked with him even while the scenes around were almost like the internal regions of the earth, sacrificing their safty, health and so forth to help him in his efforts.

But remething more more than the mere presence of the craters and the debris then thrown by them is necessary to account for the causes of the "so called volcanic action", although it may in a imper degree account for the strungs and most record breaking vehement seismic covelsion convolsions in the form of earthquakes which affected the whole nation that fatal night of June the First Monday Horhing. the elements discovered by giverig which enter into the source of these explosive forces proven to be no volcanic eruption. The characteristic phenomenon of a volcanic cruation is the steam clows that issue from the gradual vertex before the up-sample of the motten lava, dust ushes and scoria. Such materials was not found a universe near those craters. This acceptes theory is plantly laterated in the disasterous expicoions of the other months past, which and craters of the same kind though not so the form of these awrul explosions, and its simplest form is likewise illustrated in a coller explosion. Observations of these most violent explosions of the war show them by the nature of the cruters and the havor wrought by them to be only most Tremendone mine explosions, placed at a great depth beneath the surface of the the ground, where a great q unity of all into of powerful explisives explosives have ceem placed and scalenly converted into evaptions by eletric charges from a far dista distant battery. In minor explosions of the war the presence of black sacke is not noticeable in such quantities, which is simply because the mamount of explosives was small and the mamount of TN-T placed was only sufficient to expel the earths surface

The flow of water from the explosion cruters which follows most violent exto a shorter distance. locions is expelled by the outward and the upward force of the great blusts, and drawn probably from wat r coverents indernath the early earths surface. That may explain why the explosion cra ers afterwards have a 1 ke in them. The two lines of explosion craters near Abbisons, one remains north and south, the other cust and west thich intersect the neighborhood of Abbisons, and Ad 1 Adel cheid cities and Rengall State, follows the course where the rivers Arronburas and Monthlester Run is aldest and the reverted to the course where the rivers Arronburas and Monthlester Run is aldest the terrific force of the great explosions was soficient to cause crevices for han drade of miles over the country side, and the character of the explosions is determined that finds its way in them, and the temperature of the forcest fires radius near the vinicity can only be a monthlester.

that finds I's way in them thom.

And the temperature of the forest fires raning near the vinicity can only be greeced at, but some idea may be formed of their intense hear from the streams of helter neck sometimes running down mountain slopes swept by those anging fires. These sometimes had run ten or twelve miles in the open air before cooling sufficiently to become solid recks acain. From this it will be seen by the reader, whether he believes it can ever really happen or not in trued cases, that the finmes of the forest fires are or were much hetter than are required to reduce the rocks on the mountain side ty a liquid form. From this seems too may be seen the instantslous action of the or by which the streams dry up.

The calmits which excell Assistant and heart and converted into steam, and the water seeping or flowing through a forest fire area is converted into steam, and the streams dry up.

The calamity which defell Arbidann and her neighboring cities and towns had without gotion lead to a freeh disconding of the calages of the explosions as also it was blacked on these forest fires. Wet all the phenomena involved therein are y t fully enderstood, and concerning all of them there were perceiptible difference of opinion among the best of the experts. On at least one point if it is sharp enough however there is always a general diaggreement. Forest fires were raging east but close to the explosion area, before the cruch, and at a distance of fourteen miles it was claimed that the hoat of the lindurus Creek perceiptives probably great enough to set things flame, and within a mile off to melt every known substance. This report was laughed at but investigators after the passage of the fire typo typ hoon discovered the statement to be somewhat under the actual thing. Objects were melted three miles away and no one could have lived fifty, miles off.

Confinement of the fire was impossible. There was also a growing tendency moreover to recognize the sportance importance of the nature of the blasts. The distance from the xplosions to the fires was at that a time one hundred miles. The weight of several miles of rock is almost inconcievable, and most of this subsence by the concussion elide down mountain sides. The scientists regarded this as the chief agent in the explosion concussion, at least when sides of hills are easily shoken so the fire seed at the the extent to which forest fires are claimed responsible there is some lack of harmony among even fire actentists.

Darger, gringinger, Schloeder, Heidiab, and others of the semini, great squorists themselves held that electic batteries largely, if not entirely responsible, as was the theory of or the blasts, and not the fires as the fires were too far away. They point to the case, that investigations proved that there were too many cruters situated in th was the theory o for the blast, and not the lives the lives two two datas, proint to the case, that investigations proved that there were too many cruters situated in the abbleman region to be of volcanic origin. Dargar also regarded forest fires not as the initial factor, but as an occasional, though in important reinforcement. He suspects that the mines were probable t stores for sufe kee, keeping under cround for munition uses, and that the fires may have heatened the ground to a great extent, and that in the munition calleries underground enough the two generated to blast the munitions. Thether they were placed there by the enemy is a difficult blast the munitions, whether they were placed there by the enemy is a difficult quention, but as many other such disasters were her doing, this one is blazed on glands linia also, and if she is not guilty she will soon prove it. The explosive effects of the disaster which ensued were of three kinds.

By the expansion of the force all the harder rook substances under the munition guilerie guileries was reduced to a state of worder, and the soriginated the errormous clouds of fine dust which were ejected. Some of the greatest explosions had the Me Felee effect when St Pierre was destroyed, but on a hundred per cent greater scale. Other explosions were of the Krataka force and style but far greater also. Shocks of greater or less violence were also produced. The less severe explosions sounded like the disagarfs cischarge of the heaviest artillery, and gave rise to a tremore in the immediate vinicity by did no durage. In extreme cases of some of the vehement explosions around fire will be fine city of the vehement explosions enough force was developed to rend the walls of the city of the corn if self on the enough force was developed to rend the walls of the city of bbi-car i self on the north even though far from the explosion, a scene of which Starring discovered in the ruins. Starring discovered that even a part of northern Ablicann itself was blown up and a crater is where that portion of the city stood. It was like a hundred Krakatons blowning a at once in this spot alone. The culminating testitates culminating drama of the northern Ablicana and the northern Ablicana

The culminating testite to culminating drama of the northern Abbieunn explosion, like the fierceness of the Pelee _rutton on a thousand per cent force, though not resulting so disasteriously to the landscapes near by as Krakatoa would have done would seem to be due to the same cause. To this particular explosion, too, it seems safe to assign the upheavel which excited a tidal ware along the two coasts of calverinia, east and went, as the whole state was shaken bad enough to effect the same.

That was why in every city not injured by the shocks came reports of frenkish action of furniture and household household property that at first was hundred at and not believed. The precise manner in which the explosions literally acted in destroying beleann in the lit Pelee, St Pierre, and also earthquake, and flood faculton almost simultaneously is not and probably will never be entirely cleur. "overtheloss it is possible to get some light on the mutter. It is now well known that in many places where such explosions have accured there are deep long mine galleries, and by the men placing explosives. Some of them have been cade wide and door enough to hold hundreds of thousands of per points of theke Selvica are whose views. The mine galleries leading under and to the dives of lake Selvica even the velocious thave been formed by the menty. It hagebeen observed that many cratern caused by explosions formed by the enemy. The existance of a chain of explosion craters in the Abbisman region suggests the rise existance of a chain of explosion craters in the Abbiesian region success the probabilities that there were long galleries made inderground. Just how these calleries have been formed, and whether they were stored off by the nationals for the purpose of hiding multions from the enemy, or whether the enemy placed the explosives to cause the catastrophe is one of the most difficult questions still left for investigation and which Starring is truing most desperacy hard to find yet. Giving a line of elementy found fulleries ander round is unforded, whilliam goldoder, another our remember of the cemini suggested that the mines were placed by the foe, and that probably the forest fires or the enemy run have been the inedia's exciting cause of the immensurable catastrophe. Other Scientists have found a similar explanation acceptable in the cause of other explosion and disasters elsewhere. And the Theory has much to in the cause of cther explosion and clearly represent the Theory has much to come and it to favor. The outburst at Abbienin in rengall ctate, was apparently the culmination of a number of recent explosion disturbances which have been unusually severe. A great explosion occured at Adeleheid, but a few days after the Abbienin horror, while many cities was nearly destroyed by the concussions that immediately followed.

The rocks all around were blown into dust, which was carried so high as to escape the power of the carths attraction and float by itself through space. It may be that the most violent carthquake trerors came during the crashing explosions, but it does not necessarily follow that this could also be the case either. Most cathquakes are caused by mysterious disturbances in the interior of the earth, but the explosion are caused by mysterious disturbances in the interior of the earth, but the explosion shocks though devastating were more jumpy than carthquakes. A greater number of the explacions are similar in cause and effect to a good munit ion explosion. It is now Starrings accepted policy that the sydden introduciton of forest fire heat may have caused the disaster also. The concussions caused a tension of the crust of the earth which caused many great fissures to ann appear. If it can and does on roved withhat the enemy was responsible for the disaster it is not hard to imagine what the result would be. It would be the came as tightening down a safty valve and then let into a boiler of red hot pipes a quantity of i ce cold water. There were in the war two classes of explosions, those which resulted in tremendous floods, and those which only shock cities and rocked the nation. It is the flood following the explosions which brings wide p spread destruction, and it is surely astonishing to learn of the tremendous rower one of these floods have when unleashed.

The floods are the most dangerous next to earthquake shocks to human life and property and can change the physical face of a country as well as a volcamic enuction or a terrific earthquake can do.

There was sure e-i endence that a good part of beligann, the size of the whole of the was received that such into the waters of bake Angoline from the concussion and effects of the explosions. It seemed strungs that the explosion horror resulted in the collages of the shore containing such a large part of Abbicum and drawing it under the lake so that every one there drowned like rath in a trap. The concussion and the digating of the explosions, and the effects to the rocks far down bolow caused a subsidence to follow. The explosion cruters were now helieved to have caused a region of extreme wookness of the water gatthe crust especially the explosions did, which has its purallel for all the lembth of the explosion disaster zone, and which extends for a great distance, where are located some of the biggest water filled craters of all. This same region of weakness includes nearly the whole of the pengall ith starring were three vational abbiemmian geographers who helped him make a study of the disasters. Ind these too were members of the remini. Durgar himself after a careful examination of the devastated regions related important scientific phases of the great explosions, cllections of data concerning the explosions nearest Abbieum was immediately begun, fie was told by one eve witness that on the morning of the great disaster, a vac vast or column like volcanic dust, cinders, blocks of stone rolls of thunderheaded smoke rose many thousands of feet into the air like a shot, spreading full of flashes in all directions. A large portion of this lighted by the distant forest fires and easily seen, had seemed to reach the a per air carrent for it was carried eastward. This spreading and also falling was again divided, and the clouds were swept by the lower winds buck tward the explosion and over the city.

The wrecked houses shows this, the windows on the side not facing the explosion crater being nharmed, while those on the eastern side were wrecked by the back draught tward the explosion.

There was no wind on the morning of the great disaster, a fact which facilitated the devastation of the country side. The hot unphyxiating gases from the distant forest fires, by the concession of the explosions rolled westward, and many were scorched and suffocated. pebris from the explosions fell in gildred greenburg over a hundred miles away and the heavy detonations where heard there as if the noise was exactly in the streets. The houses of that city shook fiercey fiercely and many crashed to rain, stronge gases filled the air, and thee warning phenomena in the sky produced by the disaster increased intill they become calarming. The city then was partly overwhelmed by the floods that resulted which swept upon the city with fearful rapidity. The Lake Selicia which flooded so much country before became a sea and a new flood from it spread fresh death and destruction on all sides. Three days later the worst flood on all record was on and devastated an untold number of cities and towns, and made a good part of Abbleon and llared greenbare a thing of the past, wiping out the majority of the inhabitants of the latter city, and changing a country side into an inland occum, put ing the outbrook of the least of the explosions a c vast column of smoke rose to a height of four miles above the ground, as measured by some far distant e-ecultnesses. The last of the explosions were more vo violent than one may one preceeding, and on this occasion the volume of smoke and deris debris rose to an unestimated height, and an exa examina ion of the stones that even fell in Culvering showed them to be a wairty of granite and limestone. They were bits of underlying rock forming a part of the origin of the earth.

There were no laws of any and frund, for all fragments composed of more rock. Yet it is evident that the strange tornadoes of sufficienting heat and ruses which wrecked the buildings, apply stated the people not killed in the ruins, then started fire completing the ruin. These ruses were believed to be caused the by the backward concussion of the air drugging the forest fire heatened air upon the city. Must and clay was dug from the earth by the explosions, and came down in cloudbursts. The great emission of sufficiently has from the forest flow, brought for the city by the shocks of the explosions are among the misual features which the dispater has to add to the scientific knowledge force explosions.

As this story tells it, Walter Starring was the first man who set foct in the area of explosion craters, and because of his high position ad acton ist besides being conoral his stories were valuable for the cause, and the world in meneral. He waid that any one would be so excited over the disuster as to put in r ports that lit toun had been blown up, and that the mountain had thrown over the sea or take, ngeline so much pumies that it was possible to valk a distance of nearly a hundred miles over the lake, when confirmed investigations proved the report untrue. It was also stated sir that ubwards of two hundred thousand reople perished near this spot, that many islands were formed in the lake, than an earthquake destroyed all the to as on the shores of the lake."

"Such exaggerations can easily be made, said Jane herself. "But of my experience the last shock was the worst and that mainly caused all of the houses to be overtru overturned in the city, and the destructive fire that raged at the time, to be added by the flood which further increased the loss of life und property."

"It is the gravest disuster of all nevertheless" said Starring. "But the statement that Mt Joan was blown into the air almost in the twinkling of an eye, and wiped out of the map of Calverinia must have been made by some person rather with an unfirmusihed unformished top story. The explosions that over caused them however had buried or devasted the surrounding courty for many miles, and even many of our cities round Abbiemn, and dozens of upland hamlets and countryside towns had been overwholmed in the earthen deluge, or wrecked by other phenomena attending the outburst like Abbieumn was governan thounand s of people had met with sudden and most terrible death, scores of thousands of others have been injured, and the long roll of disaster included the destruction of porses and cuttle, damning up of rivers, and laving wast to large tracts of country and tarning districts, forests and all kinds of expensive groves. But here we are near the crater now. We traveled for ten days over this desclate scene and now have reached out destintion destination."

Finally as they reached the region of this ernormous crater, starring remembered that thirty mines in a straigt straight line from Abbieunn to Calverine a further distance of one hundred and too miles the noise was experienced and the shock also from this single explosion, and that for nearly a full day on the property and the single explosion, and that for nearly a full day on the provided the result of the rising smoke of the explosions, which added and groom provaried, the result of the rising smoke of the explosions, which added to the durkening smokes of the forest fires, and which greatly puzzled the saviving inhabitants. A trip of about 10,000 feet was made to the back of the crater o as to obtain a clear view of it and over of the country around it which had been so disasteriously overwhelmed.

Only on nearing the end of the trip was the party again brought face to face with only on nearing the end of the trip was the rain of debris, mud and clay which had sixns of the great explosions. Here besides the rain of debris, mud and clay which had sixns of the grant and all vegetation, they came upon a number fallen on and still covered the ground and all vegetation, they came upon a number of ernormous cracks deep as pits, evidently in some way the work and effects of the description. Character the smallest one by impring with care, signs of the terrific explosion. Crossing the smallest one by jumping with care, signs of the unusually great disaster grew in number and intensity. Fetid smokes swept over them unusually great disaster grew in number and intensity. Fetid smokes swept over them at times from the distant forest fires, and coming from evil looking smudges dangerous ly close by. Creat forests of trees torn up by their roots by the concussion of the explosion, lay or stood topsy turpy nor inclined in all directions in every scene and the whole face of the country side wore the look of having been withered by some fierce and buleful blast. In deed it had the appearance, but for a hundred miles of having been struck by the desolating blast of the Mt psles eruption, and the dostruct ion of vegetation appeared the sume. They had travialed for a few minutes, and gained the crest of a narrow low ridge denuded of all trees, part of which hill was torn as ander, and now for the first time they looked forth upon the sight which they had come to see. Neverthaless in their lives had they expected this. There was no regular cruter. "I hardly know which to pronounce the more astonishing sight as we see here." suid

"It is strange" said the captian" for the prospect that now opens before our eyes or the suddeness with which it bursts upon us makes me think as if we were lost on some desolated surface of the moon."

"Yes, for to the former there is no more fitting phrase perhaps that can be applied to this seems, that that of absolute, unreademen redeemed desolution, —so intense, so said, and bewildering, and terrifying, that despair of being able to describe itadequately in detail in my dairy. It certainly looks like the ruins on the suf surface of some section of the moon, as if our own world was wiped out by some disaster."

On their left, from what was supposed to have have been a high plain rose the in On their left, from what was supposed to ha have been a high plain rose the in curved real wa rear wall of what over two months before had been a stretch of meadows forested plains and forested hills, falling with scarce a break, to a depth of fully five to six hundred feet. In front of the strangely vformed cliff everything had been blown away and scattered fearfully over the face of the country before it, in a roughly fan shaped deposit of for the most part unknown depth-deep enough however to rease every landmaker landmark, and conceal every feature of the deluged area, and mingled with all this was trees, some fragments of houses, a few human bodies, mud rocks of all sizes, cla clay and granite, and even wreckage of some big graveyards.

At the foot of the cliff, were two smaller holes filled with water. To their view the bace, denuded by the awful explosion seemed to cover a space between five and six micesmiles. This however can only be a rought conjecture. Indequally value must be all present attempts to determine the volume of the flown up earth. Yet it can be assumed as a very moderate calculation that the mean depth of the debris covering an buried area of perhaps fifty miles was not less than fifteen feet, and yet find that the work actived by this great exploded mine was the upheavel upheaval and wide distribution of ne no fewer than twice of three times, seven hundred million tons of earth, or more than twenty two million tons of debris, earth, rocks, and ont other ponderous material. The real figure could probably be even very much greate. And this

"This looks like some titan tried to blown up the whols country, said starring.
"But the sight here positively proves its no volcanic disaster. Let's look more into it. It is done by a mighty mine already. The explosion here instead of forming a orater blasted away the whole territory."

"It sure looks that" said Penrod awed by the scene. "No wonder Abbieunn fell down."

OR FORMED BY THE GREAT EXPLOSIONS, AND PONDERS ON THE SCHIES BEFORE HIM. DISCOVERY FOR CLUES IS IN VAIN.

WHILEA Starring was now on his way again for the crater region, to make enother effort at discovery des ite despite the perils of forest fires, he said to Jane and the other brave child companions;

"Afrer this Calverinia will always be nicknamed " The home of the wars worst disasters on record, for in spite of the fact that I yet make no discoveries I fell feel sure beyond doubt that Clandelinia is responsible for all of this, as I read that many claimed they saw suspicious characters within the distfi district a few days before this awful catastrophe began. Few months have passed since even June a ,ear ago from this past _une without one or more concussion shocks from unusually ernormous explosions of considerable and devastating force besides numerous lighter ones of too slight a nature to be worthy of remark and yet all these have been absolutely provened to have been caused by the enemy mining engineers at the commands of the foe leaders. Calverinia had been able through the aid of helpers to furnish many records of these strange enemy proces produced phenomena. what first got me guessing is that when the earliest part of the disaster was first known, and it was firmly believed to have been an eruption, that Calverinia's most famous volcano Mt .oan had exploded and blown herself to pieces thus destroying Abbieann from the eruption only. This is the highest and most famous mountain in all Calverinia. It rises more than twenty thousand five handred feet above sea level, and is shaped with three bigger cones on top like three mountains mingled into one, and each crater is me thousand feet deep. It is regarded by the culverinians as a sight for tourists, and large numbers of people for sightseeing make an ascent to the summit at the commencement of the summer, but at great risks. Though now apparently extinct, it was about a hundred years ago an active volcano, and the history of Calverin Culverinia mentions several very disasterous eruptions, in which the steam ash and clouds were hurled upwards of thirty three miles and was heard fifteen hundred miles.

yet when such reports came that such an ernormous volcano blew itself to pieces many volcanic investigators were sent to find the facts, and came back somewhat later to surpress the whole country with all proffs proofs and photographs chieftly made to show that the volcano was as quiet as it ever had been, and had not been in no eruption, and neither had its, meighbors, Mt Calverine, vivian, and others. The disaster therefore took on a roal suspicous aspect and the Vivian Cirls asked me to inve ti investigate to find out some real facts, and as the forest fires had refused to allow me to explore the v explosion districts so far, and as forest fires are still ,e menancing my efforts there is considerable difficulty in definting the kind of crater to make a better examination, and therefore several times while here I have notified general Vivian that it has been impossible for me to give an absolute statement as to the real character of the disaster, but that I will remain here and continue my effort if it takes all my life to do so. If under the term, volcanic disaster be verified as reports have made be included not all these craters but all mountains round about, there will have to be proven evidence that other volcanic mountains in this neighborhood have been in a state of violent cruption, before , will sent in any reports that suspicious characters of the mountains may have caused the unusual catastrophes, because the explosion craters ga give no evidence whatever. Wet around the district, only ht joan, calverine, the Big Catherine Hill, and Vivien, and also Horma, and Klantoria are true volcances, but none of these have been or even are activie. active. And altogether through magaines inewspapers, books and other literature, I have read that about 1,234 distinct secondary shocks of great force have been recorded within that fifteen minutes of horror that awful midnight of June the first, of which two hundred and five were the most violent, and of these the greater number took place in the northern districts far off from Abbieann . So far my little friends the most famous of these explosion craters which I have discovered at a great distance from an en elevation, and trard which I am now hading for, is four y two miles northwest of Abbieann, across the river, fortunately somewhat dut of the fire zone. Nigh witnesses mistook the explosion here for a very severe eruption of two seconds duration. I hear the crater is very deep, but not on any mountain but on the level plain surrounded by a wall of shattered forest trees. If any sort of funes are coming forth from any p apertures near or in the crater then I will believe in the reports, and the enemy is cleared of all guilt. But we'll see, put yet I count account it the enemy is responsible why he wanted to cause the overthrow of such a big city of Abbieann. Ind anyhow it would make things far worse than it is now for Clandelinia if she is proven guilty.

Even I fecieved word from general Vivian that by some big g flood which probably was a renewal of the ernorus ernormous flood from this disaster that Emperor Viyians palace at Angelinia Agathia is thrown down, and many important buildings throughout the city are all destroyed or swept away, and special prayers and He Hovenas and Mass s Masses and other services are offered to God for a stopping of these catastrophes, or a showing of what ah and who is responsible. I have even discovered that the tremendous shock and explosion force caused muny fissures to open in the provinces of Mullen and Mulldorn Counties, and the largest of these chasms caused by the explosion is over fourty miles in length and about twenty feet in width. All these cracks make many believe the disaster was of nature and not from explosions. Other parts of the State of pengull is affected in a smillar manner, and such cities as La Polama and others exere overthro n by concussion and flood, deep rifts w re vere formed in the ground in every livection, and rivers have changed their course because of the flood. " "To speak of more stranger instances the lefty walls of the outside and inside mouts of the mobolization camps at Dorothy Gale kere said to have been destroyed, and the road loading through the famous Big Girl Knool or crossing it, was barricaded by a landslide from a hill" said Penrod. "It dops seem strange however us strange

The problem is said to be " e very easy to the consistent materialist. To starring all is envel ev envolved in the chain of unusual causes, which have a vile purpose behind it, a blame before all the world. That is why he wishes to investigate. We can all grieve and lament, or we can rejoice, but when disaster occurs sorrew comes. There is a perfect chain to the cause of the disaster, and effect follows cause mechan ically. But Starring has seen before him the same facts, the same relentlessness of the disaster. Not that he wishes to complain, but he wondered that if God is good why did he He allow this evil to befall such good cities as Abbieunn! Or sas he allowing it for a future example of Glandelinia . fAnd would He allow him and his followers to find out the facts as he desires. Pelieving in God, he believed that He created Mature and gave it its laws, and not for claudelinia to interfere with. Therefore Starring believed that if claudelinia did all this she blaschemed God in natural actions. He thought also that the whole nation must learn the rule and avoid the evice.

evils . He said that to allowe Clandelinia to go on this way, Abbisannia might as well step off the precipice, or build a city in the crater of a valcano vigoriously active. The nation need not wait for some new catastrophe to mearn this lesson all over again. The whold nation nust keep its eyes open and not submit to Glandelinias making of avoidable injuries. hen a friend dies no one thinks of it as a jug judgement of heaven on us for our sine as if God were sending a special chastisement every one usually thinks of it us that of nature, and of gods wise way of removing and ronewing the generations, and if ou our ignorance of the naturare nature of causes e hastens the end of ones life we should take the blame to curselves and learn the more how to control these laws.

""""STARFING HEARS OF A SHIP TOSSED BY GIANT WAVES OF A FLOOD"" BOTH OF THE CAPTIAN OF THIS VESSEL HUMBHARD BURNER STARKING HEARS HOW THE CREW SPERT LONG HOURS OF TERFORMANDAMIN WRECK OF ANOTHER SHIP BY THE EXPLOSION *******

A THE ABBIEANN Steamship known as the Hansome, and laden with peat and aspault coming from the city of acremento ,Abbicannia state, to Abbi a Abbicann and southward bound, and they reached Pandora as the Captian told starring on June the 17th after an experience which the oldest of the sac sailors on board, said they had never observed before, and hoped and prayed they would never see again. At first the Handsome ran into a mystericus port of storm caused by the heat of forest fires, when some miles from the blaze. Then for twenty two hours and five minutes the yessel was buffeted and tossed about in a terrifying fashion, when caught in the terrent of the flood that swept Abbieunn. The crew dazed, frightened and puzzled by the strangest of all these phenomonous had expected that every moment would be their last.

As told in simple satyle by Captlen nortone, the story of the ships plight is graphic enough to be a sort of creation of fiction.

" On May the 28th" said the caption to Starring "We touched at Aberdeena for water and fuel and provisions. Mine was a refugee sh ship heading for one of the zones where a recent flood discater had occured, and we were bringing provisions. We had an easy voyage down the Mic-Hollester Rum River from Giacomo, and we wanted to finish an easy run here. We left Eacremento on the same day. Of course nothing worth while talking about occureduntill about four or five days afterwards or about june the 2th ...

We were pladding along slowly that day, and the sun though appearing in the heavens shone through a strange haze that covered all the sky andmake it appear a sort of stronge yellowieh white.....

About noon I took the bridge to make an on observation for I know the haze in the sky was caused by the forest fires. And also there seemed to be an unusually strong east by south wind blowing, and the weather seemed to be hotter than ordinary for even the season. The normal season for Jime at that time is supposed to be for the hottest at about ninty eight or less in the shade. It was over 100. I shed my coat and vest and also my outside shoit, and got into what little shade there was, but soon discovered the sun had nothing to do with the heat as there ewas no relief any anywhere ... As I worked it grew, hotter, and hotter I did not know what to make of it but suspected it came from the forest fires.

About three colock in the afternoon it was so hot that all hands and all the pasengers began to talk excitedly about it. It was I20 in the shade, shade and believe it it was still rising...... We reckened that something queer was coming off but just then none of us could explain what it was. You could see the pitch

Then as quick as you could wink an eye we were struck by a large surge of water coming down in a perfect torrent from the northwest, and for a moment big waves of water that looked as if they were coming from all directions, and with lots of floating wrecking of houses and household goods and furnitures and bodies of drowned ag at once began to smash against our side.

This indeed was very queer to me, because the river a moment before was as smooth as: I ever saw it. The river did not do it, water even poured into the river, and , saw saw levees d fall in before the pressure of the torrent. I had all hands piped on deck and we battened down everything losse to make ready for what I believed was a typhoon striking the land and driving the sea into the rivers. But it was no storm. Yet there was something wrong with the sun that afternoon. It grew red, and then dark red like a smiths coal fire and then about four oclock it went outaltogether. The day got so dark that you could not hardly even see the forward eb end of the ship.

We got out eletric lights going, and put on our i cilekins ready for what we expected to be a torrent of rain.

All of a sudden from the southeast there came a ri red bright glare that showed up the whole tumbling sheets of water for miles and miles .. There was not even a breath of wind. will sir, at that awful minute there began the most exciting time I have ever been through my whole life, and I have even bee been on every sea and river all my life for many travels, very second there would be awrul rushes of water like ernormous waves belting us head on, pushing us forward at a terrific rate of speed, striking us on the side, and broadside, sometimes hurling wreckage of boards all about us and flying even household furniture on deck.

We could see the wreckage coming for without any stopp the glare in the distant continued and increased brighter and bibrighter Fomething else we could see. too. Animals of all kinds struggling in the water. There were hundreds of them on all fides. And birds. A flock of them squaking and crying, and creaking, made for our rigging and perched there.. seeming as if they were scared to death death.. and the queezest part of it all was the water. itself. It was hot, not so hot that out feet or bodies could not stand it when it washed over the decks, but hot enough to make us think that it had been heated by a furnace under the flood. Well that sort of thing went on for twenty four hours or more. The wayes and herrid rush of water, the red glare in the sky, the hot water, the struggling enimals in the torrent the masses of fleating evirling wrockage, the passing of houses on the torrent and all the rest of the cod things odd things happening, frightened the crew out of their wits. All of them continually prayed out loud, and some kept yelling and running around, and one of the passengers shouted" the end of the world is coming". We were all worried, and even , and all the officers began to think for sure that the passenger was right, and that the end of the world was coming. Mighty strange things happen on sea and land but this broke all records.

I though frightened out of my wits kept to the bridge for all those twenty four hours, when the first hour of the next noon came we were still being carried ob. On and we were all pretty well tired out by that time but there could be no such thing as trying to sleep.

The waves were t still pushing and pulling us along and we did not know whether we were one mile or a thousand miles from Abbleann. At one oclock that next afternoon we found ourselves aground it groing lighter my now, and when it was day light we discovered we had been borne on by some tremenedous flood. We lay too untill the next day, then we took out reckonings, and getting the ship off the bar started off again but following la along the edge of the flood. We discovered we were seven hundred miles south of Abbienn. We could never find that place egain either. It seems as if that ci y city disappeared from the earth. No sir you couldn't get me through a thing like that again for a million dollars. Of course none of us suffered any injuries, and the vessel hernelf pulled through all right, but I'd sooner stay ashore than get caught in the path of a flood going down river, and have such darkness tpo too. at the same time ... "

Etarring knew this man, and according to his records it was known that during a forest fire in southern Angelinia State, he ran his atomer up close to the docks of a blazing town in the face of searing hid heat and helped rescue the people. cuch of this captians crew as could speak, and all c her officers and many of the passengers have p b published the same story about the mysterious freek of the flood. It was not untill the ship reached the city of pundora late inthe afternoon of a week after that the caption and all on board loarned of the disasterous explosions near AAbbieann and elsewhere. Then they suspected what had caused their troubles. Starrings chip soon was to pass through a section of the forest fire, and to be able to reach enother place and be able to tell about it (providing a ship can talk) Starring himself being able to tell a thrilling story not only of his own experience but of what he geen in a hospital at the town of Herdus, of work whom they visited to see other disaster victims.

After leaving Violet Paul for good the Mary Jane reached Hollester Town on the evening of September 2th expecting to coal, recieve pri provisions and leave the same night. She had experienced all kinds of queer weather during the day, the atmorpheric disturbances indicating that comething was happening either on land or in the nir. All Hollester town was in mourning, and the people were so distracted by the news from the neighboring districts that it was not untill september 4th that the captian could obtain coal and other provisions and proceed on the journey.

The town of Mic Terner another fire and explosion victim was passed at a distance of six miles, and all on board studied the land with glasses. The weather was intensely hot, and be cause of the haze of smoke and strange darkness he could not have a very fine view, but nevertheless the outlines of the city of Mic-Terner could not be recognizable at that distance anyhow. Everything was a mass of blue haze and the formation of the landscapes in this location also seemed to have changed.

When we were about ten miles of the northern end of the town, he saw clouds of smoke and flame shooting high in the air, and spread all over the sky, darkening the sky a little more.. Starring just for experiment had been on watch at the time with second officer George purger, and when partial darkness came upon the scene it is needless to say that Starring and everybody else who were on board the ship at the time were badly frightened. The ship was running head on into the forest forest fire.After the stories that they had heard and the sights they had seen at other places, they did not know but that they themselves would be burned, if engulfed by the tidal wave of flame, though they were only half a mile from shore.

"XCrowd on steam" the captian yelled to the chief engineer engineer, and he needed no urging. Shortly they drew on rh through a suffocating atmosphere foot by foot, and 1 at last passed the gauntlet of flame without much damage. They had been passed the utside of the storm of fire and smoke, and when Starring looked at his they were not passed the dans dager some yet, and the crew awas not yet over their fright. watch he found that he had been an hour and a half in reaching clearer air. But

No curiousity would even take them too near such a region again if they could but escape it. Starring saw several steamers moving about the town, but could not distinguish their names. He talked with the caption of a small stoamer which left Petro for any location necessary to offcer relief but it had to turn back. Then within goven miles of Mic-Turner the neddle in the company began to spin rounder round and round and point onlywhere except twend the nerthwest.

Its matter where the trip was made Starring always come across some vessel that hed a fatal explosion experience.

This the only was lying at St Ann for coal, Starring visited the wrock of an eron ernermons ground, which escaped Afrom north Abbienn on the same date. Starring when boarding it, found the chip in charge of soldiors, and two watchmen, and saveral policemon belonging to the town she had been abendaned by all the survivors of the crow, nd when he went aboard one of the watchmen was engaged in cleaning what he could of the deck, and he discontinued the work to show starring and some of his followers around. The chip resented on event appearance the looked as if she had been thrust into soft clinging mud, and then pulled out again. The mud still stuck and clung to her like coment and was more than a foot deep on her docks and mixed with clay and small and large stones, sand and grass, Armings, stenchions, terpaulin, and boat coverings had been burned away. Even the rails, steys, hatch covers, and even her emoke stacks were gone. Then the watchman dug into the mid and gravel he found here and there fragments of limestone and granite. All that was left of the giant steemer was her hull, and that being of steel had escaped destruction. Even her cabine were burned totally .

Hearing that the captian was in the hospital of the town, Starring decided to to call upon him. Starring for some cluss wanted to get from his own lips the story of the distaster and of his escape. Indebtotingthed Indeed Starring was unprepared for the sight, a terrible one indeed which greeted his eyes, when he entered the room, The girl ecou's shre shrenk from such a scene. The captions face was burned to the color of teak o wood, and large patches of flesh was burned from his arms here and there.

Both of his hands were as athed in bandages, his hair and tobarned away, and his eyes was tied over and he seemed to be in great rain. He would not speak at first untill Starring told him who he was, end then he spoke a great deal to relieve himself of his great suffering.

He said his ship called the altoonia had been in the river harbor of Abbieann for those days before the destruction occurred.

He was talking to a city boat agent in a boat alongside, when there was an eruption in the northeest of the most terrible kind, and shot forward the lower part of the cloud approached the ship like awall traveling fast, and was accompanied by a most The moon and stare disappeared immediately. The captism said he shouted to every one to stand clear, and an insent instant later the air was filled with flamecand what appeared to be falling batches of fire. The ship was immediately set ablaze from and to end and the crow and labore aboard rushed about becoming frantic with page pain and terror. There were nearly one thousand passengers on heard and only six survived the crew being annihilated, except the egninger and his assistant. The chip keeled over from the concussion of the explosion and near captized. Then she righted and the falling shower of debris continued for goveral minutes. The caption told Starring he had run to the chart room, but was driven out again by flames that came in at the port hole. Then he ruched to the engine room telephone and signalled the engineer to pi put on full steam. some one then seemed glad to respond, and the ship began to move but the steering jam gear was a jammed by the concussion of another eruption and would not work and the concuerion leveled the smoke stocke. He kept the engines going cheed, hoping to froe the puddlos, end in so doing collided with another ship from which clouds of smoke and flame were rising.

Men and women on this ship were ri wringing their hands and rushing about frantically, and children were falling to the dock and acceming. Some of them even jumped into the river where they must have died instantly, as the caption said, for through some mysterious reason the water was boiling like a cauldron. It was also a mass of boiling mud. Many of his own crew had di disappeared, probably swept corboard by the force of the expla explosion. Every one of them he bolieved must have died a torrible death.

After a time as the caption said, he himself tried the hardest and got the the river a time as the caption sais, no nimeel tried the hardest and got the stearing goor working, the ship finally enswered her helm, and he headed her down the the river, but it was so dark it was not possible for him to soo shead of him at the shortest distance. Men lay dying all along him track, and he said it seemed as if the city had fallen to pieces. He himself though he atwood at the wheel was unable to lift his burned hands, and blood from his forehead kept running down into his eyes obscuring what vise vision he had had to hoped to obtain.

He told Starring that his escape was more like the lost soul succeeding in getting out of hell n into heavon. At last he reached the larger part of the river, and with the help of the surviving passengers, succeeded in taking his ship down as far as with the help of the surviving passengers, succeeded in taking his ship down as far as Big Girknool only to be almost engulfed in the flood that reached down there. Burling the run out of the river harbor of Abbicann the chief engines died a most horrible douth. He docaped the shook of the first explosion, started the engines, and not finding his men below, went on dock to look for them. As he thrust his head out of the hatch a mane of stones fell on him tearing his scalp so open and ripping the right side of his face completely off. This mans performance has perhaps never had a haralled in stories of many set adventures. Here the ship arived at Big Gir knool a little should of the fixed the brave man request all medical treatment untill the surviving passengers were cored for Starring was told the caption will live, and despite this coriousness of his injuries will not be diefigured.

All the time during the cruise t and tward Abbieanni city Starring felt sure something. As the ship continued on they could see nothing at all as it presed the land. A Thick hasp like black and all red colored for him over the land and shut out of sight everything that could be seen on land the ship was a sight also from passing so continually through stoke fog all the time changing the ship from yellow to cream and brown. The air was stifling and you could not see across the deck,,, and the temperature on deck. on dock. It was to be an experience of a lifetime for starring and his followers Starring tried to checke things on shore with the aid of his glasses hoping to rierce the Starring then to get some relier from the heat went below untill the ship had passed a distance beyond the town, and he had put up his glasses and stretched out on his bunkfor a nap, when the captien sent for him. As fterring came on the bridge, he said; "Look at the forest on the landside will you, tit's comparing this way," he could see him the docked and thought that along that stretch along his far as he could see in hundred big volcances were beliching but a black cloud dence cameke and sheets

"To had all got below" he end to Starring, "and then he ordered the Engineer to drive her as hard as the chip would stand intill they not clear of the storm now coming, a storm of fire. Starring increditely went below, and the engineer gave her all the coal the big funnees could take. The chil had plenty fortunately, and the firerow and engineer did not hereitate to use it. He punded her through at an increase highest speed. According to what the engineer told Starring afterwards, the very safty valves were either rearing off every new and then, or dencing a jig every minute, but notwithstanding the high rate of speed, the ship was running at, there was scarcely a minure during the hour that they were flying from the ruching con lagration when the head of steam in the boilers did not force the safty valves open, a thrilling race.

The decks were a sight Everything everywhere was covered with fragments of some

The docks were a night. Everything everythere was covered with fragments of some smoking aticle and twigs which the force of the gale had driven and scattered over the che chip. These fragments of embers as they foll on the ship smouldered out before doing any damage horover. Later Starring needing the air more clear was lying out in a bunk under an arming on the forward dock, from which he had been watching the movement of the persuading fire through a glass. A little before two colock in the afternoon he noticed the sun that had tried to come out take on a poculiar condition on doing so, it was trying to even shine brightly, yet it was surrounded by the thick haze, and finally tool took on a firry red appearance, and while still visible in its entire form through the haze of smoke, its circumference kept appearantly contracting. It finally grow smaller and smaller untill finally it looked no lar for around to the angled even then no ordinary tumbler. naked eye than an ordinary tumbler.

About title time there came a sudden rell of durker rancke, the edges which were tinged I with a red color, so though rellecting the rays of the blood red and this This cloud borne by the wind moved tward the ship like a black squallit was evidently the forcet fire was raging along the shore and striving to cross. The Abbiesum disaster took place just where Starring drouded to see. He knew the great gomini member and leader Pargar had made as colal study of the disaster.

He had made a trip of the anne kind and he had written that there were two great circles of explosion devestation in the vinicity of Abbienna and engal stude, one girld girdling the landscapes north and south, extending through the region of Abbienn called Now "The land of fire" because of the forest fires, Adelehaid, and down to Wickey Langin. The other down on northern Ameeling and extreme southern calverinta. These two circles of devastation both by flood and explosion and fire intersect at two points. The main of these these is of rengall state and Country, which includes Calverinia in the sease, the scene of the terrible Abbiesan disaster. Starring knew it is impossible to product a disaster, even though there had been more or loss theorising but it counct be proved. One fact of these supposed eruption diseasers in established, and that in it is not of volcanic origin at all, but that they were explosions of some sort of mines underground of emormous proportions, this being proved by the substance thrown up and about by the se called "oruptions" and no evidence oridonce of any mines and no evidence oridonce of any mines and of earlies are all of southern Calverinia which was exempt from these war disasters, n and there was no regularty in their appearance, neither of the floods. The explosions proceeding these disasters were always followed by carthquakes of explosion origin. And as it is impossible to predict where the next disaster will take dace, it would be also impossible to tell where it will be, but Btarring felt sure if he succeeded in his enterprise these disasters would not happen again especially on the christian side.

All this is of interest as showing that the enemy is new reaching a dangerous stage especially from desperatorion no doubt. Starring in knows also a volcano always throws off a great quantity of materials during an eruption, hydrochliste, and also subhurte notice at real seads subhurte notice.

sulphuric acide, iron, sand, sulphur, calcium, and magnoslum. The lava is of two kinds also. That whis which is easily fusible flowermore rapidly than a horse can trot. A mor more viscous kind cools into shapes lke ropes and cinders. But no such material was found, and he believed also owing to the f presence of the funes of some strange chierine the mines probably contained, it is probable that many were suffocated and so died easily. Others doubtless were buried in the ruins of the houses, or were caught in some enclosed place which being surrounded by lames resulted in slow rousting. It is indeed a most horrible disaster on all records, and one which Starring prayed ardently to God that may never be duplicated. But unless he succeeded on his mission he felt sure a probable worse one might occur in the near future.

Starring even bolieved were earthquakes, but which later turned out to be the concussions caused by the explosions, of feroe was the recent disaster in the vinicity of Lake Selicia that all that region has been completely depopulated. Nor were any of these disasters the only source of perit.

osionous exhalations from the fumes of exploded materials were for a time exhalad from extensive to tracts making such districts for a time entire uninhabitable. Starring had asked for an account of the doath of many other porsons, who had perished in their agreements to obtain a nearer view of the de drea dful phenomenon of the Indeed Calverinia was violenty shaken by violent concussions which at first

The First Mate being scared advised a retreat, but Starring would not hear of it. Fortume befriends and helps the cause of the brave. He cried, and the caption ordered the ship to press award tward Stallen junction. Here he did his best to encourage some of his followers whom he found in great constarration, against them that the figures

The twilight of the smoky afternoon foded away as the maky pall spread further from its centor, and enveloped the river and thip in a common gloom. When the darkness increased the distant forest fringed was lit up not only with the intermittent distant tongues of flome but also with a continuous radia glow, and if from some vast hidden hellish furnace, so passed the night, then came the hour of dawn, but this time not the light of day. Not yet even now were the torrors of the forest fires at an end. He was assured also by reports recieved by the captian when the ship halted for a time that during the progress of the terrific conflagration a multitude of men and repear would appear from sommingly everywhere and no where sometimes on the slopes of the stopes close and to be in the path of the fire, in the switzeness and go ahead at terrific blusting and of cutting and sawing down trees, digging trenches, beating out ground fires, and trying if possible counter firings.

Starring was almost sorry he had made my arrangements for the explorations of the so called explosion craters. He had a local scientist of with him who believed that the fee had really placed mines in the ground or among the hills so that the explosions were greater than any volcamic eruption ever known. Tet he believed that there was no danger for the teyn of senoth point so far, and that sconer or later the refugees would be encouraged to return to their homes. In the hospital of this town were about two hundance and fifty rationis, all injured fire fightors and ranges suffering from burns or from the effects of inhaling the suffocating emoke. It is for these survivors and others in the whole disaster zone who have been deprived of means of full or least support that help is needed, but cannot reach them ... The next serious explosion like this will be worse than that of Abbleann, thought gterring," If I do not succeed in discovering who was responsible. And poor Calverinia, and her sisters and other christian colonlies cannot long withstand the strain of these continued disasters if they keep on much longer, and some day if means is not taken to hinder the chang in his purpose there is going to be an outburst of explosions, that will cause devastation unequaled except in the destruction of Abbienns. 1 must do something, and that pretty goom...

One investigator also told gtarring, that all the land within the explosion zone and the strip of land between Abbieann and Adeleheid have been weakened and indermined by the tremendous digging of the explosions, and may sink down because of the great cavities and undermining being formed under ground by the tremendous so called erupions. He said to Starring!

"Along a valley formed by the flow of the great Mic-Hollester River on which you are making this special trip, through earth that has been disasterously shaken by the explosions which many thought were internal disturbances, and in the midst of tremendous forest fires which still make an inferno of the land, lies the route still unharmed of the Bendon railroad. On the time of the disaster, the inhabitants of all this surrounding country fled in terror from which they thought was the begin beginning of the most disasterous volcanic eruption in history. The topography of the earth which was formed by this immense river underwent radical changes because of the explosions and there are grave fears that it would be only a question of time, when this whole explusion zone would be obliterated by a caving in of the undermined areas. We are sir traveling on the most dangerous of all territory. Our peril in inconcievably great.

This has indeed sir been the most terrible case catastrophe than smything ye yet history has known, and add to the many difficulties of handling large ships up and down this great river, the rapid current of the river, caused by the draining out of the still remaining flood down below, and the ernormous discharge of the flood, which had reached a total of more than a 100,000,000 cubic feet a second, and taking into consideration also of the violence of the heated winds, and the possible results of these forest fires I have no hesitation in saying that sooner or later the source of this very river may be destroyed by natural agencies, and from now on will offer but small inducements to ships on account of the great dangers of its navagitation. Therefore there are gounds to believe that a disaster more terrific yet may occur in this location at almost any time. These explosions you know have been like sruptions which would make grakaton pale into ineignificance. If things ain't done also explosions of equal intensity may occur again. If it is proven the enemy is responsible what will the success of your investigation do. ?"

"Bring Abbieannias full quota into the war. "answered Starring.

Starring was becoming discouraged, and disheartened, because destruction was again threatened by the forcet fires and was raging onward with a fury even greater than that exhibited when he first encountered the led Plague after Leaving general Conceptinian Arronburgs army. For twenty four hours while the city lay at the river wharf of Mannon point the forcet fire hij) owingsmoke like a terrificvolcanic crustion of the grakatoa typeadwanced onward, and explosions all all the lone long line had been as frequent as a terrific commonds enowing the desperate offerts of the fighters to stay the flames by dynamiting trees and making efforts to breach the flames.

All in the neighborhood were in panic, and even Starring and his followers went on abore to try and calm the refusees who throughd the shore in a commutian as if they were fleeling from the scenes enacted by the approach of the day of General Judgement. The whole afternoon was one of four and verror and alarm in the team itself. The earth and sky seemed to have lost its fundations, and on through the forests poured a secting storm of dearth death. The first culmination same at an early hour the following evening, when there occured an explosion probably caused by the fire, and an explosion so terrific that the concussion shock down some of the walls and houses of the city, and in panic the inhabitants fled into the open country. It was believed that the force of in panic the innovients led into the open country, it was colleved that the lorde or the explosion was much greater than all the noise accompanied by the blasting heard so frequently, and it was hoped the explosion would have breaked the burning forcet some where and change the direction of the fire storm, but nothing definite was yet known of conditions produced by the explosion, or of the citientien further north, and tward where the Red Plague was heading, make again filled the air in relling clouds and fog, darkening the sky, and embers and burning takes was borne high in the sky by the draught of the flames. There was no breath of air and in the town the temporature was nearly, such a sea of flames are working tremendous changes in the superheated atmosphere above and therefore creates whirlwinds of its own.

Indeed words were totally inadequate to describe the actual conditions, and disaster was expected every moment, and in the harber of this town every ship has atcamed up to take the penic atricker refusees away. As the steamer got well under way another flood of fire poured derives a portion of the river in huge flames, and a board stream of flames formed on the forest top on the opposite side of the stream, while the sky seemed to rain flaming embers and sparks and a terrific gale r arcse. "For God's make boys." he gasped" get to the ship quickly if you would save your lives. "The fire has crossed the stream south of the town and is heading northward. Destruction is upon the town and us.

At that moment there was a crash of thunder somewhere, seeming to come from the sky in the direction of the conflagration, and back of which it seemed as if a thousand of the loudest thunder bolts over heard in any sterm had been shot into one. The fire hit a rangers around. As the crash died away, the loud siren of some other ship, which was in the river acroumed a warning, as it put down the river at tip speed. Without a moments pause the louder whistle of the Mary Jame was blowing. There was another rumber and rumble and the sky was filled with flashes. Then as Starring looked backward the forest fire was mingled with a va t vast volume of more differently relling smoke which shot a mile or more high and a fall of flaming objects commenced. The inhabitants became panic stricken. They even fell upon their kneen and prayed to God to save them from the destruction which they feared was about to fall upon them. They even were in hysteria. The a children over acroamed and cried. Under the circumstances the presence of mind and bravery of the party under Starring was worthy of the groutest praise.

They refused to let my one not from thom.

If they die in the town weell die with them. Starring said, And his followers had spirit enough to greet this sentiment with load cheers. Indeed it was surely heartronding, and it served to shame the refugees into a show of bravery. As rapidly as possible the two parties with the refugees in their midet made their way through the smoke laden streets to the river shore. Once one of the men stumbled, but his follows waited untill he could recover himself, then all went tegether, still bearing on before them the panic stricken refused. Half a mile or more was covered in this mam manner, and each minute the sky darkened, and the atmosphere grow better and go better, and more smoke laden, and a tre temporal of bet wind was blowing down the streets. In the air was thicker smoke that made broathing hard labor, and the heat was beyond comprehension. inally the distance was covered, and it was at the end discovered that to reach the many the abstance was covered, and it was at the end absorvered that the feath that yan where she was would have to me be temperarily abandened. Then afterwards it was with great difficulty that the party were taken aboard the ship with the rescued refugeen but it was accomplished eaftly and in time. Then all eyes watched the awful configuration, the grandest and most awe inspiring insight ever witnessed by man. There and for a moment an inner column of fire that reached straight upon up into the air, and for a moment about it rose a famel shaped mass of amoke and upward rising cloud of sparks that could be penetrated by the eye only when the flames burned the most brightest. As the falling burning trees fell into the stream great clouds of steam were raised, and the simister himing could be heard unid the punding of the ships engines as the engineer put on all steam to run the ship out of the danger zone.

Yet as the ship continued on, an ob servation was taken. Then the ship was turned up the river, and was run in close under the furthest column of emoky walls.

As close as the ship could be sent without courting destruction, the Mary Jane

As close as the ship could be sent without courting destruction, the Hary James went to a leaping wall of fire among the forest of tall trees on shore. At this point the very river water was beiling, and the steam that came u ever the cides was sedense as to make it all but ipensible to see through it.

The ship then went further on, to try and stop again near the town to bring off the rest of the refugees, and found them cred ling the shore all in panic. Terrible as the scene of the forest fire the evening before it was mild in comparison with was now witnesses, and found them cred ling the shore all in comparison with that which was now witnesses. It was too dangerous a risk to get too near the interior of the town, and the heat was indeed stifling. Not a breath of air hardly ctirred ior of the town, and the heat was indeed stifling. Not a breath of air hardly ctirred and were driven away. Hany of the religions who could not catch ships left the night before at the watere edge, ready to state boats down the river, should that be necessary to escape from the terrors of the Red Plague.

There were about one hundred and sloty nine refugees on beard the shipp. Captian yenetow was in the cabin arranging his papers, and starring was in his own abortment suberintending the removal of the profugees to the shore. Three hundred and fir ty yards away lay another shipp.

addenly about five colock the sky grew dark as pitch overhead, and the nearest portion the shore was blotted out in the darknesse. Captian johnston came on deck at that moment and with a bok of fear and excitement on his face, sprang for the bridge, and,,, he had barely reached his post,, when river and sky seemed rent by a terrific flash of fire, and a terrific hurricane arose. A rain of fire was blown on the ship, and with

"Heave away the unchor for heavens cake." shouted Captian Johnson.
So panic striken were others that for a moment they had statically which had starring sprang upon the forecastle head, and with the aid of two sailors which had he forced to come and help him began to take inthe cables. The heat of the fires trying to reach the ship bit and stung them, and their nostrils were filled with the fumes that filled the air. They had rel rested in about fifteen feet of the cable when capting Johnson who had been joined by Third Officer Handon shouted again wildly, "MIt's coming It's coming, Open the windlans and let it run. to leave the forecastlehead, when a great tongue of flume reaching across the very river surged down upon the ship. Inky durkness had fallon on the scone bushind them but shoreard the shoreward the blazing trees a ill mined the scene. The wave of w fire surging clear across and borne by a galo struck the ship broadside on, and nearly every thing inflamable on dack caught fire. Starring grabbod the iron cover of a ventilator thing inflamable on dock caught fire. Starring granded the from cover of a ventilator and ran tward the steerage with the ventilator over his hoad, to shell it from the heat of the flames everhead. He was caught in a rush of sailors, and refugees aboard tward the same shelter, knocked down and almost trampled on. It was at this time that he received some slight burns on his neck. Though the ship was going full speed now the far reaching flames was still pouring across and tward the ventual deck, and members of the crew and refugees were fleshing to all safer quarters of the dock. Starring would have been been one of those nearly burned to douth, had not two refugee woman seized him and dragged him into the steerage. There they stuyed, and by wrap, ing their

Starring hearing of it, jumped everboard, and drawing himself upon a hatfa hatfa cover dragged the capital upon it. A patch of falling leaves fell squarely upon Capital Johnson head, but starring knocked it away before it singed his hair. A rope was thrown to Starring and both he and the capital were hauled on board.

Then the ship continued on full speed untill the vensel passed the wall of fire and Starring and the captian remained below all that time. Then it was believed time Starring alone went on deck. The fire was still raging and spreading on the opposite shore with immeasureable fury, and it was still as dark as night, except where it was lighted by the leaping flames. It could not have been more than five minutes between the time the sky first darkned darkened to the time they passed the surge of flames, and the time the sky first darkned darkened to the time they passed the surge of flames, an starring returned to the dock. Litty eight persons were working like mad to put out the firse blazing on the ship, the vessel being on fire in a dozen places. Then Starring saw a huge ship coming down upon the Mary Jane, apparently unmangeable. There was a man at the wheel of this ship however, and Starring ran bolow, seized some flag and waved it wildly to warn this other ship off.

The however nearly collided not be able to see the other other in the fog, but it was only a side glance blow and did not do any damage. Then the Captian himself of the Mary Jame appeared, and turned his at a stretch on the continually very six had not responded to his call, and those who were working were seriously burned, and he found of only out of sixty eight refugees no board his ship only fifteen remained alive. Starring th and the crew, and the rangers together carried the suffering survivers below and made them as comfortable as possible. Then Starring the suffering survivors below and made them as comfortable as possible. Then Starring and his own followers also began to aid the sailors to fight the fire on the shipp.

Their desperate struggle continued untill the following morning, while others fearing they would not succeed in getting the fire out began to build a raft out of materials gathered below the deck ...

They were about four hours in building and provisioning the raft. Life preservers were strapped about the injured, rough ac cars were constructed, and even a spar and some sails got ready, for they intended if possible to make their way down the river as fatfast as possible, yet for all this work, it was not necessary, the fires on the ship was put out, and then despite their own handicapped condition were finally on one enap was put out, and then despite their own handicapped condition were finally compelled to rescue the crew of another ship which was also on fire. Every many on deck shouted together for help, and every body west tears for joy, when the rait made so hastily was lowered and then came alongside of the ill fated ship, and starring and twenty others in 1 including the captian and his officers began the work t of rescue.

They took off fourty eight persons altegether from this doomed ship which was the Thomas, but some died as they were brought aboard. Most of them suffered terrible agony being burned internally as well as externally. The arful heat caused by the flames leaping include across the river entered their ness and moths mouthe, and even penetrated their care.

Starring saw hundrads of dead bodies of all kinds of ferest entered in the river.

Starring saw bundreds of dead bodies of all kinds of forest animals in the river. They floated on down the river, and the entire region we was a charnal house. The first offi cer of this doomed ship was among those lost by being panic stricken and leaping overboard. Another man said he swed his life by the reason that he was asleep in his bunk when the forest fire suddenly rushed down and across the river, and the tidal wave of flames overwhelmed the ship. When the fire enveloped the ship this man drew his blanket about his face. There was an open porthole in his cabin, and some of the flames rushing in burned the hair off his head,,, which was turned tward

the aperture. How v However he escaped other injury. After this Starring never saw a river harbor as ghaitly as St Johns, when he entered it on the following morning at about nine thirty oclock. The hills far distant was still aftre and smoke was rising and spreading ou li out like an immense mushroom was still aftre and smoke was rising and spreading ou li out like an immense mushroom and overshadowed the landscape. The water of the river was covered with charred limbs of trees. And as the ship finally approached what had been St yohns its outlines were invisible in the fire and smoke. At hundreds of places tongues of fire were shocting up indicating where buildings were burning. Near by lay the blackened hull of some big ship. There were six or seven other smoking black hulls in the river, six of fairly large vessels. The ship steamed through the river are partly pass the town, those on deck looking for signs of life but saw none. No trees were standing with a distance as far as eye could reach, all a sea of smoking forest ashes and debris burned to dust and the scene was one of indescriable desclation.

Thick smoke hing over the scene and the air was full of fumes that is noticed after the ravages of a forest fire.

Starring heard from one of the survivors from the ship that had been burned the ravages of a forest fire.

Starring heard from one of the survivors from the ship that had been burned the story of his escape. He said the captian had ran the ship on a race for ten miles with the swiftly advancing fire, when the fire finally over took the ship, and the captian who was at the wheel dropped from exhaustion. He told also of how the town was hit, and how the people running through the streets were struck down by falling walls of fire gutted buildings, and how several times many others fell over the bodies of those who died, Another man told the following story of the struggle on that ill futed vez vessel, when it was enveloped by the blaze, which leaped the river.

He claimed that the ship had no escape whatever from the flames; and that

He claimed that the ship had no escape whatever from the flames, and that in an attempt to escape the ship ran head on into the blaze. Captian johnson urged the theship onward with the hope of getting out of the forest fire region. They reached another little river shore town about two oclock in the afternoon. Then here at the proper time the survivor came forth with his story. It is as follows;

We left the city of Pandora at the later afternoon two days ago, and arived near St johns on the evening of that fatal day, our orews had seen the forest fires from the woods for many miles north of here during night, and the smoke easily by day, and now as we came up into the river port of the town the pillars and waves of day, and now as we came up into the river port of the town the pillars and waves of flame appeared to be rising high and the smoke clouds rolled grandly and was most intense. While on dock they remarked to our captian that the forest fire at that spot was at its worse. They had never seen such a forest fire before. And evidently that was the opinion of everybody in St Johns, for the piore, the streets, and in many cases the howse tops, and troe tops were covered with spectators, enjoying the majestic yet fearful spectacle. Aftervour strange visitors left, the Second Mate said to

"If the captian gives us permission will you go ashore with me, and get as close as we can to get a better view of the forest fire?"

"Rum for your liv life" I shouted to the others, as I saw the flames getting as bad as on the other side and roff roofing us all in a fearful canopy of fires.

men as on the other side and roff roofing us all in a rearrul canopy of fire.

"Oh no, it will burn itself out before it gets to our shipe" some one replied as I turned and ran into my room on the starboard side of the ship. If the wind did not blow all would have been well but it was literally the fire hurricane, and the ship was tossed about in the boiling river, and something like a great will pool pulled her far over on the port side. Then a terrible hurricane of fire enveloped her, and the roaring force of the glae gale hel heeled her far over on the starboard side, so that she almost law on her hear ends. At the moment this fire hurricane swent over us that she almost lay on her bean ends. At the moment this fire hurricane swept over us that she almost lay on her bean ends. At the moment this fire hurricane swept over us I heard a terrific noise frightfully loud and threatening. This turned at to be the sound of our four masts, and the four huge smoke stacks and the port side of the bridge being swept away like chaff.

Even then we had not recieved the full force of the fire hurricane for the ships nearest us served as a screen for us. I was told later that two ships in front of us were flung down on her sie side blazed up in flame in every part of their hull and plunged down beneath the river in an instant. Then our captian heard all the commotion he leaped at of bed, dressed only in his night clothes, and ran up on on the bridge. He was one of the bravest men I ever saw.

"George" he called to the first officer. "Go heave the archer llurry."

Then the captian in a frenzy called down to the through the tube to the chief Chief Engineer crying; "For God's sake let us get out of this as soon as we can. We Chief Ingineer crying; "For God's sake let us get out of this as soon as we can. We are in hell." We however had full steam up in one boiler, and the other fire was bunked. The chief, and the third engineer made a rush for the engine room to get the only going. The First mate yellod to one of the crew, to get the windlash ready to heave, and as the man ran tward the windlass the fire harricane struck us, and swept him away, so that he nover reached the windlass. The First late was then seen running for the Companion ladder so as to reach the forepeak, where he could give further orders, when the second mate selzed him around the waist, and suddenly and almost roughly dragged him into the steerage. That vact saved the First Mates lire, and neither he or the first muto was even singed by the fire.

When I run furiously into my stateroom on the starboard side of the ship my idea was to plungs under the bed clothes in my br berth and so protect myself from the fire and heat but before 1 sot half way covered the fire hurricane hurled the ship fire and heat but before I got half way covered the fire hurricane hurled the ship iver almost on her beam ends on the starboard side.

The porthole of the stateroom was infortunariedly for me wide open, and the The porthole of the stateroom was infortunariesly for me wide open, and the water came dashing in in groat force. It was almost scalding hot, and the inrush of the water swept me off my borth, and I staggered out into the middle of my room. The water was so hot that I felt us if the fire was burning me up, and I madly tore off my cout and vest. As the ship rolled "till deeper, I "hought she was going to turn turtle and thun sink, and as she lay wallowing in the river and trying to pick herself up I held fast to the cupboard, hen all quieted down I jumped outside then into the gayway canguay. The captian was on the bridge giving orders and trying to save his ship when the blust of flames overwhelmed him.

He was bareheaded and only dressed in his night clothes, and his hair was singed He was bareheuded and only dressed in his night clothes, and his hair was singed off and he was burned from head to foot. Then whether he was crazed and delirious by the pain or whether he became so weak that he could not support himself, I do not know but our captim immediately fell overboard. One of the sailors jumped after him catching the captim by the shirt collar and tried to bring him back. Then the big booty hatch torn from one of the other ships came floating by, and the sailor font of the dilled the captim up mate it too, nor many minutes the poor captim faulay senselses, and his rescuer thought he was deadd. Then he was surprised to hear him suddenly meak:

"Get me back to my ship. For heave heavens suke get me back to the Thomas. If I have to die I must die on board my ship." Then the captian lay back as if d.ad, but the saller soon had him back on deck. As he brought the captian over the side he saw women and children all barned and bleeding and with their clothing hanging in burned and bloody shreds. It was atothis time that I took the chances and made my way forward from my stateroom. I saw a child a little boy s lying by the no. three hatch. I found that he was dead, his hair was all burned off, clothing too, his skin was scorche scorched black, and what was left of his clothes, and also his skin hung in ragged patches. The ship had passed the blust of fire long ago, but at the moment of tha the disaster the hurricane had hurled through the air clouds of flaming embers, which the disacter the hurricane had harled through the air clouds of flaming embers, which came down upon us in a rain of fire. Everywhere they fell they started a fire. Hot sahes were flying with this hair of fire, and breathing in the heated atmosphere and smoke was almost impossible. For a time it was impossible to see at ant any distance. The rearing of the conflagration, the sk shrieks and crise of the many dying, the rain of fire and ashes, and the fumes of smoke from the burning trees, and the glare and the continued darkness everywhere made it seem to me as if the end of the world had come and we were all in hell.

the glare amid the continued darkness everywhere made it seem to me as it the end of the world had come and we were all in hell.

The ship was already on fire o in both of the holds forward, and her saloo aloo aft was blazing. The rain of burning embers blown by the wind lasted only four or five minutes. I and three other survivors stood looking at each other, gway where they we went lay dead men and women and dying people, who were so scorched and torn and disfigured by the heat and the fire, that no one could identify them! The dying and the linjured were all beging for water, and , am sure they must have all inhaled the flames. Then we went alt we saw several women and children coming to us from the saloon. They were burned and begged for water. I went forward to the messroom to draw some, but I found the messroom tank tossed up on deck wreched apart by the by the fury of the forest fire harricane, and not only mmyt but scorched dry. I got a pitcher of water from the washstund in a stateroom.

One of the survivors asked me to help him put out the fire in the forehold, and we got four or five fire buckets. We did pretty well with the forehold and the other portion but forward of that we found the captians cabin macking and went in there. A part of the flooring and the matresses were on fire, and as we pulled out the mat tresses to throw water on them one dead body after mother rolled out on the floor.

These were of some passengers, women and children, two two of the firemen and some of the crew who were off duty at the time the forest fire reached across the stream and overwhelmed our ship. The door of the foreactive was thus, and the portholes open. They were not burned therefore I believe they must have died from inhaling the flame and the fumes. We put out the fire in this cabin and also in the forecastle but could not succeed in the main holds. The wind and rain of fire fiery forecastle, but could not succeed in the main holds. The wind and rain of fire flery embers had ceased, and we were grouping our way in the darkness that would be like erebus if it was not for the glow of the fires.

A big steamship which proved to b. yours, which we knew to be yours, came up a aster of us as if she were going to pass. The Second Late who survived ren to on the bridge and burned four coston lights. He got no reply from yours. I feered that the only reason no one on on board your ship did not enswer us was that every body on board was killed or disabled, when in fact at first no one saw ys us. Then a surviving sailor suggested that we throw one of the skids overboard and use that as araft. We launched the skid. Then we saw through the fog a ships light coming t tward us and soon we again made out yours. Some one on your ship hailed us from the bridge.

"Aboy there, how many of you is there on board."!"!!!!!"

"I don't know, answered" but many of us are dead..."

"Then came the order" get all the living together, and we will take you aboard. our chip." the man on the bridge called to us. Then there came to us out of the darkness a big raft, manned by you and a number of others. Now for the first time we began to take an accurate account of how many living there were abound our ship. Including those who showed the very faintest signs of life, there were only ten, out of our crew and passengers numbering fifteen hundred and six. All of them were taken aboard your ship at nine oclock in the evejing evening, all of them except me fortunately had the hair burned off their heads. The faces of all of them were pwollen and cut, and near the hair burned oil their needs. The faces of all of them were swollen and cut, and they were disfigured. Of course it was necessary to place each sufferer in a cool sheet which was carried by four men of your ship, and with two men lowering the sheet by the corners, and two standing below at the edge of the slanting deck of the burning Thomas, to recieve them at the raill our poor follows were lowered with the greatest care and then hunded or halled down aboard the big raft. Of course I must say that the women and children who were not injured were the last to comp. It is a rule of women and children first but not in case of our affliction, when it was the injured first.. The captians wife refused to be go first untill her husband had been hauled aboard your ship. The sailors from your ship carried the taitath poor woman very tenderly to the side of the ship and lowered her o upon the raft. The captian of your ship then left a large rescue crow on board the Thomas to gather up the rest of the sufferers, and headed the raft tword tward yours. After several trips back and forth they were all taken on board. We saw you pick up many others at the northerly end of the burning city at the face of great danger.

Starrings ship now proceeded slowly and cautiously for a northwestern course. Even then the smoke of forest fires had not hardly lifted, but nevertheless those on board had an occassional glimps of the ruins of the city of St john. The city and all the country around it were blackened with fire, both the shattered walls of the houses, and the remaining bits of charred trees looming up in glowing embers over the great clouds of heavy white and gray smoke that had settled over everything. Flames were still rising from hundreds of houses, showing that all the inflamable materials in them them had not yet been com consumed. The immense shipping in the or at the river docks had totally disappeared and had left no trace. The last Starring saw of the ship the Thomas she was lying almost on her beam ends within with immense sheets of fire blazing out of the steerage, both the holds and the saloon. It wasevident that she would burn to the waters edge and sink. Out of the fleet of a hundred ships that was at anchor in the harbor of the city of St John only the blazing hull of the Thomas was left. Four of the rescued members of that ship died on the short run tward ilunsonville, so there were only a few to be taken to the big hospital there.

The doctor in charge of Starrings ship told him that even the wife of the Thomas's captian cannot live and he said that out of all those who were taken from the ship only three or four maybe less will survive. nother man was picked up from a small raft in the river. He was all in rags. His castom consisted of a battered old soldiers h hatthat he had picked up from the edge of a ruined town and his suit of underclothes and on old pair of trousers were tied around the waist and at the ankles with pieces old shoestring, no stockings or shoes, a mans slipper on one foot, and a womans old abandoned shoe on the other.

When this man was brought abourd the wary June he was so shaking and trembling when this man was brought abourd the pary Jane he was so shaking and trembling that he could not hardly walk or talk. It eve made Starring himself almost shake to think of the holl he went through at St Johns. Starring was not much burned but holes were in his clothes, and the cuption himself had suffered more from the terrible shock than anything else, and some of them believed he would never get over it completely. All this while the sky remained totally overcast, and sometimescit grew a little lighter and then darker, and sometimes the blackness was intense. Sometimes no one could remain on deck for the wind being on the east the smoke would drift acrosss the river in blinding and checking quanities. Sometimes the ship had to be stopped on the way, and although Captian Johnson knew that the forest fire was drifting on to new courses he decided to allow it hereafter to beat him instead of allowing his ship to get shead of it for he did not wish to run the fire gauntley a second time. He headed the ship slowly for Hansonville which lay on the regular northwest route, to unload the rescued refugees there. Fifty miles away the flames could be seen, and one mountain side was all in seeming eruption for a thick pall of rolling smoke hung over the scene, and Starring feared it might be evident that even the city of Hansonville might be burning. They were still within full sight of St john passing now the main and northern harbor of the city, and they came across another ship that was still emouldering.

Not a living thing was seen about the harbor but bodies of many an m animals were were still floating in the water. A stretch of fire was pouring up the side of a forested hill, and in slowly passing by Starring saw a vulley in which hundreds of people had formerly lived all asmoke and aflame. The uspect of the scene where the tremendous conflagration had passed was gras grayish white and all smoking, and the slopes of one mountain up which the fire had passed were covered with a clock of ashes and the few skeletone of still smoking trees, the ashes making the scene appear as if a volcano had thrown clouds of ashes all over the scene. A great cloud of white cmoke smoke was above this desolated hill. Indeed the desolation was complete and there was not a sign of a single lying thing as far as the vison vision could reach.

not a sign of a single lying thing as far as the vison vision could reach.

Ceptian Joh son soon discovered that for a time he could do nothing because of the dreadful smoke haze, and the ship was slowed down and undered near the extreme northern part of the burned town of St John. while waiting here for the smoke to lift some of Starrings followers picked up four little children on a raft de de gaft. They had been inland, and had sectaged to the shore and taken to the rait, rather chancing this risk than the dangers from the blaze. hen Starring got within halling distance of them he heard their cry for help. They had been burned and had endured much suffering. Starring decided to have them landed at Hamsonville as soon at that often fering . Starring decided to have them landed at Hansonville as soon at that city was reached.

ctarring who was so near St Johns during the horror that descended upon it, and was an eye witness to the destruction done to it by the fire was asked to write his experience but he did not deem it worth while an refused. About fourty orphans, mostly Calverinians were also brought on the ship with two nums rescued from the town, Of

Of all those who were rescaed from the ill fated town few however were injured. Starring had hoped the voscel could have sailed that day but it had remained smoky and dark the darkness continuing and he was worried for as far as sye could reach inland from the river the utmost devastation and desolation prevailed and he feared that a trip down the river to the Abbieann region would be of no avail. The appearance of the whole landscape was like whitewash, or indeed a sea of slaking line might have easily resembled the scene with the thick smoke rising from it and scattered here and there the smoking gaunt skeletons of burned trees. Nothing was visible but that awful sea of ash and smoke and overtopping all a burning rides. In the harbor every vessel that had been passed that had survived further north was stripped of masts and deck housings. It seemed as if the whole country was dead, that all its inhabitants are deed, and that the country would never be redeemed from the seles of the fire, and the flood and explosion horror. We one it is believed could live here now. Outside of the diseaster zone the people who are not in want, did their bet to aid those in trouble. Yet when all the bodies are taken care of there will be little more to do. The diseasters left little to be done.

Despite the fact that the city of Calverine itself was four hundred and eighty miles distant from the head of the forest fires, the streets of the city as Starring recieved word by telegraph from there(wireless) was hidden at times with a strange fog that smelled like smoke from burning wood and pine needles which at first no one in that city could account for... The mayor said in his wireless message that the first appearance of the fog was noticed on the morning of St September the twent First and for two days after the fog continued, sometimes dreadfully thick and some times less, when the wind turned to west, or north, or straight south, the fog disuppeared. There was no sunshine at the time the fog came. Starring suspected there was so much smoke sent by the firesthat the winds carried it over the ontire state.. state..

Storring also reached or recieved word that it would be high time when he could reache the city of pansonville. So rapidly had the horrors of the last fortnight piled upon one another that to the people of that big town it now seemed ages since the first nows was recieved there. It was just on September the Thitt third that the first wireless recieved from some unknown location announced the unusual progress of the forest fire, and gave warning of the great disasters that were to dislow. Starring in trying to got details while the ship lay at dock learned that the forest fire had been threatening this big town for ten days, but often a change of wind forced the fire was about thirty miles away the volumes of smoke issueing from it was so great and the rolls so fantastic and large that the conflagration seemed raging within some part of the city, and even then flames had been seen among the roll rolling smoke. Maturally all in the eighborhood of the forest fire were in a state of unatural and horrible consternation.

Some come took the warning and began to leave mansonville but the great preportion of the dwellers remained to take their chances. The next day smoke began to reach the city, and thereafter business in the city was practically suspended......

It is worthy of note that the flames were first seen to rush forward from the east stretch of the Mic-Hollester Woods, and the question was then asked,

"What will become of all our beautiful forests if the Good God does not send us rain sconf"

Many of the scientists also believed that if the main flood waters of the Abbieunn torrent had reached and swamped the forests in that vinicity, the fires then probably would have been stopped. Cables came through on Monday telling how the Sunday had been spent in Hansonville——the last unday that was to be spent in that once flourishing four. A stiff southwest wind then blowing had kept the smoke from fogging flourishing town. A stiff southwest wind then blowing had kept the smoke from fogging the city, and that day all were more hopeful. Yet the day also was one of prayer, and of Novenas offered up for the cause and the victims of the disasters with of course on Thanksgivings added.

Then came the first serious news, just as Starrings ship arived to the citys docks. docks. It however was first told by the cables, that the forest fire had again changed direction and had spread so that no matter what way the wind blew, except from the north, the breezes would not alter the dangers any, no that also other big towns had been destroyed and that scores of hundreds of persons were missing. It was not believed in Hansonville that this could be true, even it seemed to them that it was impossible that such a catastrophe could occur, and that the forest fire was so large. Nevertheless a gloom came upon the people of this city, who had many friends and relatives in all the towns reported dd destroyed by the conflagration.

That same day the news was recieved that the city of St John was destroyed, and that great trouble had resulted in that region, and only thi this served to impress every one with the possibility of great disaster, but no one was prepared for the sacrifice that was soon to be reported.

SECURING THAT WAS SOON TO BE REPORTED.

With orders to repair the cable between St ann, and Calverine, a cable ship called The Gertrude had left the city of Hansonville the day or two before Starrings ship artived. Even it was feared then that some meson dangor awaited this ship, and therefore the captian was instructed to use his own own discretion and to take no risks if it was not necessary. All communication with all points a shout by cable .
ceased it was announced that the underground cables were broken or metted apart by the fierce heats of the blazes cutting Hansonville off from the world in general. Strange detonations were heard from the south and east... It seemed to them like the heavy gume of ships of war far out at sea. It was believed however that the fires had struck the Rangors are enals but the explosions were heard over an area of over fifty miles...

Panic was beginning to make itself felt in the town when Starrings ship arived. The ship did not b go fur in however but remained out for water space.. for he feared feared there also would be trouble here.—and that if the ship nentered the river harbor close to the docks it would not havecroom to meansur meansure for her own eafty. No news was recieved after the ships arival untill that evening, when a wireless report was circulated that some calamity had befallen the city of St Thomas. From Calverine came a cablegram announcing that one ship which had left Calverine for St Thomas two days before had returned a wreck, with many scorched and badly injured aboard, some injured so badly they could not recover. It had been told by the captian of the ship which name was not lourned that St Thomas had been destroyed by the forest firem and that all the shipping in the river readstead that did not get away was burned down to the waters edge.

The inhabitants were in an open plain surrounded by burning forests, homeless having had not even time to save the leasts of their bolongings. That was a terrible blow to those in Hansonville. Starring knew that he had just recently left some refugees tore there ffo from his ship thinking that town safe and it was feared that the Cable ship had gone there. And that fear was soon known to be too well founded. To Starring and all the rest these were black days here --- days of morni mourning and heartrending grief to all of the inhabitants, a day to make even the most thoughtless shudder and stand aghast. The mind first failed to take in the ernormity of the forest five calamity. And to make it worse news came the fire was coming headon for Hansonville a screaming hell. One other cable had failed to communicate with St Thomas. The condition were then sixteen hours after the catastrophe so threatening that the captian of another ship who returned to Hansonville said that he did not dare take his ship nearor than twenty miles but leathe to leave without at least trying to do semething a boat was sent in through the impenetrable smoke pall and darkness. How near the boat not no one knows but near enough at any rate that when on roturning to bring the word that the city of St Thomas was in flames, and not a soul was to be seen. This ship had not reached the river readstead of St Thomas when the fire struck. He was near enough to see the awful fate of the Cable ship sent from Hansonville, and many other ships in the harbor. The inhabitants had probably fled befr before the fire hurricane burst upon the city. It is his belief that the fire broke through the cap made by some ravine and this shifting caused it to change its course and come for the vi city.

There was as the captian stated an explosion that scattered fire, burning fragments of trees, rocks, forest fire ashes and burning leaves for five hundred yards, in all directions.

It would also explain how the inhabitants were driven outso quickly as have no time time to save their belongings. Meanwhile while Starring waited for a time at Hansonville the terrible news continued, and all feared the fire would soon wiped out their city as well...

The next day was another day of terror and panic which was among the people of the city of Hansonvillo. For sixteen hours on the next day a terrific gale spring up from the straight east bombarding the city with flying embers of burning trees, sending into the streets clouds of dust and smaks, and flaming brands rained upon the city. Houses closest to the danger zone were said to be destroyed, and fires were started in many quarters. With the flying embers came clouds of flaming leaves and sahes. The air was zo so filled with smoke that it was barely possible to breathe, and at times it seemed as if suffication must be the fate of all who could not be taken, on board the ships in the harbor and many started to fe fice for all the vessels. While in this city the loss of life has not been great, the forest fire in coming near to this town was far worse than Starring had ever observed it before, and for many hours the explosions afresh from rangers striving frantically to s check the flames were so heavy and continuous that it seemed as if the city would be shaken from its own foundation. The wind grew in intensity and burning leaves fell at places or flew into the air and borne on by the wind as thick as snow flames in a blinding bliz blizzard, and the flames could be seen rishing on like the furious wave of theocean in a hurricane....

Thousands got onto the ships to leave the city of mansonville in panic. Children were crying, women were praying and others were even crying loudly. Some were leaving for the mountains to almost certain starvation and perils from fires if they too turned out to be in the puth of the "Red Plague, yet they preferred that to the fate that would be theirs if the conflagration trapped them in the city. Others were fleoing tward near by towns, there being forced to depend upon the chairty of neighbors. Starring saw he could not land any refugees there. Fivery can be in the river harbor and there were scores of them were being constantly crowded with those who were preparing to flue at the appearance of the great danger; as small boats filled with women and children who begged to be taken up. Hundreds finding it impossible to ib obtain boats to take who begged to be taken "p. Hundreds finding it impossible to its other board them to the highly have swum ould rigking their very lives in the water to avoid the the danger which fills them with more terrible dread...

One who it seems took this mode of escape was the Mayor of the city himself. When the conflagration cause so near that the city was hidden in a fog of smoke and the gale turned into a near cyclone, and while fear struck to the heart of every one in the the conflagration came so near that the city was hidden in a fog of mmoke and the gale turned into a near cyclone, and while fear struck to the heart of every one in the city, the Mayor rushed to the shore and plunged into the river. He first removed his shoes and trousers, and being little weighted with clothing he struck out for the Mary Jane which was nearly a mile off shore, with steam off and ready to put off down the river rather than be gamtlettled by the fire again. He reached the ship saftly though much exhausted. He saked the captian if he would take some of the refugees on board the ship but gtarring who was in charge in person, declared if more wore on the ship the vesual would go under. In the excitement time was found to be given to garring and his officers and others of his followers, and the rangers and calverinians under his command who never lost their presence of mind and were working bravely to save those who were unable to save themselves. He saw to the unloading of a number of the refugees onto a better ship, and then the ship was ordered to run down the river coust to make observation of the course of the forest fire to see if the city was in danger or not. The ship went as close to the opposite shore as the smoke and heat would allow untill driven away by a surge of flame which reached momenturily clear across the sky and the river. Starring then by brought beach the report that new fires were raging far beyond the city and was spreading in broad streams. All along the shore near the fire zone the waiter was boiling and such curtains of steam rise that the view of the land and the forest fires was only possible only when the wind that the view of the land and the forest fires was only possible only when the wind blows with sufficient force to lift them for a few seconds. The whole country side as Starring described it is like a country driven deep into the pits of hell. The heat from the burning forests is so unusually great, and the Mary Ann went so close in tward the shore that she returned with the paint on her cides by istered..

When veturning again near the dhoos dok docks of Hansonville Starring saw a great crowd of old men and women and children on the shore signalling wildly for help and Starring thanked peaven he had previously unloaded his ship onto another of his first rescued refugees from the destroyed ships and elsewhere. All were taken on board, and those rescued were almost starved. Supplies what could be spured were given to them and then when another big ship arived from the north, the people were transferred to this, as the capitan at his orders did not go on ahead.

From all parts of this section of the country not cut off by the forest fires

From all parts of this section of the country not cut off by the forest fires and remaining flood horrors, or explosion disaster, refugees not at fire knowing the situation were flocking into mansonville, All mouna Mountain roads are said to be filled with panic stricken and starving women and children. Ariving here their terror does not decrease, and when they see Hansonville is threatened they were more unxious to press on to some safor place as they were to get here. Starring heard that and to press on to some somer place as they were to get here, othering head that all the roads were do ted with dead, or those overcome or suffering from heat prostration and many are reported to be dying, having fallen from weakness on the way. It was all was so were of fered for rescense to go out and assist those who have fallen by the way, but it seemed every one were too full of fear to be tempted by any offer. As Starring learned the punic however was greatest the day before he arised, when the sun arose shining very faintly through the haze of smoke. The skies were filled with rolling and whirling clouds that appeared fiery red, and many believed that some explosion would occur and hurl the burning forests into the sky so that the fire would fall upon them from the heavens, and the terror that had ensued was pitiful and exciting. Indeed the speciacle was so appalling and unusual that the populacecould not appreciate the sublimity of it. All day long the streets were filled. goldiers and sailors mixed freely with the women and children, all frightened witless.

All struggled to get to a place of safty, they knew not where . Indeed believed that whereever they went they faced the greatest danger.

Some screamed prayers in their frenzy, others fell to upon their knees in the streets and besught protection from above and begged God to send rain. No one were able to refrain from tears. Then when the panic began to subside a little Starring could observe there was a general scramble for the vaters or the water fronts, and the hills west of the term the hills west of the town...

With starrings ship started for Hansonville another ship had went on the utside, and made a four ofthe city and its vinicity but in the opposite direction, he passed Hanson-Ville and had a part in the work of rescues of the refugees who had been driven to the shore by the threatening fire storm advancing tward the city, and the forests beyond it. hen Starrings ship in going a short distance from the city of HanHanson ville they came within eight of a burning ridge and found the punci panic among refugees here even greater than within the city and its subburgs. The forest fires was turning and sweeping in that direction, and the valley here was a sea of smoke. There was a storm of detonations in this location, and it seemed as if great eruptions were raging near this part of the city under the endangered ridge.

A steam launch from a ship called the Heidi picked up two hundred and seventy fi ve persons who were struggling in the water and took them to a river ship. Scores and scores of others were taken to the Heidi and to even Starrings ship. The small boate boats of the latter ship ere were out constantly saving many who otherwise must have been drowned. This was a work of very much danger, as for some reason or other the river at times was as rough as the sea because of the fire hurricane blowing.

Supplies however in this town had been quite plent ifful but great suffering was be being caused by the smoke, intense heat, and lack of water. All of the river water, and and all the natural water supplies had been plo polluted by the river and the flood which has strangely enough developed sulphuric acid and thyphic Phyphold rever germs. Water that could be spured was being supplied from some of the ships, and word had been sent to other places for a greater supply.

There was as Starring learned an unual unusual ammount of charity going on here.
Those fortunate to own small boats that are sufficiently sea worthy, to make the run down the river to safer places instead of making themselves rich as they could have have done by taking those who desire to escape the wrath of the forest fires or charge extravyagent prices in domand for their transportation, took them away for little price or nothing at all. This enabled hundreds ' to get away, and the usunds had only to wait a short time to get away. Starring later decided to penetrate the territory that afternoon far enough to get a glimpse of the fire from the land and see if it was moving on the city of Hansonville or not . when he came back he reported that the whole region within his view was running with fire, and he said that as the clouds of smoke and fire rage forward the ridge so threatened can be seen burning on one side, and the valley is filled with smoke and flame and that danger did threaten the town from two sides. But he said nevertheless; .

"As long as the winds does not change its direction, there doesnot appear to be much danger. But if the wind changes we all, including ourselves will have to move and pretty blamed quick too.."

Scurcely had he said this when he heard a loud roar and boking back saw a huge mass of black or ation burst from the lower portion of the burning ridge, and this was immediately followed by a great wall of flame which seemed to rise and topple over and then down into the valley below. At first to Starring it was the sensation of an eruption and then he realized the fire at struck something that must have exploded.

There were other loud detonations, and looking in the direction of the sound he saw that there was a line of blue puffs of smoke, and sawothat the upper part of the ridge was emitting a thinblue smoke which by its simmering effect he realized to be the overheae overheated air rising from the blazes below. Without a moments delay, Starring ordered the look out to keep an eye on the scene, and he obeyed. So far as the lookout could see from his post the whole scene of eruptions did not last above two or three minutes.

Starring asserted that every one in the city would have plenty of time to escale escape for it eus was the talk of the city the evening before the fire storm threatened the place, and yet he believed it was best now to induce the people to leave while there was yet tije... time... Many of those on board his ship who had been rescued had barely sufficient clothing to keep them covered. They believed that the city was about to be destroyed by the fire as the other towns were, when they left a windstorm was sending blazing embers into the streets, and the inhabitants had either taken refuge on the ships in the harbor or as said before had fled into the mountains south and northwest of the city. From the city of St John a relief expedition sent from Pandora on returning was hailed by Starrings ship, and the captian came abourd to interview him bringing tales of horror. He have this account of what he saw;

"We knew before leaving Pandora that this forest fire horror was going to be a disaster that would shock the world, but we were not prepared for what we observed. Steaming into the harbor we saw the entire city in ruins, with no sign of life about the place, and thick smoke was rising from the black ened walls, and the smouldering wreckage of the burned forest was horrible. As we neared the shore, we observed the wreck of only one surviving ship out of a hundred, which was still smoking. The sides of this ship which looked to be the Thomas were still hot, and as the river water lapped against her it sizzled and the steam, arose. We found all the largest trees near the river shore burned down to the verybroots. Everything was desolation.

We noticed that one small house which had escaped the fire had fallen in, and the ceiling laths though torn loose were twisted all in one direction, just was one might twist a handful of straws or hay. This seemed to me an evidence that the sudden escaped of so much heat from the conflagration caused a sort of fire harricane or whirlwind in the advancing path of the " RED PLAGUE" which blew down this bouse. smoke and flame were to be seen still in various parts of the town, and far in the distance two ridges was enveloped in rolling clouds of snoke. But when we tried to enter the ruined town in spite of the heat we saw no bodies and wondered if all had escaped. Several Cathedrals were smouldering, and here and there we passed houses still aglow, and smoking.

But I came across the charred bodies of frefugees outside the city who had been overtaken by the blaze as they reached the river. Lying on a raft that was half smoking yet, was a body which we believed t was that of some fire ranger. Not far away but under the smoking trunk of a big fir tree. Lay a magnificent specimen of a man evidently another forest ranger, who had perhaps seeked to escape by the river when worsted in the fight, believing that he could escape the dangers of the burning hell by the river, but who had been overtaken. He had pulled his wet jumper over his head to avoid the suffocating smoke but all to no purpose. Just a little way in shore were six bodies in a heap. All must have been running through the burning horror to escape death, and were overpowered by the conflagration in a twinkling of an eye.

Then I came across the body of a slender little girl, hardly eight years old And I discovered that just beyond her, lay the charred bodies of two others, evidently heremother and father, their hands tightly clasped.

Showing how sudden death had coming upon those who had tried to escape, I found the body of a boy who had just stood up against a tree to rest himself. Death had stricken h him as he stood there, and it seemed evident he died without sufferinb.. suffering.

A little further down the desclated shore, I came across in what was once a road a covered wagon, and a dead horse. The horse had been burned to death, but the driver I could not find. Evidently he had escaped. Every where I saw destruction and death. Side by side I observed lying a young woman and her father, who had clasped a little boy to his breast, and had lain over it, hoping no doubt to save the childs life, though death came to all."

Later that evening a new peril which was greater than that of the morning threatened the lower section of the city near and under the burning ridge, and the city was again in panic, and every one was awaiting in fear a cataclysm even worse then that which only recently filled the world with horror and consternation. That night was one of alarm and terror here, and even the earth seemed to have lost its foundations, for all along the valley poured onward with a loud hissing roar as of a sea of sourking skyrockets a raging fiery storm of death. Even somewhere in the valley occured an explosion so terrible that some weaker buildings were shaken down, and the seeple wild with fear, , & ___at x the fate of the residents of Abbieum, deserted, their homes a second time and with fe frenzied cries rushed into the smoke forged streets av again making their ay with all speed to the water front to get boats to take them anywhere into the open river to escape the impending danger. Many of them carried household effects on their arms, while others ran about wing writwringing their hands and crying or praying. There were a few now vessels in the river coming just recently but just now they would not send boats ashore.

more continually, filled the air, again making the sky more darker than before. When the heavens are filled with the glare of the flames, as frequently happens, it could be seen that the forest fires was not yet changing its course..... After the first danger threatening the city there has been a perfect a capm calm upon the air, and yet the advancing side of the conflagration as still lashed into a fury indicating that the same fury or the same forces that was driving the forest fires on and, were working tremendous changes in the atmosphere atmosphere. Indeed no ammount of wording could describe the actual conditions. New disasters were expecting by gtarring and his friends every moment, and in the harbor of Hansonville every ship still there has steamed upond are ready to slip from their cables ane and speed away.

Starring e stimated that I20,000 people had continually rushed out into the streets of the town, shricking and praying. He also knew that a "Tidal Wave" of fire had destroyed the villiage of Canor which is a southern suburb of Hansonville, and which had a population of 20,899. .

Many letters from victims of the flood and other disasters of the past, as well as of t big Abbieann dia disaster were found to be on tarrings ship headed for many places and they were to be forwarded in great numbers. They formed a unique stries of unusual documents filled with all kinds of human interests for all future historians of the immense catastrophes.

Starring had himself felt like writing something, but he was under the most gloomy of impressions, as he knew now no one could exaggerate the situation throughout the country.... his unchaining of the forces of natu nature by landelinias menas itself means itself was unusually horrible, and now gtarring wished himself far from here. Every one was leaving the region as from a terrible epidemic, but the men folk, especially the those not yet in the army and the elder boys, at stayed behind to if possible make an effort to repell the Red Scourge. Indeed all this is very sud. The heat is suffocating advery high in temperature, and sometimes those even on board the ship cannot leave anything open as the smoke enters everywhere burning their eyes. Fortunately much food have been preserved but no one has had the courage or the heaft to eat. It is always thus during such accursed wars, when it is not a battle, it is an explosion, and when it is not an explosion it is a flood, and sometimes its a combination of battle, flood, fire and explosion and a complication of other disasters together.

As Starring had observed when he landed to take a look at the fires that new blazes had been created in the extreme southwestern territory by the treemendous winds raging and lashing the forests in that locality. At first when he saw a sheet of flame in that locality he thought it was the forest rangers burning some kind of a warning. signal. He then had climbed a high trees and could see that fire was issuing from a a new blaze. There was much smoke, and he went forward as far as he dared to go, and found there could be no doubt as to the nature of the discovery. The sky in this locality was dark, and a pall was spread over the whole neighborhood. He had sometime earlier inspected as far as possible a locality pasr which a forest fire had burned its course and saw that the destruction whu which had been wrought was something to make him heartsick. He had passed this locality only a few days earlier, and at that time the stretch from St. John to Hansonville was a most beautiful piece of forested country, and beautiful suburban homes was nestling into the green verdue making it an unusual paradize on earth. when he returned this paradize had changed into a region closely resembling the awfulest inferno. He saw many bodies even of human beings floating floating in the water. He saw pass his ship one small steamer crowded with refugees who he supposed were survivors rescued from the eighborhood near the red plague. Then his ship passed through a blinding storm of smoke and a terrific heat.

All the time the ship lay before Hansonville, watching for a change in the wind the greatest clouds of smoke gtarring ever saw in his career was reaching far into sky, and the air continually was so thick with smoke that all on the vessel were compelled to remain below dock to breathe with any comfort...

As Starring learned Hansonvilles first remarkable experience with the approach of the forest fire was related to him by the terrified mayor of that city himself. He said it was about midday three days before 5ta 'ngs arival when hundreds of loud reports in four hours time as of distant cumnonading was heard from the east. The reports were repeated in fuseliades fusellades every fitteen minutes, and then a large and mussually dark mass began to rise and spread like a heavy cloud which gradually spread over the whole sky, the weather became intencely hundrah hot, and and the sky took on a murky appearance as on a gray winter day . He told gtarring that be three oclock in the afternoon it a had become very dark, and that the mass of clouds had spread over the entire sky, strange flashes were to be seen far out to the south statward, and an occassional glare overhad overhead, verywhere in the streets the poople gathered to watch the heavens. By six oclock It had become so dark that lumps and other lights had to be used, cocks began to crow and those still cloud gazing noticed the unusual heat and be came apprehensive. Many heisted umbbrellas to keep the smoke a little from their eyes.

At about an hour after midnight darkness had set in,, and those on shore had to use lantrens to be able to see before them. Even most of the refugees had to take the chances chances to sleep where the intense darkness had caught them. Owever when morning broke it had grown somewhat lighter, but nevertheless smoke stitimal smoke fog was everywhere and immense clouds of smoke were stilling rolling through the air and acrosss the sky and so thick was the fog that no one could hardly see more than a hundred foot. This continued must of the day but the wind by the aftermon changed its direction, and the air grew clearer. As the day its if wore on Starring began to wonder if the forest, fire was going to hit the city or pass off harmlessly by. But from some other source some one brought to the captian an alarming report that another great forest fire was raging at another quarter.

Sincke as he observed was issueing from a new quarter, and the atmosphere every where by now had become exceedively hot. And tward evening while every one began to take heart was and was returning to their homes in the city, something lke a like a luminous cloud ascended thirty or fourty miles to the south of the city and drifted
a luminous cloud ascended thirty or fourty miles to the south of the city and drifted alugishly to the northwest while also it kept increasing. The inhabitants were again panic stricken from the outbroak, fearing again the fire was coming on the city, and many in the suburbs ran from the streets north of the city into the country crying and praying for preservation from the threatening calamity, no one in the city, slept and that night and in the districts near this new fire the rumblings of the explosives that t night and in the districts near this new fire the inhabitants.

The rangers were appalling, and gave no confidence to the inhabitants.

Villiagers from the southern section at first were pouring into the city, this being the furthest from the forest fire. Another steumer passed Starrings ship also bringing refugees. Despite the fact of the citys danger, Hansonville was now heavily confested, and the demands on the city aurthorities was also increasing rapidly as more and more persons are obliged to leave their country homes. For three days since the yeary Ann arived here a thicky 1 thick smoky cloud ob overspread the land, and every one was filled with fear of the future.

The feeling of dread and suspense was more intense than is described. Most of the bolder people pass their time gazing at the south-eastern sc sky where the worse of bolder people pass their time gazing at the south-eastern sc sky where the worse of the thunderheaded smoke clouds gather and the mountful roaring of the conflagration the thunderheaded smoke clouds gather and the mounting observed a curious and most awe is heard. About ten oclock in the morning Starring observed a curious and most awe is heard about the name of the southwest, a place not sen before. This phenomenon caused alarm in the town of the southwest, a place not sen before. This phenomenon caused alarm in the town of the southwest, a place not sen before. This phenomenon caused alarm in the town of the southwest, a place not sen before. This phenomenon caused alarm in the town of the same papeared in St Lucy not far from Hamsonville, especially as a long wall of flame appeared in its wake. So rapidly did the results of this new horror pile up that the people of this town flight in panic tward Hamsonville.

A consideration of other great explosions and flood horrors just past however shows that sofar as is known all have and had a general similarity. Reing the source of the same causes they have had the same results, except that they were of local orditions.

The Generally accepted ex-lanation of these awful forest fire and other war disasters and their accompanying phenomenon is that through some cause or other the disasters and their accompanying phenomenon is that through some cause or other the Clandelinian generals of all stages through the apparent overconfidence of the Abbicann niun and other writings gain access to important places learn the weakest spots, and being there x secretly disguised, place which all dangerous mines with the purpose to create such so called eruptions that are startled the nation and the owned in general. As Starring believed from the reports he has heard that the force world in general. As Starring believed from the reports he has heard that the fore world in general as reached a point beyond the strength of all other explosives known, and therefore what the foe may have used and where it was obtained is a mystery.

Gurring knowns in his in vestigations that a forest fire that is even dangerous beyond compare may usually be devided into three well marked kinds. First there is a period of several terrific ground fires which may burn deep into the ground and which if it gets a good headway is impossible to be overcome. That was the way this big one was started which traveled over the forested ground for several weeks charact big one was started which traveled over the forested ground for several weeks charact erized by crown fires of bigger or smaller size with terrific thunderheaded smoke displays pc. bl, __companied by the wavages of the country towns, and fire hurricanes.

This is the period in which the efforts of the fire fighters might be success ful if they can counter charge it on time, and themind does not change against their reckoning. In many cases no misfortune follows, the rangers being able to fight this one successfully by timber clearing and by breaching, and fighting with wet blankets and so forth before it gains forward to the main and more dungerous forests. If however the weather of its own natural self is very windy, the conflagration continues to increase even beyond the limits of its own fury, and then a sudden and more terrible hell breaks los locse. This is the second phase of the forest fire and usually marks its culminating point to its main ravaging fury. It is much the worse and the final destructive action of the three, generally taking only a few hours to burn over a hundred acres, but it is in this period of burning that most of the destruction is smally wrought providing the forests are thick. Following such a condition of the conflagration there is caually a short period of comparative quiescence of wind, followed by an over spreading of the conflagration untill finally it reaching it reaches a proportion beyond its own very control, and this in turn yeilds the forests to the waves of a raging fire sea, the world seems to turn to a molten planet and the so call fire hurricane or tornado of whirlwinds raging in the path of the conflagrations form from the effects of the awful heat.

This is the third and the worse phase of the conflagration. This terrible part of the scour a scourge once formed, the screaming tempests produced by the heat tears trees wholly up into the air by the roots and hurlsc hurls their flaming fragments among the forests further ah ahead, a and a series of smaller conflagrations serves to start new and other big ones at different locations, and hence the Red CPlague gots to going at such a rate that it is sometimes a miracle that people of towns in its path even gets the a warning to escape in time, both because the fire storm hurls great clouds of smoke over the whole territory blinding the fugitives and making it inpossible to see their way, and also because the fire can move in two or three ways so as to intercept their escape, as the bigger blaze will advance against the windward side at a dangerous speced to boot. This period of the forest fire is beyond all control except by the aid of a torrent of rain, as that alone can then stop it. And even then the longer longer it continues in this stage the worse it then will grow untill all the community is totally doomed.

This third phase is like the others characterized by the terrific flames and the ernormous quantities of smoke that darkened more distant territory than the bi gest volcanic eruption has ever done and this smoke is scattered far and wide by air corrents, and the heat also goes a long ways. The forest blas blaze leaves great arens of desolution never to be retrieved, and therefore it will thus be seen that the forest fires, are due to the causes of what is said to be of the three phases. Starring believes therefore thatbthe danger which threatens the forested sections of war devastated Calverinia would not be from a renewal of the explosive eruptions of the enemy made mines -- although exceptions of explosions of decreasing violence will doubt less continue as long as the awful war rages --- but from dreadful forest for fires. There is however great danger of the conflagration wiping out all of the forests of Calverinia if the unusual draught don't be broken soon.

It is however extremely fortunate to gtarrings pinion for the rangers of the forests and for the future welfare of people living in forested regions that a group of rangers are already drafting all men not in the armies to fight these red scourages and have forests scientists to study the condition of the situation while the evidence of the stupendous conflagration is still in its height. It ix is also an opportunity to advance scientific knowledge of the nature of this conflagration such as rarely

With increasing knowledge comes increasing possibilities for safeguarding human life and it can be quite within reasonable expectation that enough will be learned to render such a catastrophe, such as he is witnessing day after day in its fullest fury impossible in the future at the hands of the enemy..

CFOWDS OF PEOPLE SAID TO BE HERRIED IN BY THE FORESTV FIRES. ATERRIBLE DOOM FACES THEM. EXPEDITION THROUGH A PART OF THE BURNING. FOREST.

WHILE waiting for a chance to run through the Hell, Starring made efforts to learn of additional accounts depicting the disasterous explosions that destroyed Abbieann and other cities, which could and should confirm all that had been hitherto stated concerning the overwholming catastrophe. But he was so far being disappointed. The conf lagration was spreading around the valley behind the town, and even starring and some all of his followers began to show signs of measiness. Bense volumes of smoke thicker than usual began to rise from large prtiens portions of the valley, end at night it looked like a huge volcanic crater helching out flamen. At the northern edge of this valley were two unknown villiages, and the inhabitants of these places were thrown into great consternation by the sights and the sounds of the conflagration, and especially by the continued darkening of the day by volumes of thick smoke which rose in a porfect rolling wall. Therefore there was an axodus from all over the district.

Even Hunson ville appeared again as if enveloped in a fog and all the hills beyond, was wrapped in the smoke which issued from the forest fires. All on shipboard kept their eyes on the actions of the conflagration and the greatest anxiety prevailed and all business prevailed. A very enxious morning was passed, but thanks however to a strong westerly breeze the situation appeared a little better at eleveh oclock but as the breeze died away at noon the smoke again overshadowed the toen and the hills and the forests all around presented a most dismal aspect causing much plarm as to what the approaching night would bring forth. Nothing happened however, and again on the approach on the next morning although everything was not quite coercine, the aspect was decidedly encouraging, There was not ever quite co much excitement. At six oclock on that morning a private wireless telegram came to starring from a place he would not name stating that the Vivian Girls had learned of his trouble and perils, and that they were advising him to give it up and return home as they believed conditions made it impossible for him to accomplish the expedition. They reported that the christian armies with which they were with were moving someward somewhat northward all the time, and that the armios had frequently encountered the forest tlazes, and that they had seen a large stretch of blazing fires suddenly rushing up a slope near rale Calson bend, and following the course of Mic-Farm River, overwhelming everything. Estates and towns were destroyed by the fiery wave which appeared to rise to a height of some thousand foot over an area of

Then the flames had reached the wider stretches of water, it was found that the them of victorian on this river beach fifteen miles we east of Hansonville was destroyed town of victorian on this river beach fifteen miles we east of by the fire. From where it was first so een the burning fires had only taken three minutes to rouch the town, twenty miles away. This new scene of the fire created a general panic, and the people made for the more pen hills open hills, and the panic, was intensified by terrible detonations which broke from all distant points at short intervals accompanied with dense emissions of smoke and lurid flashes of flame. intervals accompanied with dense emissions of smoke and arrie flashes of flashes. The mental strain becoming umendurable, some other ships were placed in readniess readiness, and as many as could of the refugees wet wentbhurriedly on the board and started for more safer places. In the meantime couriers were being sent from Hansonville imploring that other steamers be chartered to bring away terrified people from the city. To make it worse streams of frightened refugees had been continually puring into pouring into Hansonville from all the surrounding country. These people so far did not seem to be destitute, but they were frightened out of their very wits. There was not-thing else thy wanted except to be taken far away from the scene, with which they say has decended into hell. The very Consuls there, and the officials of the vessels in the river harbor were continually waylaid by handfr hundreds of persons crased with fear, and begging to be carried away ... The weather however is calm and atensely hottt het, the fires now assume a vast and more threatening aspect, and occassional heavy rumblings like explosions were heard.

How welcome indeed would a shower of rain be.

A week later, Starring and his followers as many as were permitted,,, went to inspect Hansonville. They faced the greatest of all difficulties before they succeeded in making a landing. The effects of the awful outburste of the day before were simply,,, tremendous. The huge towers of the ernormous cathedrals and other churches were absolutely pulverized, and the walls were flat withthe oith .. Starving believed the heat of the flames were not sufficient to account for any of this at all, at all, for he declared to those with him that there was plenty of evidence to the passage of a most furious blast of hot wind blowing at an ernormous velocity and incalculable force,

The amk ammount of the smouldering ruins is indeed ernormous beyondcomparison. And not a single living, person except those on the boat saw that had happened at Hunsonville that awful morning the day before. It seemed that at this section the forest fire a had become many more times terrible since it first originated so far down

MR, LOUIS T. FALK,

The presence of the relief ships and that of starrings however were helpful to the people. The Mary Ann could not approach close to dettinit Hamonville. The outbursts of the fires probably mean a ruled country, as all confidence is lost. "We want not food but only to leave for the north" was the cry of all, rue rich and poer alike.. The terrific forest fire continued to monance the existence of the entire eastern and middle sections of calverinia, for without ceseation the blazes have continued to spread and no rain comes. It is also known that there has been further loss of life, and what is more distressing a large number of the refugees, mostly wemen and children are said to be imprisoned by the seathing fire seas which totally surround them. It is even impossible for assistance to be rendered to them by human beings, and nothing less thing lamiracle can save them from the owful death which confronts them... And as Star --ring fearned these unfortunates numbering over 10,000 are surrounded in the threatened forest town of Sesemann. They were cut off from escape when the forest fire wiped out Hansonville giving the remaining inhabitants there only a few hours to escape. The section of the confizeration that pageddon after wiping of out the city f manon-ville swept across the only rous, actifies on the forests across the smaller river, channels, burning down the only bridges and avenues of escape, and reaching this other doemed town, spreading through the valley beyond, and meeting three ways s. hot making the very rocks on the hills and in the valleys so hot as to be almost totally invend incondencent.

In this way have the women and children at Sessemann been approximated, efforts by Starring and his parties have been made with desperation and fronty to reach them,, and though they can be seen pleading for deliverance, it is atterly impossible to give them aid. They also have no food supply, and ataryation in the ta more terrible fate also confronts confronts them. And gradually but mre steadily, the rivers of fires are spreading, and if no rain comes seen a wave of fire will sweep away the doomed

Alec the town of Sandscreek had been destroyed, as has Lanton where twenty forest fire fighters perished. Many inhabitants of the villiage are also believed to have been lest but just yet it is impossible to b be able to tell the number. Inall In all parts of the destroyed sections of calverinia the conditions are alost almost impossible to describe. Conlike reports were heard night and day at irregular intervals and after each report the ground appears to tremble. Believing that the whole forested part of the country is doomed, the population continued in a state of panicand and confusion, and just as fast as possible they were 1 aving on ships, not careing where they go, and all that they asked was a means of leaving the place they have regarded as

Six hundred f esh refugees have boarded Starrings ship, and Starring decided to head down tward the north tward San Salvador which is reported not in the path of the Red Plague. He decided to bring these, and then get three hundred more. These on board the ship are in a state of poverty, and all are almost naked, and not one has brought more than the clothes he or she wears. And among the homeless on s are mant many too young or too old to care for themselves. Many are orphans, whose parents were victims to the race of the enemy and the disasters. After the refugees had been landed at San salvador, starring and a number of his followers including the two girl and two boy souts started on September 16th for a view of the forest fire by the road leading along the river course from San Salvador Point, and accompanied by the ships captian and two mates, they all reached a height of twenty two hundred feet without difficulty and was able to ascertain that the present fire is traveling tward the west. On the east the whole country side was or is an inferno of smoke and fire. In order to make known their presence at the point where they stood, to those still remaining on the ship, Starring waved a dece of white cloth, attatched to a branch in the air, which was replied by a corresponding signal from the bridge on deck, who signalled to Starring in that manner in order to show he saw him and his party.

They folt a number of hot draughts of wind, and their very shoes were damaged by the heat. A lake which was situated near them was completely dried up and all was within a few scores of yards beyond them a smoking desolation, with a few burning smoking trees standing here and there. A big iron bridge which c crossed a creek has been been melted. The edge of the fire zone was dangerously close and the heat where they stood was intense, and the whole aspect of the scene before them was most terrifying. Some burned trees fell near them, and the heat with a sudden change of the wind became so intense and the smoke so thick that they were obliged to retreat. Their retreat from the burned area was more difficult than their approach. The wind hurled a blinding cloud of hot ashes upon them, yet they succeeded in reaching the river and the ship on their return, after having been for four hours and a half on the edge of where the forest fire had pas e passed under the most dangerous circumstances.

Starring then went aboard and the ship continued on its trip back to San Sal vudor. The unusual warmpth caused however so much consternation among the regu refugees and inhabitants there, that many were even unxious to leave this city also and go further northward, and large numbers were emigrating by boat, and a wagon to quadeloupe city where it was estimated, II,200 people had already sought shelter.... 155

Starring had noticed during the exploration trip to and from from Sun Salvador that outside of the forested zone even all the formerly cultivated land between that town and Hunsonville had been completely destroyed destroyed by the heat. The inhabit ants of those two towns had suffered, and were still sufd suffering a great deal but they had not yet determined to abandon those localities, but no efforts could be made yet to apply them with provisions.

The ship also approaced that part of the land, where further away from the scourge the forests was in a better state of preservation, especially between Gunton and Herdrede. During one of the trips to and from San galvador Starrings followers took on board with the last of the refugees, a little eight year old girl, and her nine year old brother. Boty Both whose muse he could not learn presented most pathetic figures. Both children were tur terribly burned. The boy got it worse, for his nose was almost burned off, and his face was disfigured and all the hair was scorched off his head. On the little girl both arms were fearfully burned and her feet too. They were greatly distressed ov b over the joss of their parents, and they were all alone in the world now.

The little borb boy tole this story. We intended to leave every time the city was threatened, and on the morning of the awful fire which etruck the city we were at breakfast, when some concussion caused by the fire herricane knocked as off our chairs. I caught hold of manno dress, and she took me in her arms and carried me at into the street, papa and sister following. Fire was raging all around us, the sky was all af lame and buildings were burning. Fragments of burning materials were falling all around us. Papa tribe tried hard to keep the fire from reaching us. Mamm was struck down by hydrography when the walls of a humbur hillding sandad, and then come are madeled in in bricks when the walls of a burning building crashed, and then some men picked up up and carried her away. We two were saved but papa and mama are missing.

Then your big coat came along, and we were taken on."

The only friend these children have is their aunt who is a very capable woman, but yet do not know what to do with the children. The doctors said they would recover. A maid who so bravely protected the children also is easily surned. There were territying eights in one of the cabing. Several men who were rangers were literally bu burned to pray pieces but were still living, and the whole loft side or the face of as of one of the men was burned off entirely but his sight is not injured. It was uslieved if Starring and his followers did not help as they did, they would not have even saved the ship when the fire worne down upon Hansonville.

the rescued on coard Starrings ship were two fortegners, who were living in the city of Hungonville. They were tarribly burned but were bearing their sufferings more bravely and patiently than was expected. It was found found their bodies were,,, mearred badly and seared when they must have ran through some of the fire for their escape. Towever these for ingrars will always have the proud record of having saved the girl and boy mentioned a little before. The Forengers showed no fear.

The annihilation of Abbieann, the principal case of which Starring was on his way to investigate to the good of the cause is also I unique in one pure particular so far as the story itself may be concerned. To combine all real disasters of history into one it may be repeated the Abbieann horror can be pronounced the most destructive into one it may be repeated the Abbleunn norror can be pronounced the most destructive of human life among the catastrophes, resulting of what the enemy so far is suspected, not alone only of the explosions, but the resultant flood, and the combination of all other horrors. If the story itself dares to say the number of victims of the city of Abbleunn itself alone could be computed comparatively at nearly 8,000,000, only Abbleann itself alone could be computed comparatively at nearly 8,700,000, only of her entire inhabatants, out of which only five hundred thousand really did escame withtheir lives. Considerably heavier losses of lives were lost through the destructive floods which so immediately followed, the brunt of which overwhelmed Abbleann, and ildred greenburg if we may judge from the paucity of human remains b from the flood that had been recovered. Considerably more persons perished, on the other hund in the concussions of the explosions that demolished Abbleann, and the other cities than by those drawing of the flood.

ane And what renders the tragedy at Abbieann is the appalling quickness, and the time with which the work of destruction was completed. Proofs were discovered that the disaster actually occured at I, P,M not at twelve oclock aw as the statements the disaster actually occured at I, P,M not at twelve oclock aw as the statements beginning with fires raging over the disaster zone, and the actual explosions broke out one after after midnight, at about ten minutes after 0. I. A,M and a cloud of out one after after midnight, at about ten minutes after 0. hot powders and flames hurlee by the explosions from a flaming forest eveloped the northern part of the town, and river harbor, and in fifteen to twenty minutes all northern part of the town, and river harbor, and in fifteen to twenty minutes all was over. Every living thing within the sweep of the fiery nurioane hurled forward from that blasted blasing forest was scorched chooked and charred. If the girl herones from that blasted blasing forest was scorched chooked and charred. If the girl herones Angelino pichee, and the others who were at Abbleann at the time would have been in that part of Abbleann they too we would have met z an awful death. They were in the extreme southwestern part of the city, which even only got the fringe of the flood and entirely survived of its concussion degroyed buildings, I also repeat that so far as this story accepted as for fiction only is concerned, the southeastern section of the city being on higher elevation escaped entirely without even an injury, but the inhabitants described the plane at being horrified at the destruction of but the inhabitants deserted the place at being horrified at the destruction of the remainder of the city. Had the total went without hope for any one the destruction of the population would have been twenty million as that was the number lien living in so vast a city. All but eight million nine hundred thousand escaped. The sections large as New York and Chicago put together were obliterated only by explosion, the remainder except the extreme southwest, and southeast rayaged by the flood or fire.

What was not destroyed by flood was by fire. Starring was to see more of the remains of the city than he expected. E ven the parts swept by the flood remained. Only two quartors of the city was swept away. All the bodies were deep under the ruings yet never nevertheless there is in real history no record of a catastrophe equally

Since the passage of the forest fire the entire aspect of the Landscape and the veryruins have changed. The emoking smouldering ashes had covered the entire landscape effecting even all lendershe and remains of the forests. The region has the apprance appearance of being a gray white desort emitting smoke and fog. It was impossible to enter the term as the heat from the rains was imboarable. When the Mary Jane left San Salvador for the exploration of Hansonville, that latter city was still safe but panic continued among the inhabitants and the refugeos flocking there, and it is feared if the fire comes there are explosion will occur among the handreds of tons of most high ex explosives stored in an argonal near the city power all was quiet at that city. A ship had come down the river from the north to land relief supplies which she brought from Pendera.

The day however was passing without incldent, and it was hoped the population and the refuses flocking there would become much calmer especially as the forest fire does not threaten the place. Nevertheless from classifier by axides still continues. Another party from Saliston is made ing ten thousand esopte left for Calvorine. These with about thirty thousand who have gone to Pundera and many others who have

These with about thirty thousand who have gone to Pundora and many others who have sought refuge at Poverty Row has considerably lessened the papulation. Moreover two hundred thousand have gone to the northern part of Calverinia, where three hundred thousand more refugees have assembled. Some well startings non-crought from the sib subburbs of pennowills exported books and money which they found in some affect here. These and other safes have been burst open by irrestible force. All the articles recovered were cared for on board ship intill it could be placed in the care of the Government.

Puring the following night a great light was seen in the direction of the extreme west indicating clearly that a new fire met have broken out there. But the sign if icance could be greatly were estimated. Big Girl knoel is in that location of the glare almost exactly one hundred and thirty miles from the Mary Jame, and midway between the two places is ildred Groenbarg and Francis Atlanta. The glow must there fore be at some other location. Yet the conditions favorable for the production of such a new phonomenon can be very simple. There was doubtless, a new and large fire somewhere, or the heat of orders left by the main fire might be like a large sea of something incandescent. This might cause the light, and probably of the glowing embors because of its greater mass and became because of the clouds of white smoke rising from it, the whole country side may be as het as a million asses of mile smoke rising from it, the whole country side may be as het as a million asses of miles moke rising from the very debris will remain in this condition as long as the sumply of remaining unburned embers is sufficient to continue burning. To return to the light observed in the west the great white clouds of smoke forms everhead an immense cloud which hangs ever the scene of desolation and is illuminated by the glare of flames from the sea of embers below. While it is highly probable that the flames regarded so the characterizes such conflagrations is due to the reflected glow from the smoors still standing and some actual fire may be seen by far the main reart of the illumination which characterizes such conflagrations is due to the reflected glow from the smoors. It is precisely that may be observed when the ruy from some sourch light is thrown on some mass of smoke or steam. There is therefore nithing nothing unusual or disquieting in such a sight from the beat. Letter reports was doubtless indicating that the same glow was observed from much greater distances. This report was regarded as more cheefful. It indicated that in

With regards to the reported sounds of explosions frequently heard during the raging of the forest fire it should be remembered that every ear of all refuges was strained in that direction and all sounds are egar eagerly noted which under ordinary conditions would be whooly wholly ignored and it does not follow that these exports are from explosions however but that it comes from rangers and fire fighters dynimiting trees to breach the forest in the path of the fire.

However when all seemed more calm and peaceful there was observed rising some two twenty miles south of an Salvador a cloud of smoke black as int, through whichind darted tongues and sheets of flame. The cloud spread gradually and quickly outward again obscuring the sum. This went on for several hours, and finally on the third hour it reached a final, and again, the darkness became intense. The fog that resulted was so great that for leagues around people actually were forced to desert their homes fear in fearing lest they be suffocated. At Leonto more than two hundred miles away, the smoke fog obscured houses two hundred feet away, and the smoke fog spread, to Jamaca Junot tion and the neighboring forests next...

THE PROPERTY OF STATE

Every one began to realize that of all these disasters, they would have rather faced a volcamo vomiting at lava and vapors, and other materials, than to face all these terrible horrors now go a going on, and they even wondered if the enemy would not yet bring on some means of causing the earth to open, and smallow up all the christians their houses and churchd', and closing on them with a snap, and smanhing them to pieces so the enemy could win a casier victory. Maybe all this would not be as terrible as the dimasters already occuring and to form a correct notion of at least the horror of the past visitations. I suppose the ron reader if this was really true would be tempted to ank why and how it is that God has permitted such a fair and righteous country to be visited with such destriction by the hunds of His worst of all enemies, and when it has been done with it is that He does not strike. I can hardly be for the sins of man in this ceality, for there in this story was no sinning people hardly in any loyal Calverinian city through to true to Gods hely cause, and besides, the worse disaster involved the inhottents of Abbicann and its neighboring cities with an explosion which no hundred Krakatone could compure in one.

evident now the forest fire was following a course that would bring it upon san Salvador

But perhaps on the other hand it may also occur to the reader to see himself wi wither it is not just people's that these unly affairs have been allowed to come upon these holy states for some future beneficient purposes for the good of the cause, or at all events that they may form part and parcel of some great scene of Our Bloosed Lord in His arrage arrangement of bring Abbicannia to an awakenening of what a peril glandelinia is and bring means to down her seeme or later.

In the explosion horror at Abbicann, trees for fifteen minutes had flooged and thrashed the ground with their branches, which proved that their stams had been jerked instantly away for some considerable distance by the concussions and as suddenly pushed back and the same conclusion followed from the sudden rise of the waters of the lakes and rivers where the heavier concussions a reached them, and their fall on the opposite side the back of the lakes and rivers being k jerked away for a certain distance from under the water and pulled back. It was the compression of the explosion concussions that carried the shocks forward and backwards. As the shocks of the explosions raged the houses of the towns were seen to topple down in succession, beginning at one and and running on to the other, as if a succession of min s had been sprung. One survivor asw the wall of his house bow forward and recover itself not all at once, but with a swell like a way running all along it with impense register.

The scene of the black cloud as mentioned before came to its climax three hours after its appearance, followed by a most ernormous volume of snow hite clouds of thunder headed shapes, piled lke bales of the whitest cotten in a mass as seding four times the height of the so surrounding wooded hills, and the largement of the sky in that locality and a stream of fire began to rush up a slope. The southing flame rushed an immense height into the air. Then from somewhere there came a loud report which shook the very houses in an galvader to such a degree as to alarm the inhabitants, inhabitants inhabitants and those on board the Mary Jane. All windows were broken on the sounding side, and walls cracked from by the concussion of the air from that explosion. The rise, and gradually increasing, arrived at as emazing a height as to strike every one who beheld it with the most avid extensionant. It had struck the thick porti surpentine forests near an galvader. I myself shall be scarcely credited when I would assure you that the height of this stopendous column of flames could not be less than three times that of the hills in the background themselves, which are four to five thousand feet. Immense rolly walls of smoke as black as can possibly be imagined rolled upward and spread out in mushroom and other great shapes, and accompanied by the flames interrupting its splendid brightness here and there by patches of the darkest hue. Within these rolls for smoke at the very moment of their forming flames pierced like red bloods. The immense flames after having at times mounted at leat eleven thousand feet rising forwardly forward, covered the whole scene, and the valley near by in a sheen of fire. Fires starting far shead because of the heat scon formed one complete body of fire of its own which could not be less than twenty miles in breadth, and of the same sextraordianty height cast a heat that was sensibly felt in San galvador itself .

The wooded stopes of the refresh mountain was soon in flame which being of a different ferent tent tree the deep red of the flames piercing the black smoke; and from the silvery blue of the other flames still added to the contrast of this most extraordinary scene. After the column of fire had continued in full fury for nearly half an hour a most dense smoke finally overchadowed the whole scene. At this manesfectation mostly all of the inhabitants of the city of San salvador flow to the churches, and others preparing the quit the town, when again a sudden violent report was heard and they suddenly found themselves involved in a thick cloud of smoke, a horrid chashing noise was heard in the air, and presently a terrific hot gale sprang up, rearing and screaming, and flying embers all ablaze came upon the houses, and in an instant the town and country about it was afire in many parts, for in the outskirts on a small farm there were many star straw and hay stacks all of which caught fire. A great lumber concern in the suburbs of the town was all aflame, and with the help of the wind the flames began to spread universally, and the inhibatants realized they would all be burned in their houses if they did not stir out.

Many for a time found it impossible to sir out because of the terrific wind and those who did try it were either knocked down or driven back to their close quarters quarters, under arches or in their rooms. Many were wounded, and to add to the horror of the scene, inconsunt flashes of fire was writhing about the black cloud that ower-shadowed the sky above the city, and the smoke and the head would scarcely allow them to draw their breath. It seemed the city was doomed, and all would porish.

After a great white a great wall and pillar of smoke was observed to ascend a about ten miles nearer the city, which darkened the city like night, and descended in a whirlwind of smoky fog. Innumerable shafts of flame were seen soaring through this canopy, and a smell of burning turpentine was in the air. Starring mounted a high hill on the opposite side of the river to see what was really happening. He saw a perfect sen of flames pour across the stream further south. It crossed a ravine like a racing expressrain, though it was six hundred feet deep and two hundred broad. It then like a flood of water overspread the surrounding forested country, and run around a lake making the water so hot that the steam rose in explosive puffs. The fire then divided into two sections, and presenting a geone that only to observe could describe describe.

into two sections, and presenting a scene that only to observe could describe describe.

A camapy of smoke hung over the surrounding a country, and though tarring was an a hill thirt in thirty miles away, he was uncomfortable from the heat.

Starring was indeed witnessing a most awful sight. Flowers in a new spot goddenly broke forth over a surface of more than three leafuse, and through a thick cloud of deep reddish brown smoke illuminated by this cheatly light, he could see the ground as if softened by the heat glare as if it too was turning into fire. He saw a portion of the river fairly boil over but so far from quanching the wifes, only seemed to increase the smoke.

In a short time a whole mountain near the town appeared like a body of liquid fire extending itself in every direction. The fire and columns of flame continued to rage onward with unabated fury untill the durkness caused by the smoke observed it about three hours later. He could see that a violent whirlwind was raging near gem Salvador carrying the roofs and light parts with it. On the subub soburbs of can salvared Sun galvador the effects of the wind were much more vifient t trearing up by the rroots the largest trees, and carring them while all aflame in the air, together with men horses, cattle and whatsever came within its path. The whirlwind lasted about an how in raging past the city. Then the city was on fire. Of all other villiarss around the city, one call La Tonor is the only one remaining. In three others not a single house is left, but it is hoped all escaped. The trees and herbage of every description have been completely destroyed destroyed with the exception of a high point of land near a wide bend in the river.

hile ceing ceiayed in the progress forward because of the forest fires Starring once more attdied his map of calverinia a to find out the extent of the Abbieann disaster because sometimes because of its ernormity he was somewhat inclined to doubt whather it was caused by the enemy nor not... On tracing the map he discovered from the names of the places destroyed that the great horror was one of the very greatest of all disasters on record, for the concussion extended all over Abbieannia and other states, indeed all over the whole nation, and even into Angelinia and some forlegn countries. May its effects even extended across the Mic-Mirthian seas to Protestentia country where it was very violent, and to other places. The most striking features of these concussions was their extreme and exercise.

All was going on quite as usual in the city of Abbieann the morning before that mem orable one am, the weather however hot and sultry not fine ane clear but smoky, but nevertheless there was nothing whatever to give the population of that great city and the surrounding country and the nation in general the least suspicion of such a catastrophe. Yet all at once at a little after one oclock, there were great eruptions north of Abbieannian as stated before, followed by shocks that tumbled down all the buildings within the region. Hore explosions and shocks followed for twenty minutes and from the commencement more than eight in million persons were said to be burled in the ruins. One man that night was on the river with his wife and children. The boat was shoken by the concussion, and his wife and children we were frightented at the awful or options and asked him what was the matter.

He stared at his wife in blank amazement, and taking at Abbieann, saw it gone out of sight in smoke and fog and the they heard the roar of falling buildings. They got accured and hastily made a landing and raced for a hill, whence the neet morning early they beheld a sea of water coming rolling on the front of the flood like a vast mountain fifty or sixty feet high, over the lena land and sweeping all before it.

10,000 persons had taken refuge on a large relirond station which had survived the shock but in an instant it was turned bottom upward, and the whole station and every person on the platform, while all the trains in the railroad yea yards near by disappeared in the raging torrent, and not a vestage of them ever appeared again again.

Those on the higher part of the city too fur from the explosion zone to be bleated though shaken badly, had fled into the t streets in panic, and on the mornings approach fled to the higher ground when the floods came rushing into the lower parts of the city. In the section either shaken and blasted it happened to be that mostly were all in bed inside their houses which fell and crushed them before they even knew what had accurate.

That no horror might be wanting, big fires broke out in innumerable houses where woodwork had fallen on the fires, and much that the concurrions and the floods had spared was destroyed by the fire. The huge flood swept the whole central state as is predicted in the general flood scenes past. It swept quite into the Angolinia State. In Calverinia from the concuesion of the explosions every loke and firth in all parts was dashed time and again out of their beds, the water not partaking the fithe siden shove given to the land just as when a person splashes a plateful of waer water, the water deshing over on the side from which the shock is given, One of the most curious of the incidents incidents of these concussion explosions was their effects on the shipping far down on the rivers, which would lean the reducer and me to suppose that the immediate impulse was in the nature of a violent blow from the air. Thus it can be recorded that the concussion and the shock of the far extended air waves was so sudden and violent on a ship, fourty miles from the city of Abbieman that the smilers on night duty on deck were tossed about for several minutes. One ship fifty miles from the scene was struck by air waves with such force as to unship and split up the mainmast

At a greater distance the concussions of the explosions had the same effects as the upward bounding parthquakes. Ten towns were said to be bird under fallen hills and at Adeleheid a great number of corpses were found to have been tossed across a river, and scattered over the slopes of a hill on the other side. Survivors had to throw themselves on the ground, the earth being shakenwithout intermission for upwards of twenty minuos minutes with such violence that minual or mem could not keep their loss. The explosion concussions extended their greatest intensity o ver an eval space of five handred and twelve miles if from east to west, within which space every city town and villiage was leveled with the ground, but the total extent of surface shaken was sprayed ten thousand inles in one direction, and fifteen thousand in the other. Indeed the frequency of these explosion disasters and the others, are not more extraordinary than their duration. And one of the most circumstaintially described shocks or record is that which mentioned before at or near Abbleaum, for it is claimed that during those twenty minutes one thousand six hundred and seven explosions took place, of which nine hundred and fifty one of them were great and most severe so as to be felt over a quarter of the world. The worst explosions we were closest to Abbleaum.

Therefore as the reader may know by no, that in that locality every town and village was destroyed in those twenty minutes, and within a distance of ten thousand miles all were seriously shaken and much damage done. The whole of calverinia was mainlyy a affected, and even across the sea Protestentia country was shaken, and a great part of A bleannia was shaken. From the unusual force of the explosions there was no end of the capricious and other ways of the movements recorded in these awful concussions. I found Abbicann and deleheid, it is to be suid that the ground mailated like a ship "t at as sea. People who becaped with their lives became actually sea sick and to give an idea of the strange undultion, the smoke clouds of the explosions ship of at as sea. People who ascapes with their lives because of the explosions and to give an idea of the strange undulation, the smoke clouds of the explosions sound to be fiff ally arrested during the pitching movement when it took place in the name direction, and to redouble its speed in the reverse movement.

At The northern end of Adelcheid city, houses were thrown down bodily, and loves objects were to seed up several yards into the air. The stones of the streets were found all turned bottom upward. Great fiscures were split into the earth for hundreds of miles by the explosions, and near corinia masses of rocks hundreds of feet it high traveled miles down a big ravins. All landmarks were removed, and the land itself in some instances with trees and hedges growing on it carried bodily away on the crest of landslides, and set down in another place. Altogether about fourty thousand could explain the deal of the deal

A crowd of refugees who had escaped from the city,,, were that morning examining from a short but supposed short safe distunce the threatening masses of moving waters, and any others were carrying off in haste the f goods from their cottages, then suddenly the tidal a wave of water overwhelmed them all, precything was destroyed by the sudden appearance of this musual wall of water, trees houses town and many farms, and all who had been caught by it perished to a man. It was said that the debris hurled into the hir by one of these awful explosions spread over the sky in a horrible black arch three hindred dies in width, and covered the forested country and plians plains and mondows for a distance of fourty eight fles with a layer of debris, grass, broken fragments of trees, and dust and mack at least sixteen feet thick. At the very scene of the explosion the headlend advanced one thousand feet into and across the river and two new faces of ground formed of debris and stones falling from the sky after the transmitted explosion rose in the the widest part of the river three miles away.

Reyond the districts close round the explosion crater, the bed of dry dust, which was call to have fallen gradually became thinner but it was carried by the wind more than alxy degrees of longitude, tward the east and west, south and north, near and in the Calverinian seas, and the ships sailing in those waters penetrated with difficulty difficulty the layer of follage spread at on the sea near its mouth which was brought down by the rivers. To the orth the rain of dust was noticed at Calverine, Francis Atlanta, and even at Vivian Wickey in western Calverinia, on the south, it reached Evangeline St Claire, Dorothy Gale, Angelinia Agathia, and other towns a distance of eighteen hundred miles.

The uproar of the explosion was heard as far cas Angelinia Agathia situated 10,000 mil s may in a straight lne. While the formidable cloud was settling down round the explosion area, thick darkness filled the air, given when morning came the smoke still kept everything in darkness, r and for half a day nothing could be seen except by the 'einister light of the flaches of the fires far off, and the red glars of the forest fires. To escape from this prolonged v night, the horror of fires and the burning atmosphere the inhabitants who encaped the horror and the resulting flood fled in all hasts to high rises of ground. Her women and children and domestic animals traveled along difficult and a perilous puths, through forests, quagmires and marshes,

. So great was it said of the terror of all animals during this long season of anapeak able hervor that the wildest enimals themselves such as sorp its, birds, molves, and every miscal of cration in Calverina joined the bunds of farlives, an if they recommiscal in man a being indexned with intelligence approise to their own. In Calverine equally as far away northward as Angelinia from the scene, the explosion was heard, and the immense quantity of debris, the whole mass of which it could be said could be trice the size of a mountain as high as Mi ant Mount Mic-pinley fell over an area in Calverinia larger than that of Germany or Frence. The debris of trees and foliage which floated in the flood was more than a yard in thickness, and with it in rivers it was with some difficulty that ships could make their way through it..

STATES AT LAST REACHES WHAT ESSISTED FOR ABBLEAUTARY DEVASTATED SECTIONS OF THE CITY WITH THE QUICKNESS OF A VOLLEY OF SHOTS.

PODIES OF MAIN FOUND AS IF PRAYING. DARING FEAT OF STARPING THYING IN THE FACE OF FOREST FIRES TO BRACH AN EXPLOSION CRATER.

Starring had now after such a long, and to also speak more plainly a hot jowney through the calver hian hell, reached the extreme southeastern limits of that is left of path city or Abbicumn.

Far to the westward but close enough to be in good view, despite the haze from the distant conflagration lay an immense expanse at water, which at first, forgot ting about the flood,, he the thought was the arm of the seas...

Be took a look at it with his field glasses, and seeing from that its nature and what was floating on the surface of the unter, he realized it however was left of the flood. Everywhere he locked, desolation was absolute, he alsoalmost fancled he was on a forleyn planet that had been wiped out by a terrible lumar disaster so fearful was the scene beforew him now. Angeline Richee, and the three others who were with him and who stood close by him shivered at the sight.

"This is Abbieann or what is left of her" said the guide. "Horrible desolation, rain and a frightful death---this is Abbieann. See all that eater? Well the rest of the city lies under it. We can use m uns to means to drain that water so the remaindet of the rains could appear, but just now the go-cornments forbide it, or other wise we li not have evidence against "landelinia". Any as caught trying to release the water is shot. That is the orders."

Sturring or the others did not say a word. They couldn't find word for speech. He now realized the full extent of the disaster, and believed that in the worlds history or since mankind was created on the oith there had never been in all disasters combined into one so instant an annihilation of human life in one city as in this once beautiful Calverinian city of Abbleann. Tidal waves of floods, great fires, and hundreds of various plagues, herror woon horror, starvation, sorrow, and saffering, and other visitations have resisted from this insense catastropho. Starring realized as he glan cod glanced over the scene that in a few momen's maybe fifteen or twenty minutes, the concussion of explosions, and floods, and blasted air caused by the explosions, an immense ppalation was destroyed, a vast city three times the size of an American New York flung into ruin, with two quarters swept away, and hundreds of miles of vegetation burned from the face of the country, a flood that wiped out more cities and towns than the United States boasts of, and panic shook the souls of scores of millions.

Starring however was worried. He saw no evidence that could help him discover the true cause of so great a disaster. And the scene made him almost but 11ke a b abyeably. He and his followers alonly wandered among a few of the streets in silence waiting through mad and debris, stumbling pon bricks and stones, and acking through threatening clouds from eastern forest fires, towering into awful darkness or of its own making, the distant slopes smoking as if covered with dying lava floss, and smoking and flaming as if from a million vents.

Not one sould soul remained in even this remaining section of Abbieuns. The soldiers who were guarding it against feared looting from glandelinian vandal spies the men who had been gathering the fragments which over a month ago were walking these tumbled swampy streets, an singing laughing, and making love, and doing all good things have field. To one had the ver nerve to stay and goard it any more, as the forest fires menanced the custom forest a dangerously cose to what is left of Abbieums, ring and the custom forest a dangerously cose to what is left of Abbieums, and the starring and from a from and his followers from St. James to the "dead city" The calverinian as Starring in and his followers from St. James to the "dead city" The calverinian Government sent him a pass, and then Starring took a party of news paper men, besides the caption and the officers of the Mary James. However the visit mute remained behind saying "If the forest fires are threatening here also I will blow the whietle, and you must return instantly for if you delay the fire may come i into the ruins, and

however k eping close to ether, when half a dozen sharp Toots from the ships whistle caused them to look op.

"Gracious" cried Angeline pichee.L"book is that an eruntion or am I seeing things."

All saw a dreadful durkness rising up the slopes of a mountain close to the city, and straight in a long wall moving tward the city like a black rolling a squall came an ernormous fog, the upper part which rolled and writhed into may chapes and was poerced by zizag lights and flamhes. Other clo is of more immense size were rising from forested rathese that have been cut in the sides of some of the mountains, and the inclined planes that have been cut in the sides of some of the mountains, and the inclined planes that reached from the edge of the flood verge to the summit smoked and fluened as if with the firing of two armies in tremendous battle. Indeed this spectacle except for the gloom that seemed to full lower and beer out of the housens

"No its a fire and its threatening the city" said starring, as a sellow white haze began to blow over the city, bringing a sharp and irritating small of berning pine and brush. Starring believed it was time for all to be off.

"Not is beat it for the time being" he cried. "The fire dight strike."
And indeed they did not stay on the very order of their going. Sturring himself cleared thirty feet on the first bound. Lamping down the terraces, blundering and stumbling over foundation stones, and wreckers strent in piles over the streets, desing corpses shriveled and half buried in wreckage drifts, they might for the shore, where two boats were awaiting them as if they were trying to escape the mouth of hell. The company had no sooner been rowed back to the shipthum an arm of the fire came close to the section of the city which they had been exploring, and the drift of smoke grew thicker. The anchor had been pulled p, when a solitary figure, a small child appeared, moving northward that connected this 3wer scatheastern section with the northeastern section of what is left of the city. The field glasses showed a little black haired Calverinian girl. The captian sent a boat to bring her abourd, if possible for it seemed she had gone to the river shore, as if seeking for safty. They took her on board, and found she had aimlessly wandered into the city, one of the refuges of the forest fire.

Succeeding this midden scare, came a violent but counter blowing wind, which caused the burning forests to rage in fire jet more violently, and a hundred stretches of lower country side gave an effect of a "sea of Clouds", and made the whole region appear like the entrance of hell.

The appearance of the remaining sectiond of Abbieann from the ship is that of a abandoned city in partse informs, half of the buildings are all thrown doo down, amroofed, all the highest buildings are razed or has clost their pror stories, and the rains puts one in mind of an Lisbon or some other city destroyed by an earthquake, and then partially rained by fire and flood. So thick is the wreckage lying in the streats that the city appears half buried in other rabbien thrown up by some exploded mountain a volumic cyclone and a shock at the same time. The damage which had recently been wrought by explosions could have accurred in a minute.

That a terrific explosion also tore off the whole flank of a high hill near Abbieann Starring was sure of, but he did not believe the consussion had anything to do with the twisting of buildings, and fences, the wrenching assuder of great masses of stone, or either the terrific explosion blasts hat hithered portions of the city either. Some believe that the explosions did not cause the "death cloud" either but that awindstorm was raging in the path of the forest fires, or rather it might have been the fire hurricane itself, and the explosions may have therefore whirled some of the seas of flame and smoke from the fires itself upon the city. Or could mything elne have done these things, except the explosions making a strange upheaval of the earth.

Also where did the floods come from. Evidence proved the rivers never did it, After the first ten minutes of terrific explosions, which destroyed the life in the extreme northern part of the city, the houses were little injured. They were set on fire as if clouds of fire had been hurled in a tempest through the streets, the tallest buildings not wrecked by the concussion were devoid of their roofs, and getted by the fires that followed, but of buildings that escaped with only detatched roofs, and broken windows, had their interiors entirely intact, whereas the buildings of the southeastern sections were shald shaken down to their foundations... Thops, factories, stores, immense elevators, railroad elevations of all kinds, and so forth are not distinguishable from dwellings, and all the streets are nothing but mere crossword puzzles......

By a mighty thrust ofse force the terrific explosions had shaken the max manorry of fills TALLES buildings buildings to the ground and hurled the wrockage into the wildest confusion. Starring had crossed over still smoking heaps in the streets as high as the wreckage notized in the city of Calvaston after that dinastor, or what had been observed in Lisbon after the earthquake there. The interiors of homes as he had observed, and also of those of churches and facot factories and effices and stores were as deeply filled as the streets were incombered, and often he observed also that it is seen to be only the pieces of wall paper, or decorated plassir or pictures hanging on interior walls that is the only evid noe to show which is the sinside, and which is the outside of a building.

All the cathedral towers were harled down flat with the ground, and many of the fine bells that chimed so plad placially, its builed deep moons the rubbish. Starring had gone into what remained of the ruins of sie of these Cathederals, and discovered that the alater made of fine carved marble—with its beautiful brazen lumps, and condle sticks wan also a wrock, and of many other beautiful beautiful and ornamental partions of the building, noti nothing at all was to be seen it. The inside was deep do not in rubbish, and Starring in wading through it, endonly atombled upon a granted white looking and account I kine of ze object, dragged in cray..

Bodies of even pri sts were also found here, many of them in the attitude of prayer, , but the well-fred whends in suny other cases may have been moore profa of them trying to mand off the manner of falling wreckage. Starring also found the charted bodies of many others in an open square before the church, and they were so budly burned in the smouldering wrockure that there was no danger of them decomposing. They were only charred remains throughout. Indeed how hard it could be to realize that there had been life in the city at all. Before this, Abbicann was a ra; beautiful city, with its immense crowds dressed in cay colors, fairly dazzling to visitors from distant lands, and cities and towns, with oleander, and all kinds of flowers blazing in the various gardens and immense parks, also with all the highest things known to be in great American cities like elevated structures for trains, street car lines, and main rail-acenters, beautiful river bridges, wany subways and the like as a thing that never existed in the same land or century with the remains of this mournful and hedous hedious wrock with a good portion of the city swept all over the country by a flood. Here was the headquarters of immense size for the Holy Name godiety, and its meeting halls and clubs, here the big hotels, or beautiful decend show houses and movies and other theat es thetres theaters, not a single jail to be found, not a single sind of any bad people living in the city, and by the way things looked of how the attendance at ail daily and Studay Masses was unusual to break all records. All are blent in one. wide and most awful co downfall. The avidence proofs proves that it was not one of nature. Hature worked by God had nothing to do with the horror. If it had been true Starring would have noticed through some instinct that the Anger of God was in the very air over this awful trugedy. "What you do to the least of these my brethern ye do it to Calverinia being a rei righteous country, was devastated, so why would not god claim too He was devastated. On what an awful price glandelinia will have to pay if it is proven she was responsible. A curious phases of the disaster was the absence of all floors of remaining buildings, doors roofs, with window frames and furniture. Every thing of wood was totally destrojed, ave save part of the littley kitchens, and outbuildings in the yards. It is the stoniest of ruins and looked more ike St Pierre than Abbicann, gharp as was the flames that was hurled upon the city by the explosions its durtuion was brief. The destruction of Abbicann was no doubt accomplished by the explosion in twenty minutes, by flood of course in a days time. A tumbling cloud of dense smake many miles of hurling flame and all was over. The cyclone of fire which was harded pon upon the north and the rain of debris that followed, did a kindly act of borial.

In that guet of flame that explosion of owders, which may have been ignited by gases in kitchens, everything of life disappeared. All trees were uprocted and burned to ashes, what were pretty gardens in front or rear of beautiful houses is a waste of bu building ash, with a stagmant fountain in the center, the only green thing being the view of its water.

All the trees and the flowers flowers, the splenders of all this section of the Calverinian country are no morn. Large stately palms, lie at length like slain giants, their roots already munting with a fungue of brilliant colors. It the foliage that mantled the clifty steeps behind the city have been wiped ofth by fire. Before the awful disaster this big city of Abbicann was a perfect Calverinian garden. It was divided into sections by the rivers curves with a presty esplanade, of which now nothing is left except desolated destruction, and from that point the highest sections of mobile the light slopes of the hills in terraces.

There were parks and pleasure of grounds in some sections of the city, pleasure There were parks and pleasure of grounds in some sections of the city, pleasure grounds like Riverview Park or white city, in Chicago, or also like Coney Island in New York, and a Statue of the "Flight of theM, Wither and child into Egymp Egypt on a promontory at another were features that drew attention from tourists and visitors an they enjoyed time in the city, and as they passed the capes and saw this immense and the rading panoruma unfold itsels they marveled, the houses of many colors and magnificent shapes, shining in a sum of anus alb williamore, flocked by tree shadows magnificent shapes, shining in a sum of anus alb williamore, flocked by tree shadows was found by gtarring and his followers that even the quays were gone. The anchor chains chains and other ship stores along the river front, were rusty and added to the look of long desertion. Even who would imagine that the entire river fronts of the city had immense double rows of high shade trees, and a splendid main line ratiroad and and benches for travelers and sight seers and hard working tired men to rost on. But a hintbof them is now to be seen any where. All kinds of Holy Statues in the Cathedorals lie broken among the rubbish. Where a beautiful band played on pleasant evenings not a such as a sound is heard. Het a bird sings, no cricket chirps not even the sound of a fly or any insect is heard.

Yet Starring saw that among the ruined shops are odd survivals, usless caps and yet grarring saw that among the ruined shops are odd survivals, usless caps and success, utensils of every kind, rows of dusty tumblers, toys for children, images of china, tin and every thing used for kitchen purposes. Much treasure if 'my is laft will never be brought to the suf surface. It is buried as deep as the flowers, and lawns on the delectable hills above the city. For those heights are as burren us lattle other scene of desolution around. As a person sails by the region they might look for Abbicann in vain. Some one may cri cry "there is the city", but you see no

What Starring really wondered was "What in the o world happened at One A.M. that futal morning. Did the forest fires raging near by at the time really cause it? what matter if it did? The enemy made the forest fires and are therefore to blame on that line. An hour after surrise that day before, the aurthorities in the city, who had been unessy for some days because of the forest fires, said to be menuncing the city, had send up early in the morning, and late in the evening signal rockets and fire works to warn the population to be on their guard, and the fire departments especially. Put what did this matter? The enemy had tried to frighten calverinia perore with past disasters and had not succeeded.

Yet the conflagrations kept the sky over the city thick with rolls of smoke. Foor people. There was it is believed almost time to escape, if they had only known. Many reade leading northward were open. By taking all kinds of cars and trains or by wagon and so forth they could have at least won a chance for life. But no. There was no warning of what was to come. The day before the terrible event had begun. In woods end gerdene on the hilloides, end in the city parks, the flowers were vereing to the heat. But no birds were heard, enimels strange to the people were entering the city odors of orange and jasmin mixed with that of burning trees blent with the palm of the morning. And peacefully rocking in their towers o in the cathederals, the bells were humming their call to prayer, and the golden notes went abroad in waves, reaching to the forest hid villiages along the river shore ...

Chimneys were sending up smoke, and faint notes of unhurried life issued through doors . The river waters sparkled green and blue, and a number of vessels swung careleadly. The industries of the kitchens commence, commonplaces on the streets are in exchange, but then hark. Above and beneath the sound of the boats, the puffing of railroads and ringing hells, a rumble. They think it is only thunder. If it rains the Red Plague will be wiped out. Again, and much lowder that pulsing sound, deepl long stirring vague terrors, and this time it does not stop. Twaid late night they strange rumble grove, that vening there being a yellow light, like that from a dying sum had been had been upon. Abbienn, making it shadowy and uncertain. How close it had become, and what soltriness there had been in the air;

The very fish in the river are measy, and are leaping from the water. People step into the street to see why it grows dark far shead of the hour. Even the chorses are stemping in the stalls, and the dogs whinning and the cats screaming and Meowing. Claude nearly always rest on summit hills of great height near Abbisann, but not such clouds as these. See they are sent with flames, and the gloom is deepening fast. Yet th the hells ring on, and there is comfort in them. The people can take that comfort while they may for it is nearly over. You mother kiss your little ones for the last time. Good Father in the churches commend all the souls of the people to Our Bleesed Blessed Lord who is to require them, for the hour has come. It is One minute to one. givery one is in bed asleep. Yet to every one in the western and extreme southern part of Abbieann this is the last of earth.

The horizon sky lightens. Buddenly the groundshakes as if there was a terrific eartha ak earthquoke, while there came a roar as if the whole world was blown to pieces like a fire cracker. A emoky pall appears to rise, and a terrific flash appears, blotting the view of wells of flame that are hurled forward tward the city. A very devils tated is sounded from the cathedrals, newever these rapid notes are the pounding of atomes that shower from the sky.... The cloud of debris falling with the speed of hail spreading as a fan, its edge rolling and voileying like a breaker falls upon the city. In one breath the people are buried beneath the ruins. In another moment it seems as if the cloud turns to fire, with a roar like a naval warfare.

Now great clouds of mud, eart earth, dust and the like falls thick and fast upon the northern portion of the city. ut human eyes do not see these things. They are glazed, and stare at vacancy, for at one throb eight million human hearts have caused to beut. Abbiesnnfff There is no such a place. It's citisens abraed abrowd who have been not there at the time are of the race of Ishmael, and homeless.

After fifteen or twenty minutes the tremendous roar of eruptions is over, the rattle of stones are over, the crash of trees, swept from the ground has ceased, from end to end the city is on fire but burned untill the flood obliterated the most part of it, the shipping in the river are aftene or under water, and all is what has been starring however saw that just now even, his explorations of the southeastern section of the city of Abbieumn was quite dangerous. On the second day of his entrance into that part of the city he was looking at the distant forest fires, wondering what the next day would bring for in his favor or disfavor, when to his surprise a dense creamy colored smoke,, began to issue from a new section, as if a volcanic eruption was about to start. There was a glare of light, and soo nit seemed as if the slope of a notherr thill was becoming a mass of flame.

Btarring believings it was something unusual ordered his followers to retreat and he and they took to flight, but before he had gone me thousand yards, he and all of his followers were suddenly thrown down, as by a hot wind, and slightly burned. Then to their relief a breeze came from the south (de mouth) driving back the odors heat, vand and the smoke,, and as the air cleared they saw the southern ruins far below in f flames. None of his party were killed in this encounter, but twenty were injured and the city was deserted for a good space that time, and they remained on the ship. Not a one dared to leave the ship and go on shore again. He saw ar off to the north that there were bright fires still burning near the river front at the northernmost part of Abbleann. He and his followers could see them as the ship apprached a little nearer in the night,, and any one not acquainted with the region may funcy they were crematicns. But they were not, for they were the citys coal yards, lumber yards, and many other places whose destruction however is delayed by the fallen wrockage of buildings over them. Even here and there those on board the ship detected the edor of chemicals as if they were burning in some cellar. The flames had withered end secred where it did not destroy. Starring the day before found among the ruine several books that were said to be still good, though of course the very pages were provided, and would crumble to dust before many days were passed... And strangely this char affected the whole book rather than k just the outer Janves.

Unusual and extreme he heat was noticed on the day when they firsted entered the devastated city.

The engineer of the ship was testing the river vator that rons through the city,, at this location and discovered a temperature of 192 degrees. He could not condense the water, it was so warm. In the engine the vacum had dropped from twenty six inches to twelve, the pumps refused to take the water, and the hose was turned on to cool them. During this time many dead fishes were seen floating in the vater. It seemed to Starring that the end to the disaster horror is not yet. Because of the disaster some of the currents of rivers have changed, prevailing winds have gone about spreading the forest fires more then ever, and intense heat provails over the whole state,, but what the people insist is not usual is to that that this heat is added by the wilting humidity of an African August in the Go Congo.

The ruin of the section of the city still revealed in its physical aspect, is remarkablely like that of St Pierre in 1902. Percet fires, bettles, massacres, raids, sacking of towns, and visitations of horrors resulting from such asful tattles, and massacres of children were thought to be enough without adding great explications and immeasureable fleeds, but such things came. The scenes going on were more herrible

Starring had heard that some reason or other there had been various warnings of troubles several weeks ago, the ground shook from minor explosions, rumblings were heard and the great fire was discovered very close to the city, and when ever there was an east or south east wind the sum never shone. Sometimes when the fires dammed up a stream with fallen maxes of blazing trees there were escapes of steam with great noises, and the city population were excited it not alarmed by witnessing ernormous columns of cloud rolling upward to the height of probably fourty thousand feet. Cometimes as it was said the cloud sometimes even descending a little was lickened to strange flowers and heads of cabbage, or thunderheaded nimbus, or leaves of v smoke miles long, incessantly shot through by webs and seets of red fire.

The river running through the city grew hotter and hotter, and when it was dark a glow as if from a sea of molten lawa shone against the under side of the clouds.. Rangers flying from the battle field of the Red Plague reported danger to the settlement settlements in the forest, and presently there were regular processions running along the roads, tward Abbieann, and other places at of reach of the fire.

For some time after the disaster occured it was not known that any lives had been lost, and more than a month later the discovery that eightbmillion persons must have perished in the infernal explosion blasts, earthquake shocks produced by the explosions and the flood horror rushing over Abbieann, came with crushing force upon the whole state of Calverinia and deepened apprehension which extended to the remotest confines. It is not that the people are afraid of burial under the wreckage of their homes, but that in these great explosion upheavals, new caverns with roofs collasping may broke break under ones feet, and strips of cost coast clide into the sea or river, the submarine avalanches falling for hundreds of feet, carrying villiages and people to

On the following day Starring decided to enter the section of the city said to have been only slightly affected by the dea devastics. As the ship steamed into this part they accollanded, and found it a very good sized section. It was not and close and dirty. Piles of dirt, and earth debris had fallen from roofs and laid in the streets. A fall of eighteen inches or more of this had taken place, and all is sad colored and gray as in the neighborhood of the southeastern section, but the scorching has been lighter. The terrible forest fire that Starring keeps sight of out of the corner of his eye is withdrawn in sulky appearance behind a curtain of rolling smoke. Neary every windo window in this part on the side tward the explosions has been smashed. That means either by concussion or flying stones, which wary from a pea o to a cocoanut in size and which are streen in the streets in millions, and Starring scooped up a half ouch ounce with both hands to look them over.

All down in the south it was dark, and sometimes it acked as if it was going to rain but the thermometer kept steadily. At four oclock starring feltuthe heat as he was trudging through, and it kept getting worse till at eight oclock, he decided to return to the ship. Starring thought he heard sounds like explosions, but thought they were rangers dynamiting. Especially vivid was the recital of the victims which later he came across on a high hill in a hospital camp northwest of the flood sone. It would need a Veddar or a doya to paint the scene at night, when the injured sitting on their cots, their skins red and seared. They waved their bandaged arms, and nod their bandaged heads, their eyes shone in the light of the single lamirens, and the girl scouts with gtarring listens in awe as one of them tells his experience.

"We were c far from the explosions but got hurt any how"He said. O"On the morning

One man the shut himself in with mixteen hundred reeple, told me that a flach of the explosion entered through a camp and Filled over mixty of the party on the spot-And where the floods a have receded everything left in mid, med, mid. It has put forth torrents of elime, and you know yourselfe that the vaters of the river itself is very, hot. There are hardly any bridges outside the remains of the city now, the flood having Swept everything away, and when we attempted to cross we were driven back by these hot waters had we crossed them we might have been cut off from escape by the fleed, oats Goats and sheep are bleating pitcoust; for their forage is buried decor deep, and those that can are wandering to the lonely hills at the south north,, where things are still growing."""

Starring reamed into the fields behind the esta costern pert of abbieann the that night. A mountain aftre was throwing up all clouds like a volcanic crustion, clouds that boiled upward in cushiony masses, their rolling edges taking a pale pink light from the glare below. The mountains devastated slopes glared like so many furnaces, and along the edge of a ravine were twinkling a score of fires. Meanly every one of the refug refugees in the camp near by has lost a father, mother, brother, eleter, wife husband or child, some or many are bereaved of all their families, and all their friends, yet there are few outward eigns of grief. And yet no one can say that they appeared to be resigned. Rather it is a dazo, and it seem a as if they do not even realize for fair what has happened, and what is going to happen next. They have passed through explosion horror, fire and so forth and the taste of air and sense of early are still strange to them. So far they all seemed ignorant and slow of understanding of the situation, and they appeared as if in a dream. Many it is feared were made instance from their experiences. And their suffere sufferings are chieftly mental instead of the body, and yet all these are endured with a Christ like patience that is wonderful to a person who does not know

Starring stepped into one of the tent hospitals and noted the silence there.. and also the resignation of the people. These tents have been pitched close to the edge of the remaining flood to got air and escape the forest fires. Their sides are drawn up for free as access of the breeze and the cots are arranged with feet tward the central pole. All the patients are women and little children, and only a few doctors and nurses are there. There are old and yound young women in the company, but no rich and poor. All are poor, abjectly, unconscicusley poor, with a poverty made by the disaster that was never to be compared before. To most of them this care and tenderness seems to Starring a wonderful experience. The few doctors go from one to another with a cheery reassuring word and a emile that are worth more than any medicine. And as the bandages and the cotton are enipped and peeled from the raw flesh the patients wince and sometimes tremble with the pain, but there is not a single word of complaint not even from the little children, not a sigh of weariness, no crying of whimpering, not even a groun, though it is feared some of them by morning may be carried from the place and lowered into the earth, cut there where starring saw the grave digger laying his line of double trenches, long lines, filled in at as end as the they lengthen them at the other. The injuries are not as serious to them as occur in the fallen buildings or railroad accidents, there are no crushed skulls, and broken legs, no deep lacerations, and big bruises, but they seem worse. These refugees were fugitives of the forest fires, some were overtaken before they were rescued, and their flesh has been scourched, and baked, the skin has been pealed off in strips, ears have been learly rouse reasted from the heads, eyes have been half blinded arms and legs are deeply swathed in cotton. A few relatives, a wife, a son, visit the tents and sit beside the suiterors, as still and as patient, and fan them, pr pass was water to them from time to time.

The disaster around Abbieann is as Starrig observed more widely scattered, than other horrors he had seen. Most of the bodies that are not buried under r wreckage and flood borne b mud have been cremated by forest fires.

Starring learned that hundreds of refugees had dug cares into the hillsides, to be saftly under cover from the dreaded forestfires. No one made any complaints even the ground they believed the enemy were responsible,... when the flames came up close to them there was a quick rush for cover, and so many would crowd into these caves, that Starring arived at the edge of the crater no two at half past two, and remained there,, for over four hours, and one hallf ,. When he returned to Abbiennu he resembled a man turned back into dust, a statue of dust. The weight of dust and mud he carried on his person, the horrible atmosphere he breathed, and the foarful difficulties he had encountered, reduced him to a condition of extreme fatigue, notwithstanding the fact that he marched to the crater from the most easiest clde, starring decided to return to the boatthe next day, if he had sufficiently recovered by that time to do so.

The captian and some of his followers, who went to extreme north, Abbicanne, found on their return trip, that a bridge across the road had been carried a sy by the torrent of water Nevertheless the guides manuaged to get the party across the obstruction. They took the carriages to pieces, and carried them and the members of the partypy to the other side of the river, which was not and full of floating wrockage.

Starring said when he returned to the bout-the loat;

"To my idea" he said "The most interesting point about these supposed volcanic eruptions is the fact that the debrie thrown u out during the explosions in a most vertical direction, afterwards took a full shoot or spruh spruy in a horizontal way, and while it might be too early yet to attempt to explain more fully this most singular phenomomenon I am Inclined to believe that the ejecta thrown bythe force of the explosions was hurled to a great height, and following the lay of gravation, descended withgreat velocity a volocity comparable perhaps swifter than its ascension, aspecially as it neared the cruptions again. Here it encountered the "matter in ascension from other and more violent explosions, and was accordingly deflected in a full horizontal position and direction. For the accalled fire cloud which swept upon Abbisons, this action was probably by the fire hurricane of one of the man parts of the city, and the force of the explosion and the firms of the firm much have heated the dust thrown by the explosion to a white heat, and all this was hurled in the direction of northwest Abbicanne, and upon the vessels lying upon the river readsteads.. The intense heat from the flery dust cut a path through a certain section only, for there is very well defended defined line of buildings destroyed by this calamity them of those that were only related or shaken into ruin by the con a concussion.

As far as I could observe, as we paged along the craters rim, no large stones or any kind of matter be belonging to volcanic eruptions were found about. All I discovered was the ordinary fragments of the ground, clay and sead and as forth. There are some very smull fragments of solid rock lying under the heaps of dirt and rubbish with which the streets of Abbisann are heaped in the north but we do not yet know the exact nature of the matter ejected until a critical examanation of the ground and She ejected material is submitted to careful analysis.

I am inclined to believe that the matter belond forth by the force of the blasts was almost altogether pulver[zed rock or the earthly and mileran mineral and sandy matter of which our Calverinian Soil is composed. These substances when blown to dust by the terrific explosions, recombles all the materials we find in the soil everywhere.

As to the character of the explosives that is believed to have caused the cructions I am not prepared to express any opinion untill I have made a more caroful analysis. It may have been gum cotton, T.N.T or even higher explosives still in an unusual imme immeasureablecquanity, or it may have been merely a large number of ernormous munition pits used for the storing of m mub munitions hidden from the enemy that might have been touched off by the heat of the forest fire.

The union of some kind of a posion gas also may have produced the instantly disaster ous effects that some attribute to asphyxiation by gas. If the enemy really did this as it is suspected Clandelinia sure has a black record on her name.

"Do you think in your opinion that there is any danger of further disasters?"

"Considering the fact, that since this war began there has been many terrific ex possions and floods, and view of the further facts that these later ones was of the most greatest terror it may naturally be expected that there will be further and worst ogtastrophes. Then again the fact that the explosions at Adelpheid, occured on May the 2th and at Abbleann on June the First tends to show some sort of some existing between the landelinian government and the wicked Glandelinian generals . I am incling I am inclined to believe the same, and also so does Violet, and her sisters.

This theory is further strengthened by the fact that the Mayor of Abbicann who was in Pandors at the time is also investigating the cause. He also is using his means in observing the advancing forms of the forest fires traveling over the country on a line between the Vivian Hills and the Bondon range. They were he believes formed by the winds of the main conflagration. Untill there is something done to stop this "Red Plague there will be recurrent explosions or more or less severity.

If there had been any show of the danger the people of Abbisann would have been

On the next day Starring made another yield to the eastern section of the city and found the eastern arm of the dangerous fire had shrouled the whole region beyond in a sea of stinking smoke, and the heat was felt with such greatness that two of the workers with a Starring were overcome, and had to be scaked about the head with cool water. It was blazing weather, almost as fierce as the worst African climate at its worst, but not quite so under, not quite but a little worst.

And what a scene of desolation his eyes now fell upon.

It was stern in the blackness of the nights explosion, but the twilight of the days bring new woes new woes into being. Everything still reeks in the mud left by the passing flood. Yet as he and his followers go through there is a faint and fae faded stench of rosin as they sloush about, tripping against hidden rocks, and one of his followers slips on the edge of a retaining wall and tumbles into a yard fourteen or fifteen feet below, to the sorrow of his being. I don't know how it is than ; can not another person could enter, and those who were hammering for help outside, were urged to go somewhere else or distribute themselves in clearings, or treeless ravines. All the could as starring learned crawled under large rockglens, into river beds, and elsewhere. The air was het and stifling with smoke heat, and flyingdust, and a stroum close by the dugouts tr dried up entirely. There was then as they told Starring a splendid show of flames, and though a perfect hurricane of smoke flames and embers appeared to spread and stretch o almost overhead, there was nothing so alarming as feared.

Starring believed all these incidents and had about even resigned hope of seeing the fires quit threatening Abbieann, but at four of clock, while going back dismally back to the eastern section of the city, through a driving wind swept smoke, distant thunders began again to rumble. The noise was somewhat like thunder, but shorter, more interrupted. Rather it surgested the bumping of freight cars. Several times the sound was repeated in resounding volleys.

One of starrings followers became excited. He begged Starring to go back to the boat but he appeared to be the only frightened man of them all.

The others including Starring were not timid or unquiet. Starring had never been conscious of any joril at any time. The tragedies seem to him to be in the far past and a ravaging forcat fire even a mile or two away, seems as distant to him as if it were a hundred, so far as there is any possibilities of doing any injury. Yet it was a terrible forest-fire that threatened so near, and at any instant it may weer in its course. It has devastated the northern region east of Abbieum, just as the forest fires have done it elsewhere. The raging of the forest fire to day, that to Starring an and the braver of his followers was merely a distant scene, was better seen from the ship that went up further in the northern country section, where explosions has made changes in the geography, building as it seemed new hills, channeling hollows, altering the river line undermining the soil, utterly destroying life, and ruining all the villiages and estates north of Abbieann. Though chrowled in cmoke, the spurting and and fizzing of the thousand thousands of acres of pine trees ablaze could be heard and seen on the slopes and in the plains and valleys, and the booming of falling trees was constant.

the big oxplorion the could score a great success through an effort to reach one of the big oxplorion criters man Abbi sann, and therefore he decided to undertake the expedition alone, with only four guidor, as he knew the trip would be gitte perilous. First Starring we at lyard the London Plantation, which he was told was near the crater, in company also with a ranger.

The expedition loft the north of Abbliann at noon September the 18th. The following day was epent first in studying the many formed rents or cracks in the ground near the crater, on the north flank of the forests. The next day starring determined to attempt the move through the these woods to the edge of the crater, and therefore with this purpose in view he set out about four oclock in the morning. Near by the forest fire was threatening the forests near and around the crater, but amid a hundred thousand dangers, he reached the edge, and looked down into the huge pit, it was haif full of water. Here he see spent a long time in taking cureful observations, examing the debris around it, and taking note of the crater itself to see if it was of volcamic porigin or not. If he saw such a thung as a huge cinder cone in the centre of the crated crater than the report that the disaster was caused by volcanic eruptions of secondary duration would be a fact. He saw no such thing, and the opening of the crater itself was about six hundred yards long, and five hundred yards wide. It was not rounded or in any form observed of volcanic craters, but of shapes that big explosions usually leave.

while Starring was on the edge of the crater, several violent squalls of hot smoke laden wind raged, tearing the limbs from the trees, and bearing the distant fire still onward, and again and again his life was in denger from failing trees. Branches feil about him in such quantities at times as to give him a good drubbing, and the thickness of the smoke borne along on the wind,, completely,, obscured his vision. One particularly violent gust of wind covered the general from head to foot with thick dust and his hat was blown clear agreese the craer. He still persisted in his study and ob observations however, and twice mor more was showered with pebbles and stones, and dust, and once was almost blown into the crater.

He learned as he had suspected, that beyond there were three separate big cracks at close quarters with each other, as if the groundall around the crater had been split by the force of the "eruption," and all the trees were standing inclined in all directions or uprocted entirely.

He could however not discover whether it was of a volcanic eruntion or not. He pur put some of the rocks and other materials into a sack he carried to examine on board on the ship. Starrings journey back from that hot region was fully as dangerous as the approach.

most awall region, and raged fur esent the intrusion of a mere human being into the However starring also made the important discovery that at the head of the stream or river Ester Emether had another crater of the same size, and that the same material of eruptive wreskage was observed all around it, and the trees nearest it were call destroyed in the same manner. The water was more of mud and looked boggy. Starring had proceeded tward this hole on a horse, until he came to the steeper part of the region. From this point he continued on foot leaving the horse that had carried him up the steep slope back to the tree.

. Upon reaching the site of Lake murnor gtarring found it completely drained out. He proseed the bed of the lake and continued u on up the gently rising slope to the forested region above. Formerly the edge of the hill was a high bluff or shoulder. Thus the expliexplorer found had fallen down the side of the hill, and he thinks this change probably occured at the time of the great explosions. He saw mid gravel and every ground wreckage had been thrown up in the explosion in high columns. This is the first important alteration in the region which has been noted and verified. But there was light of this matter, or pretend to, but it does seem comical to see them go slipping and flowdering through the mire, but the deaths theyese seldom haunt them, and some of the unfortunated who stepped into corruption, that was alive the other day, feel due disgust and slokness rather than horror. To Starring and his followers there is a full evidence, and overwehelming evidence of decay issueing from some spots he goes over. when he first entered the city he noticed it, yet when traveling over the rubbish the odor was partly submerged under a smell of burned material, the smell of scorched wood, paper,, clothed rugs, building materials, a general indescribable fout foul and most pumgent odor ...

an distant to I mish was and gill all of his followers could locate cadavers easily by the acone in ze air, and yet only a few are made sick by them. Starring passed to the right of a corpse, and the proof of dearh death was yet so persistent, that he could not help looking in that prove of dearn death was yet so persistent, that he could not help looking in that direction. Towever he could not yet see saything, among the hades of the falles manenty the prestrate trunks of troop, the iron and other fonces and the rubbish of old tinware covered as they are with dobris and dirt, but nevertheless he know the signs.

Individually the dobris from some of the forms so that the faces were plainly seen hile while on other occusations the corpse is marely suggestive to the eyr.

hile while on other occusations the corpse to merely suggestive to the syreye. In a street starring found one wan, whose position was that of rest, the attitude of one who has thrown himself into bed for to sleepth, the head thrown back, the arms extended the legs close toe together . . At a slighter i distance was the body of a little girl lying face down. In the debouch of a wide street was one that was half skeleton already, the bones showing yellow white through the singed flosh.

Atop of a tall retaining well, closing a yard that is nine or twenty feet below they layed of the impending torrace, lay a women with her head hanhi hanging back over the edge, and arms danglingbover the stone work too. The form was like that of some Egyptian mummy, dried and blackened, but the expression did not donate fear and pain. Those Starring had son donated calm. The visit Visitation of near by forest firesfor some days proceeding must have permudied those who were watching the dreaded conflagration, that this was only a passing danger. It was not the explosion that killed it was the failing of buildings while all were asleep in them, and therefore it was a merciful death.

Those who were lying beneath the wreckage were killed by falling stones and timbers. But they might have been so sound asleep ty that they had passed all feeling. One figure crouched behind the wall of a building as if he feared what was to come, yet his collaspe in that position was believed to have been an accident. In front of a house containing a score of bodies, is a street car. It was not injured. The body of three girls, and two children in one house had fallen easily to the floor.

Often while Starring was walking over fallen walls, he was conscious of bodies by many scores beneath, the stench rising through interstices in the stony mass. Some of the bodies were mere fragments but that may be they had been crushed. Complete incineration of many of the bodies by the fires was impossible in such a case, but incineration of many of the bodies by the fires was impossible in such a case, but it probably dried the bodies and reduced the danger of plagues that it is expected when the air clears of smoke enough to indi induce the flies to return.

The progress of starring and his companions was mortally slow, though it must be said in their behalf that they had to contend, not only against the governt iss of heat, but with the sting of the distant fires, and the noiseome axhalation from reasting exhautions from exhalations from roasting bodies. Although the explosions which destroyed so much of the population, the heat of the houses out of reach of floods as they burned started the best top of the distant forest fires, scorched the bedies indoors and so much of the population, the heat of the houses out of reach of floods as they burned afterwards, the heat too of the distant forest fires, ecorched the bodies indoors and out; and in none was partially preserved. One of the corpses that Starring found near a park was seen because of a little foot protruding through the debris, and the bottom of this foot showed a skin typical of a little gold. Starring on opening the door of a bedroom found a woman a man and four children. The woman had been in bed dying there. The children were all lying in their beds, and of this whole company it was only the child in the bed nearest the window that had been scorched. And yet none of the bed clothing was burned, One of the most curious finds was that of one of Starrings followers. He went into a bakery containing the bakers store overns. One of the overs of the immense range was empty. In the other were two children a girl and boy lying atop of one another, fact at the door; arms extended and knees tightly bent. What possessed them to hide in the oven. In such a situation it is true one seeks coolness so they could not have gone there for sleep. They must have been terrified by the roar of explosions and falling buildings, the oncoming fire cloud, the hail and cloud burst or expressions and railing buildings, the encoming rire cross, the half and cross burst of wreckage, but the hot fire cloud sought them even in that re refuge and it was found their bodies were disembowled the heat having probably explaind them.

However at this stage to m put it mildly identification of bodies that might be still found amid the wreckage of what is left of the city, save by doubtful findings of rings, watches and the like is impossible. It is for the reason that all the bodies that had been found have either been blackeded by fire, or crushed beyond recognition in the wreckage of the falling buildings, and most are half or totally buried in the mid left by the flood wash. mid left by the flood wash.

and those lying deep beneath the stone heaps will not be reached untill the wreckass is entirely cleared and that may take years, as all hinderence is going on that prevints any laboverers laboverer from coming to the scene, and the reader may be sure that when they are uncovered; practically nothing will be left of any of them.

Nowhere did Starring see any si token of such things as concerted exertion, no browd in a single street or square sr struggling for the open country, no company or mob arrested in flight on the roads and pathways near and outside the city, may not even people huddling in corners as if to get as far away as possible from the disaster.
Buildings and a environments predical predicate everything of their contents, for instance Starring found in a hospital bads half covered under foundation stones and other wreckage and here in scrapping some away he found the patients dead in the bed

Indeed as Starring had meen in his trip to Abbienn from one city to another, that in each place concl. Aing Abbienn too the absolute sign of ruin is so great that never in real disputors would there ever be a comparison for it, in the past or future. never in real digmaters would there ever be a comparison for it, in the past of futures. Starring as he passed through thought of the case of he and his followers visiting on a planet that had been destroyed of life and cities by some unful visitation to the whole world itself, and he did not see just morely burned districts of the great cities, where walls and chimneys will atil be atomised, a few windows intact, some streets clear, but even the very architecture does not exist, the cities he passed through were merely foundations of run rubbish, with not so passed glass for miles.

Twon the horrid ruins of St Fiorre in Martingue is nothing in comparison. Here in Abbieann there is not even a yard or clear street. It is as if a volcanic blast of most immense force had occured in the center of the city and shaken and blown the town asunder. Streets and longs lead nowshere at all, and the phatoes is heightened by the names and numbers stamped on the still standing street signs, futile guides now, only to be read by the souls of the dead.

To stand in one of the atrects, like the Central Avenue, formerly lined for miles with as attractive stores and store haddings as seen in his merican cities, and gly with all kinds of colored goods, and all kinds of attracts, and see it now with mere skeletons of houses on either side, the windows staring like so many sightless eyes, the doors gaping like suffocated mouths, the pavements heaped with stones and charred woodwar woodwork, tonote the fixity and cilence, is like standing in the presence of a dead city on a dead planet, death onthroned in concussion harror, fire, and sufficient ing clouds, weilding strange thunders and hurting posion. Hever before in real disasters has the world yet any spec tacle like that seen in cities and town in Calverinia. go complete is the destruction of veven what is left to show of Abbieann that little remains to mark the character of the buildings.

The parallelogram of masonry scarred blackened, debris covered, might be a house, a store, a fact factory, a church dwe dwelling house, a stable, a shopping building, hospital or what ever we know of buildings. Ten story buildings seem to be only three story junk piles, now and again there is seen a yard, or a court with flower pots or something once a fountain that denotes of what might be the mere piece of a former home over some rich resident, but which was his house, his office, which is his carriage shed, which is his servants quartors, is of course a well known "crossword pussles" and this wide thrown down see of walls, and blocking of streets makes it eyes hard for Starring and his followers to try the least effort to setimate the size of the sections of the city remaining. There also is no doubts that the first reports of the sections of the city remaining. There also is no courts that the list reports of that flat interest of being exaggerated was far below the actual number. They first put the known loss of life at Abbiesan at about two million, go hear as one may learn from the imperfect methods and records the population of Abbiesan was nearly, twenty six million with enough houses to room 100,000,000, and the outlying villiages which were destroyed at the same time ha added but a few hundreds of thousand.

The household ornaments though nearly all of them are heavy in price, beautiful in color and yet filmsy in substance are occassionally of a fineness and delecasy that bespeak the Abbiemnain tasts. Probably not a picture, mostly all religious ones is left in the city to donate the populater pol popular likings as all are gone, even or wiffixes, lamps, bronzes, silver and other such belongings, which h are deftly wrought and most beautiful.

The alters of the ruined Cathedrals and churches and the religious houses, were as magri magnificent as they could have been are adorned, but now nothing if left... In some of the ruins however sewing machines were found, and bedsteads and machinery of foriegn type also, and a large number of all kinds of musical instruments. Of course it is going on through the month of september, and june is quite a distance past, yet even know the whole ration, (in this story) or the whole world, does not yet know hardly a large particle of the history of this greatest of all catastrophes in the main, but its details probable will never be known unless Starring succeeds in accomplishing his work. This mch is certain however, as Starring knew, Abbieann had no warning. Heither did Adeleheld or the other devuntated cities. Yet it was and still is blamed on the Calverinian Government for overconfidence. At trust in the probable inability of the enemy to do enything else but fight buttles, massacre children and burn forestr caused the fatality in each instance of the great explosion and flood calamities. The Governer of Calverinia advised the authorities of the various towns and cities to remain on the watch and therefore did not do it. He believed in his own advice, told the auxthorities of the Government, but they kidded him as being too much of a calamity Jane. wer more than eighteen months since the war got its progress nell well started the enemy had been doing the most astonishing and shocking things, and yet no man ever dreamed of the fate that was in store for the State of Culverinia and her fellow cities. People went about their daily tasks, the armies fought in the battles losing or winning, the women and children took care of things at home, went to daily Mass, and all the busy antics of life went on as usual. The great horror at Delights Junction, and also at Headrick Junction should have been construed as warnings.

An issue of May the sixteenth 1912 says that at five oclock on the previous morning, the destruction of Pullaway occured.

Over confidence brings lots of trouble,
For some time now guarting was blocked in his efforts to get back to the ship, A its hurricans was between the city and the shore, and he from a tall pile of ruins haw it overwhelm and destroy a large stretch of trees far to the southeast of the city sand he also observed a new branch at the borr bottom hill. A valley near by also was an inferno, and a long stretch of wooded lowlands not far off to the east was taking on a threatening aspect. comewhere beyond where a fire had passed before starring had reported seeing smouldering ashes fifteen fest deep, and all beyond there as is desclation drying dryness, heat and silence and a wall of impenetrable smoke.

Starring wishing to investigate the scene tried to approach the extreme eastern suburbs of Abbieann to see the phenomena. The whole country side was obscured by st smoke, so thick and smothering that it began to penetrate that portion of the city like a thick hase hiding objects fifty feet away, and he and his party were compelled to put back some returned by land, afort, and on horseback. It followers were now becoming dig disquieted. This time too the two girl, and other two boy scouts were also with him. Comment however was calming, and nothing could ac ascribe the atmospheric conditions.

The two boys was as badly frightened as were the men. They believed they were cut off from escape but starring was not so frightened. He saw that the north brench of the fire seemed to move off another way and therefore he was in a calmer state of mind. Yet the smoke still continued to come into the city, and they had to abandon the Tet the smoke still continued to come into the city, and they had to abandon the expedition in that direction. On the following afternoon, there was tongues of fire seen across the river, and many trees were breaking before the force of a gale then blowing. The latest fear is that a small part of the stream was overflowing became of the nature in which the water was boiling from the heat, and threatening once more the swamp the lower ruins of the city, if this happens they will be cut off from the chip. The people in the neat by neighborhood were in a state of madness, and tried to seek refuge in the ruins also. Thousands leaving their towns run for the city. Children are crying, women lamenting, and the wind was strong from the south.

The next following hour, the opinion was expressed, that the riwing of the river was not probably due only to the heatened waters, but to some dam that was burst by the heat, for the river now was a torrent . Starring felt a little nervice nervicus. They all begged him to give the order to leave the place and return to the boat, but he did not think it possible just now. He could see now a mass of seething flames pouring over the treetops, and engulfing the forest within view in a sea of fire, leveling a xonsiderable stretch of country, forming in a short time a sea of smouldering wreckage. Starring and and his followers began to flee the district. A small country mountain town within view on the sloping plains and all its surroundings disappeared in the flames. One man escaped by leaping a parapet into a poll of warm water.

Starring wondered that is this new peril that is repeating the deadly horror. The concealin concealment of all eastern hills by the smoke clouds made any sort of guessing possible or appossible impossible. The columns of smoke that was now writhing upward from the fires now burning down is of the thickness of storm clouds and of wonderful dimension as it win widens and spreads over the surround country and the city. One of the curious allegements of the explosion near the city is that it ran rained upon the surrounding region a shower of fragments of human bones, which fell even in wickey Lansin fourty miles away, many of them coming on the shipping in port. It is indeed most unusual conduct in bones of human beings to endure a drop of miles to the decks of a ship. The bombardment of stones was more serious. Yet Starring declared while waiting for the enable to chance to get back to his ship that it would be futile to attempt a scientific explanation of the causes of these explosions. He considered them somewhat unique. He watched the smoke clouds as they raised heavily, sullenly, ope opening into great rolls ofground, changing color showing now a dazzling white, snon a dark gray, a dirty yellow, a brown, or intense black. The whole eastern country side around that part of Abbieann is covered with smoke that looks as if the very clouds of the storm had descended to the ground, and what surprised Starring and his followers is that the raging of the conflagration appeared silent. They had heard no sill sissling or roar of flames, and only the sound usually heard and felt is some sort of dynamite explosion, and the columns of smoke which are brandished from the conflagration come from such destroying weapons that all human devices for injury are trifling in comparison. It is not merely the central region that is afiams now, but minor ones have broken out elsewhere, and the action of the wind reduces the danger from the conflagration hitting the ruins. He believed the ruins would not herdly burn anyhow. hether the reader could imagine being in Abbieann and seeing the distant conflagration in early morning, with the clouds of smoke whitening in the moon or starlight if that there is ony, or turn pink in the glare of flames, and then turning dunnuch and black and orange and yellow in the twilight dawn as if the spirit of a opal were there, or as he sees it in the gloom of a full darker cloud like an eruption, it is strange and no less than diabolic, a chaos of wild forms, a something aside from nature, or so stimes sometimes lifting into the forms of big cumuli or nimbus, or thunderheads, a layer of denser black and brownish color stranking the lower part of the clouds, and the scene indeed has a real hellish granduer. every green thing past which the fire has swept had been burned and event from the countryside, and it is all of smoke and debris. The remains are burning trees, and smoking debris and ground, and the scene also is like witnessing a whole country side in volcenic eruption.

And Starring had heard that before Abbieum was destroyed its people were taking up immense collections for the refugees and homeless of those who perished and lost their all in the horrid disasters just past. Impossible that the charities of Abbieum would soon be asked for the regions of Calverinia and Abbicann. Humerous smaller fires, that seem to change their places almost while they watch them give forth smoke of a silvery white, a dirty yellow, and sometimes black from which issues small shoots of flame from time to time.

STARRING BELIEVES THE WHOLE CALVERNIAN COUNTRY IS ABSAILED .. BY GLANDILINIA MADE FOREST FIRES.

ABBIRAIN. A WITHILATED BY THE EXPLOSION SHOCKS AND THE FLOOD...

AFTER studying on the matter while he remained on the boat now for a considerable time Starring began to believe that he was one of the witnesses of the after affoots of one of the most spectacular catastrophes ever known to have happened, and if it really passed into the history of the world, it surely would make all other disasters combined look like nothing at all. Imost at Abbiennias very doors, in her beautiful middle Bister State, Calverinia, I word which means a Country of Heaven,, a country with part winter zone, and trp tropic, disaster and dostruction aparalled of any of the past of her state have ruled. If the earth itself had opened to pour its relent less fires upon helpless humanity, if all the volcences had broken into explosions at once, they would be trifling incomparison even to the recent disneters of llovember 1912. And yet here is a catastrophe that breakeall records at Abbiconn.

Starring believed, and so did many of the christian generals, and mperor Vivian also besides Violet and her sisters, that the terrible Abbienn disaster, as well as the horrors before which overwhelmed so many sections of a Calverinia, and other states, and destroyed an uncatimated number of lives in an istant had about it certain unique features, that not only justified special attention beyond all ordinary cataclysm of nature but brought a great suspicion woon glandelinia as a cause of the whole thing.

However streemdoug and most shocking the great catestrophes of the past in Culverinia may have been they more added to the difficulties caused by the latter, and the very telegraph, the submarine cables, and the raileave and other mores of communications were totally destroyed, and therefore therefore before the printing presses could put it into nevapapers and books it took about nearly a month to spread it abroad only through the lower sists sister states, and the camera has not yet been made ready to depict with with perfect truth the very scenes of destruction themselves because the forest fires are assailing the whole Calverinian State as Starring believes.

Now Starring knows that the very beginning of the beautiful June month came in with a strange and mysterious conculsion of nature incon cive inconcievably tremendous almost at Abbicanias very doors, with all these agencies of modern progress at hand for recording and prevers preserving every graphic detail also wiped out .

As the records first never were known, it was believed by surviving people that immeasure ble sruptions had broken out from the ground, and earthquakes had been produced that wrocked the whole states, where if no communications had been destroyed the news could have been flashed throughout the nation with the speed of lightning the news came with the slowness as if there had been no communications at all, and a month came and went before even the most meager details were gotton of the disaster. The first news bearers were Certrude Angeline, and her followers, and she brought the details and also sent it by courier to gloist and her sisters who were the first, recinvers.

And the Vivian Girls laughed good heartily, because they believed Gertrude was up to one of her usual clever jokes" when they learned it was true they were prostrated. As far as the news could spread however the tide of universal sympathy was aroused. And newcomd Measure. As can always be known the heart of mankind was wrung with f greif grief. And prompt of course was the response to the cry for relief. The benevolence of the other sections of the world took practical form, and ships laden with flood food clothing shelter and money given out of the fullness of sympathetic sorrow, hastened us close as possible to the scene of the unusual ammount of suffering. Of course while they were giving, the people of the nation wanted to know the whole truth of what happened, whether it was a volcanic eruption, a terrific earthquake, and if not what was it, and where did all the flood water come from...

So near to the very state of Abbisonia was the greatest of all these disasters, so imm asureablybremendous its awful effects, so withspread the simultaneous reports of other strange explosive disasters during july and August, throughout 'Calverinia and elsewhere, that no one dared ignore them. And what state would be the next to be elsewhere, that no one dared ignore them. And what state would be the next to be stricken. And why should a country where all people are as good as can be should be devastated thus. Twas this the beginning of a series of world estastrophes, or was the time quickly coming when the end of the world was night. And what were the reall causes of such disasters of nature, and could he they not be foretold or averted. Or like the disasters of the past, did the enemy do it.? If so, how and why???

These were the natural question questions rising in every mind. In response to these queries, and for the curpose of the countyre cause to relate the whole story of this greatest of all catastrophes, is why Starring was out here now to go on in his work of discovering whether it was a really a natural disaster, or d. done by the enemy. If the enemy was responsible..... The purpose of his expedition has been to combine in prope proper proportion, the various causes of the disaster, which when written out whould give it permanent value for reading and reference, no less than immediate value for its rising the countrys men to action if he can prove it is a disaster

If not, then nothing else can be done but let it go down in history as one of the worse natural disasters known. With that in view, Starring decided to find at and out and write down even scientific explanations of the causes of the so called Wol canic eruptions bursting out of the coentryside in Bengall State, and the de-astating floods that followed and all kindred disturbances of the awful catantrophe, to write down a series of chapters relating the details of the most unusual disaster of all and an complete and authentic account, of the fo flood itself,. Although this atricken region belong to the best part of suffering Calverinia, it was Abbieannia that first recleved the nows and came to her aid as far as possible, with ships, provisions and money. Abbi annia though not being able to prove it suspected the real cause of the outsetrophe and therefore her armies were rising too like an overwhelming flood, and if Starring only proves landelinia is guilty, then a storm will soon break upon glandelinia that will be more overwhelming than the flood itself was in its sweep upon calverinia.

In preparing to present these subjects it has been a pleasure for Starring to recall his recent journeys in the Calverinian country, and all otherlocalities that have suffered the great war disasters, and to look again at the photographs which he has taken only gathered there, now to include in his illustrations of the stories he will have published to rouse the nation.

It is for him a melancholy contrast to note the housties of Abbicann as they were only a few months ago and the desclation that reigns, since the disaster broke loose on that awful June the faist .. To him also it is a great pleasure to acknowledge the prompt and concross courtsey of newspaper and wer correspondents in for his sake permitting the use of their own craphic accounts of conditions in the devastated regions, and of accompanying him in his expeditions. These correspondents, are since the war becan the writers and makers of current Abbicann history, always in the forefront when anything has ene no matter how dangerous, tireless and fearless, and therefore for Starring their work has a quality of morit recognized by him so much that he permitted

Starring their more has a quality of more recognized by him so much that he permitted quite a number to accompany him on him expeditions.

Indeed this was to Starring was on some dead and destroyed world, blazed before a terrified heaven, and he was within the ecene of where the crushes of the greatest disaster of the world buset with appailing threat upon the biteonnian nation, and to startle the world trails, pefore this, this section of galvirina was juyful in the beautire beauties of late springtime despite the reasons of the war cheemers, and property and progress were reigning. Addonly out of the region of pengall state, a committy beautiful, fortile and peaceful, care the shock of more alled "tremendous colored accounts and the residence of the war along the start of the spring and progress when the start of the sta volcenic eroptions from the very country side, the destruction of Abbleann and many cities villarce and towns, the death in horrible nightener and torture of countless men momen and children under the wreck and in flood and fire, famine and thire, the thirst and the heartrending crief of millions mo wning their lost ones, the wail of scores of the millions crying for succor.

Sturring fr from what he had seen so far realized now that it had been a spectacle of herror severate be obliterated from the memory of any survivors who had seen or been a purtaker of it, or those who had entered to the relief of the suffering. In disdeed the one bright apot in the whole picture of terror was placed there by the the demonstrated that the suffering is not indeed. servation of una universal human sympathy, the brotherhood of man, and that touch of nature which makes the whole world kin, whene ver suffering and disaster assalls some stricken land, p t oh indeed the pity of the most grevious scene that had met the relief expeditions. They could not hardly write, the voice even trembles, in the desperate efforts to describe what horrors were there. All phrases fail, even the imagination retreats. No hundred millioj thrillion words are able to convey the whole of the dos desolution, the suffering, the grief, to one who saw it or not.

Indeed let the whole world be glad hat such visitations in this story has not come true yet, and that hundreds of millions like in Calverinia will not have to bear in their memory the terrors and that tears that followed fast upon this most wast of all catastrophen known. Man is indeed powerless to save when even in reality Nature herself ageails, and indeed how feeble his boasted strength and intellect against the stupen dows natural forces which rend no mountains in twain, make the earth rock like the waves of the sea, but when a disnater occurs like in Calverinia he might as well give up all and be humbled.

now the period has passed for the worst of these disasters, and the ariarm alarm growstill worse became the war is growing in great intensity. Abbiesan.—— Lake Belicia, the horrors of the Mic-Hollester and Arronburgs Run floods, four greatest disasters,———and yet what part of the nation, or which state, and community would be next to feel the convestions of the dreadful war, shudering under the pressure of new floods, bursting with the expansive forces of treemendous volumes of explosives, like like the Krakaton gases strungling to find a vent and blowing a whole island to pieces.

Starring since his expedition started and up to now has through some resources which he would not reveal learned of simultaneous disturbances and many frequent occuring cocuring ones that had been reported near and far throughout he months of july and August, explosion and other disasters, flood and fire of immeasurable form that finds him feel for sure that the enemy had something to do wity the one he was investig ation, as the ones reported were surely done by the enemy. Next of the new bigger ones Angelinia Agathia Dorothy gale and many other places were socurged by a more treemendous now the period has rassed for the worst of these disasters, and the arlarm alarm

Angelinia Agathia Dorothy Gale and many other places were scourged by a more treemendous floud than eyer before. In quick succession came the news ofactual or threatened explosion and shock and flood or fire disasters, from Angeline State, Calverinia, Angelinia State, Abyssinkile and Festern Calverinia, where scores of thousands of lives were lost, of disasterous battles, turning Calverinia into a land of hellish horror, from even extreme southern calverinia scene of some of the most destructive forest flowed float because of the most destructive forest flowed float flowed float flowed float flowed float flowed float flowed float flowed f fire and flood borrors ever known since the Ableann disaster, from Martinque city, from many Calverinian counties, but none of those can compare with the horrors of sengall fitte and Counties, where explosions occured far worse than if Krakatos had erupted ten times the strength than she had been reported, with a noise hear for ten times the din heard at her own explosions, the most treesendous explosion and followed for ever known, from elsewhere, in Eastern and a southeastern Calverinia which poured forward the most record breaking forest fires that destroyed thousands of miles of forests along it had not tree to worse the average the average the average and indeed threat of wiles of foreste since it begun, and is raging worse than ever, and indeed threat ening every other forested region of Calverinia and other states. The whole population of calverinia stood aghast. If the hidden forces of nature were to manifest themselves in a ceries of most destructive assaults on the world, they would not compare to this. Starring in contemplating on the surject wondered exceedingly and with approhenation of what would be the news from the Blongislomenean Islands, connected with the rest of the world by Angelinia Agathia and Calverine, and communicated by frequent chips of all kinds, by telegraphic cuble, and right in the track also of the wars terrific convulsion as these inlands are near Vivian wickey, where the greatest seige on all record rages with bloody battles and terrific cannon (iring overy day and night without a momente pausing. The great and famous Catherine lede in apito of the opposition of Blengiglomenean Greatures is in possession of the claudalation, and the creatures big and powerful as they are filed from those inlands to the longl Blengiglomenean islands for safey, and the only reason the latter isles are not in the possession of the enemy is because they are fortified as Vivian Wickey is and held by millions of dangerous Abbiecanies soldiery, and willing foriegn fighters for the cause too.

The gras from the fortifications of these inlands could low every war chip out of the water These islands maintain the seige of vivian Wickey from their side, and held the properties and belief or the cause too of the water These islands maintain the seige of vivian Wickey from their side, and held fire of both sides makes the region look like a country with hundreds of miles of terrific volcants exceptions, gaysers, and fires and all other dreadful v volcante phenomena. in a series of most destructive assaults on the world, they would not compare to this.

The greatest students of volcanic and selemic phenomena, along took the chances to scann the situation, studied the conditions, and endeavored to add to what they could to the sum of human kno-ledge that might guide threatened communities of sowhers how to predict and how to escapecauch awful calamities, and these alone had brought back the reports, that the disaster looks mighty darm queer to them. One man said to his superior" if those disasters are not enemy made I'll take sulphar and melaeses ten timesa day." Hever before since world science reached its present state of widespread learning had there been such an opportunity to draw learnes from a catastrophe spread learning had there been such an opportunity to draw learons from a catastrophe that might serve to save life in the future, but never could they make out what this was caused by, except by the foe alone, as any of them said; "It was not of nature to do this, there was no so called Volcanic activity, and the nature of the scomes positively proves ofsome sort of mine explosions."

Such was the effect upon the whole nation and its peoples. Sodom and Gomorrah, the cities of the plain, destroyed for their sine by the rain of sulphurous flames from on high was nothing compared to the Calverinian war disasters. By these explosions many towns were buried like Pompeli but in a few minutes, either by lundslides, or by the debris thrown up by the explosions, and hundreds of towns not touched by flood or fire, played off they were the "lisbon Earthquake" to the destruction of uncounted number of lives, these were the famous horror of the Arbbicann disanter, and when number of lives, these were the famous horror of the Arbbicann disastor, and when the news began to leak through the interest of the world was roused as it had not been the news began to exist.

Since nations began to exist.

When the most violent of the floods had geneed, when the work of the relief parties and the others had ended, it became possible for the time to attempt a realization of what had occured, and the far reaching effect of this drouded force of wars horrors.

The news came to protegners, bringing thankfulness, that almost by a mirable the splendid oriegn she excursion ships in the Mic-Hollester ham fiver, barely missed destruction in the terrible disaster. These ships had put into the northern river harbor of the city the day before, signs of danger were forseen, but only the evening before the explosions the ships left the harbors. It was considered for them a most miraculous escape, for if they had remained long enough to have participated in the terrific some all of these fortegn ships would have been destroyed.

There were about sixteen of these ships and there were over three thousand excursionests excurisonests abourd each ship. One of the most remarkable features of the whole diameter was the great topographical changes it made and threatened to make in the river vulley region of the great Calverinian state, of which gharring and his followers took notice of. In some places and extending for scores of miles the country side sank thirty feet deeper than usual, and the river bottom deepened to about as many feet. This can'lly explains why cable communications with the landscapes by river rest. This easily explains why cable communications with the landscapes by river and underground with the main land was out off, ome of the rivers became almost dangerous to navagitation to any ship or steamer. In places of the rivers where previously there were as many as fourty feet of water, there remained not enough water for a river schooner, while many known river islands had entirely disappeared. The region of the explosion area was altered to such an extent as to be beyond any means of identification to to what it former was. The changes in land levels and rivers were not confined to the immediate center of disaster, but extended as far south as grancis Atlanta. Vessels plying between these localities found it necess any to make long detours through branches if it wished to reach port.

Y. Very serious transformations went on or had occured in the vinicity of Abbieann as Starring noticed, where a considerable portion of a high sloping hill slid into the river. leaving a wide inlet in place of the former mountain estate of some well to do farmer. Vessels that endeavored at the few weeks of the disaster to approach Abbieann from the north vest reported it mossible to get nearer than fifty miles to the scene of the catastrophe, and at that distance the wider stretches of the monsterous sea like expanse of the Mic-HellestervRun River was intensely and seriously perturbed as if from a submarine volcane, beiling and hissing continually.

The theory was well advanced that the river was draifing out somewhere after having been swelled to terrifically by the floods that recently poured into it from the deluge which swept so much of Abbieann ways, hether a flood had swellen this part of the river remained to be determined, but conditions cortainly seemed to point to such our occurance. In any event now the disasters at Abbieann and Adelsheid were regarded as warnings to the whole nation, and by the inhabitants of every city and town, in all other sections of the Culverinian Hell.

The eminent volcame scientists, studying volcanic eru tions all their lives, and who had investigated this, while other scientists backed out and would not come, held to the statement that the big craters were the results of tremendous outbursts of mining underground, and not volcanic oruptions. They went so far as to predict the possibilities of the same thing occuring again if the Abbieannian Governments did not take steps to drive landelinia out of calverinia by cladge hammer force.

The news of these so called "eruptions" caused pagic among all the inhabitants of southern, western and eastern as well as northern Calverinia, and other war torn

The news of these so called "eraptions" caused pages among at the innotance of southern, western and eastern as well as northern Calverlia, and other war torn States. As the cities of St Lucia, Deminica, Montserretia, guadeloupe, intiggua, Saba, Nevis, and Ste Kitts and Thomma, were also destroyed being near Abbiedna with a great loss of life among the inhabitants there was a great concern throughout Calverinia over the possibility of disasters striking them at eavy every other city and town, all of which were unguarded and as exposed as Abbiedna and Adelchied. Strangs and annual atmospheric conditions and annual actions on the part of all southwestward bound rivers were noticed from June the First to July, by the inhabitants of Calverinia outside of the disaster zone, and even as far back as that date it was feared that some terrible calamity was impending or had occured.

During the latter half of June many of the people of the other sections of calverining left the cities and towns to escape the possibilities of disasters of the Same kind.

Not alone in the beauteaful country of Calverinia, and other sections of northern Angelinia, but in many other parts of southern Abbieannia, the explosions had been heard and the shocks of the concussions were felt. The concussions as gtarring recorded were were reported from the southern part of Abbieannia state tiself, but no destruct ion of twome or fatalities occured. The disturbances occuring about a few minutes later were much believed to be connected with the so called "eruptions near Abbieanni and Adalaheid.

Pendora, Abbi annia, at about One Fifteen, felt a series of unusual earthquake shocks, or over fifteen minutes, the earth trembled regularly, at secondary intervals but the concussions were not like actual earthquakes, as buildings chimmied without any one in the streats feeling any sensation from the ground wintever. Yet in towns and cities fashlonable hotels, and cathedrals and all other big buildings were visibly shaken and all loose household articles, and so forth did sturts that would either surprise the witnesses or cause them to be bent double with laughter. Every shock was proceeded, as Staring recorded by a strange low rumbling sound, not underground but some where in the air, like low booming thunder, followed lastly by afew sharper detonations from the direction of Abbieans. Pandora is five thousand square miles from

Many in Pendora aroused from their beds fr by the srange shocks and thundering, saw even from there as they said the glow in the sky from the forests fires far to the south and east. It remained there as long as night continued, and the sky overhead in the mir morning was so hazywith emoke that the sum only shone as a ball through it.

Starring felt that he and his company were to be marooned in abbigain for a long time. The forest fires partly surrounding it, greatly increased in its fury, and owing to the threatening aspect of the forest fires, work of exploring the city for a while was suspended. After his first explorations of the city, the forest fires though far in the distance increased considerably, and once in a while loud explosions were heard. By this time the smoke clouds from the conflagration greatly increased, and indeed the scene was if a whole country side of volcances were in the most violent eruption and were spouting forth fire and smoke. One of the conflagration though only thirt—thirty five miles away was burning so fisceely that flames shot into the air apparently clear across the camp campy of sky over head in Abbigann. The entire castern country side east of Abbigann was hidden from view of those on the boat by the ever increasing fog of smoke. The worse of the forest fire is sixty five miles from their over observation, and makes a beautiful and exciting sight at night. Some of Starrings followers are frightenes, and sai say they have never known before of such a forest fire horror as the present one. Others forest fire is sixty five miles from their over observation, and makes a beautiful and exciting sight at night, gome of Starrings followers are frightenes, and sai say they have never known before of such a forest fire horror as the present one. Others with Starring are greatly interested in the scene, and are not generally alarmed.

As was expected by Starring, some river steamers from the southwest, brought to him of a flamking movement of the flames, and that a vast column of smoke and fire was seen during a full day and night in the vertible southwest, a nw new point indeed. The steamer captian who reported this startling news, sailed from Big nirl Knool July the twenty sixth, but owing to the heavy clouds of smoke which shut off his view of that section of the land, ho was unable to determined whether the fire was heading northwestward or northeastward. The captian also reported that he passed another large city that had been ruined by the horrible explosions of June the first. He said the town of riedly Junction had been buried nder a mass of wreckage thrown by the explosions, and probably half of its people had periohed in bed.

Shooks were felt of sufficient strength to keep the residents of the entire region in a state of terror, and little was done to repair the damage done by them. For weeks before a black pall of smoke hung across the eky from the eastern horizon, and the glare from the distant conflagration always illuminated the sky. Many of the inhabitants not in the flood zone fled their homes to places of sufty and these escaped frightful deaths. It was the state of the places of sufty and these escaped

It was impossible for any one to explore the ruins of that city. Starring had heard that many of the bodies found after the disaster were in life like politions as though death had come in an instant as indeed may have been the case. But the few bodies that gtarring did see were so burned as to make identification impossible, but he saw so other kind. Those of course taken from the ruins before the conflagration hit the city have been identified by the searching parties, which were under military control and were conducted under orders. No doubt immediately after the catastrophe the scenes in Adeleheid were heart ne heartrendingenurual parties workd worked day and night but it was impossible for the dead to be cared for as their friends had wished. Military rule was established before the conflagration in the town to prevent vandals from working, for such property as had not been destroyed must be protected. One of the great misfortunes arises from the fact that the storehouses of provisions had been swept out of existance, and already at calverine and Pandora big as those cities are food was exhausted for they were overrun by refugees from all parts of the country. And every days for months appeals contunied to come in for assistance while meantime the few provision stores are under close guard by the soldiers. Isowhere in the country there is no food, and it was a fact that hundreds of thousands were still starving.

As Starring was looking on the Abbieann disaster as proofs of theories, which investigators have been long holding, and regarding the immensity of the cata strophe said to the Captian after pendering for a few minutes on the situation;

"It is incomprehensible to me that since the terrible war began, and disasters of a terrible kind has occured people will persist for months in continually taking their lives in their hands by taking for granted that the enemy cannot do such things any more, that the christian soldiery will prevent it and so on. They might as well make their homes in a volcanic crater, "ith lava be bubbling up and an eruption threatening. For months the memini have held that there is a certain ammount od danger especially in any part of the war zone extending from northern angelinia state, through Calverinia, and partway into Abyssinkile. The Abbleann flood disaster has extende extended from Bengall state, and County, from around Abbieunn, and Nellie Calverine, and the country side of Central Calverinia, in oblong form to Northern Angelinia, and thence art way into the state of Angeline , ine, and finally connecting with and along the Angelinian Boundary line, and going tward Vivian Wickey, where the floods even passed far beyond. In that locality the flood branches off, also up through Delights Junction, and pushes through Lake Selicia, through the southwestern Mic-Hollester Run Valley. It has been shown conclusively that all this section was flood stricken and frightfully devastated. Half of the number of towns even now are still partly or entirely submerged There is usually or little or no hope for the recovery of many of the amaller villiages. This means too that no warning had been given of either the results of the explosion or the flood. I cannot understand why people will not be awakened by

"The effects is too clear." Said the Captian. And the area affected is now much larger than known at first. If other icities have not suffered severely there is reason to fear that their turn will come, nor is it by any means certain that corresponding war disasters have not occured elsewhere without our knowledge or may soon followed throughout Angellnia, or parts of Abbieannia. In the presence of such war made forces it may seem we are just now helpless and we can only prepare to relieve the sufferers as speedily as poss possible, and pray to God to aid us in finding out the right cause of the catastrophes ad and and find remi remendies to avert them if they are caused by the enemy. If they are natural disturbances as at first feared then nothing can be done and we must be resigned. But even now such steps as may be possible in looking to the relief of the sufferers of the disaster still continues, and representives are again and again being sent in every locality possible for the purpose of gathering exact information regarding the fate of friends and relatives living elsewhere.

Ever since the disaster unspeakable horror anh anguish and desperation has resulted from the inability to obtain news from any part of the disaster region because all communications are severed with the whole nation. Without hope that the number of victims has been over estimated, there is is ever the feeling that the apparently impossible has happened. The suspense had resulted in the prostration of countless worse women and men whose relatives are believed to have perished either from the shocks of the explosions or the flood. It seems that it was impossible for any to have escaped from the places more nearer the blasts as they were all caught asleep. Neither do they understand how the big city of Abbieann could be so totally destroyed while other places as near escaped only partially damaged. For all of the people it is atterly hard to rob themselves of the only hope that is left them. Still it is useless for them to take to themselves what reason teaches may be a delusion. If Abbicann has been totally destroyed, as has been di desdescribed by the dispatches, then there remains nothing to hope for All of the other cities around and near Abbieann must have been destroyed by theceame blasts, that wiped out the main city of Abbleann. Adeleheidi lies closest to the explosion that tore down Abbleann, and she too was wiped out. It has been impossible for any one throughout our country to fully realize the most terrible calamity that has befallen Calverinia. Ij In those cities and towns destroyed by the wholesale disaster many are dead, who had friends and relatives in safer districts. Therefore every body could worry. I know of two friends who left their parents in Adeleheidi. The parents were nevertheard from At first most of the population 508 g escool they were all stunned, too stunned to act, but now the h whole nation knows the full extent of the loss, and have been doing what they could to lessen the effects of the blow. There are about fourty five families in Angelinia Agathia who came f from Abbieann. All are fairly well to do. Their relatives remained b hind. Steps have been taken to give such aid to these suddened ones us can be possible. I sir want to correct the impression that prevails here that warning was given by the disaster coming by volcanic disturbances of Mt Calverine. We had letters from many friends who are now dead that no such a thing as a disaster was impending. In none of the letters is mention made of a threatened activity of any volcances in any vinicity, and Mt Calverine was quiet. The volcano is always giving warning and if it threatened to erupt the people would have recognized their danger had the volcano given such warnings as I have seen asserted in some wild news. Yet for a time all accounts g agree that clouds of smoke from Mt Calverine filled the air five or six days bedore the disaster. This disaster at Abbieann because of its size, and of the unusual flood resulting from it brought the whole world to pay it instant attention when the news spread broadcast. It indeed was a disaster so appalling, and so ernormous in magnitude that it can be destined to be remembered by the world forever. and may have appalled the very beings of heaven.

When the war was young there were notable warnings given by the enemy, that they could start surprising disasters. As the war progressed, the vigor of the horror and conflicts, and all kinds of war disturbances increased, the noise of the war and battles became more and more violent, some battles were audible ten miles distant,, even t e twenty and thiery miles distant, and still battles raged fiercer and waxed louder. and the great thunders of the battles of medernine and Evangeline St clairs astonished the inhabitants that dwelt over an area for a hundred miles from the scene. And the forest fires have for months caused this pall of darkness that continually hang over the skies. Now has occured this supposed frightful convulc convulsion, which tore away a large part of the country, destroyed Abbi ann and otherwrities, and started an ernormous flood. In this this final effort all records of explosions ever known to man, even of volcances have been completely broken.

The noise was plainly heard at Calverine, two hundred and fifty miles away. where weaker houses crashed, windows all went out of every building, houses of all kinds trembled, and the windows rattled as if heavy artillery was being discharged in the streets of the city. It certainly startled the inhabitants of Angelinia Agathia, and shook a number of the buildings there to ruin. The ears of dwellers in the neighboring states recieved a considerable shock. The sonorous waves rolled over the two coasts of Calverinia, the they were heard and feltbon the shores of Angelinia. Angeline wine was not too far south, nor was Abyssinkile too far northward.

Evidence of the great explosion were seen in the country and elsewhere, the air waves spreading all over the world. It also taught lessons that the enemy can do this and worse. Before the occurance no one had the slightest a idea that such a catastrophe could occur. And because of forest fires, the newspapers in Abbieannia and her other states were full of accounts of strange appearance in the heavens probably produced by the smoke. These came from Mic-Hollester in Abbieannia, Concentinia, southern Angelinia, Domdobia Tripodgonlia and other places. All had the same tale to tell. All thesec these phenomena were due to the smoke of forest fires.

There was strange glories of the ordinary sunsets which was enchanced by the splendor which has dwelt in the memory of all those who might have been permitted to see it. while calverinia lay in twe twilight darkness for months. The smoke of the awful firs produced this.

combantilable substance was destroyed.... I was told that even bodies of animals such as horsen, mules and the like full of mi moisture glowed for a while and then remained charred and melencholy wrocks. Every other combastible thing beined to ashes. Therefore for all this time since the horror broke out bodies of all victims is amid the heave of once smouldering ruins. That was all. That Abbleann and the strips of river country north and northwest were devastated in an instant, was due even the to even the first outbreak of the explosions, though the direction of the winds, and the forest lines raging where the explosions occured had quite a good deal to do with it all. In on way therefore it is probably sure how one can understand, the extreme sustern part of Abbleann, where the other people were also in bed, escaped annihilation though it too must have suffered, pocks and dust and all kinds of ground debris and and water fell upon that section, do b do no doubt g doing a rest deal of harm but, did not destroy it, for it was too far off from the main blasts. Il the windows went out, from the concussion and only the tallest buildings were thrown down. For many days after this most awful of blasts, floods occured that were never heurd of before. Tet I heard that the erupted matericals thrown by the series of terrific explosions, filled the ravines, and was hursed down upon river courses, also doing great destruction later man right-out in even a few seconds.... where the floods had not touched all the ravines, and was hurled down upon river courses, also doing great destruction the ravines, and was natised over the ravines and some chance at least to escape.

"That seems stranger yet." said the Scientist. "I am almost believed or forced to believe that volcanism had something to do with it." I cannot quality to save my life "Evidence so far seems that" admitted starring. "I cannot quality to save my life over a plotting could be so ernormous, and if so what caused it. Those who believe the disaster was caused by explosions believe the forest fires exploded ernormous. munition galleries placed to hide the muntion stores from the enemy. Tet the many Abbiesnn ian and other news papers printed just the w few weeks after the great calamity, and Iam and other news papers printed just the w few weeks after the great calamity, and recieved in other parts of the country a month after the catastrophe, had served to rive a graphic picture of the situation in calverinia as it was after the horror before the outer world knew anything of the dangerous occurence. o many in our country and the thousands upon thousands of letters written and mailed tomoor correspondents after after those fatal days, and the printings in magazines and all other books and so forth wo ow the clear idea of what had been going on. Calverinia is desoluted. It is blumed on landelinia whether however the disasters were of natural occurances is to be investigated."

While they were thus talking, dense volumes of smoke appeared in the straight north and new flames could be seen the strange rumpling noises, gome of grarings followers were thrown into great consternation by these sights, and the strange sounds, and were thrown into great consternation by these sights, and the strange sounds, and especially again by the darkening of the day by volumes of thicker smoke. There was an exodus from all over the district. The starring whenever the smoke which is issued as if in a fog, and all the newer country side was we wrapped in the smoke which is issued from the configration. The greatest anxiety prevailed among the explorers, and they all were tempted to abandon the city altogether. The control was morning was passed thanks however to a sudden springing up of a westerly wind, and the situation appeared better at ten thiry thirty oclock, but as the presses died away at about moon, the fog began to come back again, and the whole ruins of the city presented a most dismal spect acusing Starring much alarm, and he wondered whether he should retreat from the city or remain through the night as he had planned.

Tward evening however although everything was not quite ise good the aspect was decidedly encouraging, the wind again freehened, and less excitement was visible among Starrings followers.

About seven colock one of the correspondents came back and reported that at noon that day a stream of fire had suddenly rushed up the southwestern slope of a ridge west of Abbieum north, and following the course of the River Esther, overwho med everything and boru burned overything in its path. Estates and buildings were destroyed by this fiery wave, which according to this reporter appeared to rise in seething flames to a height of the sloping mountains themselves. when the conflag in sections it mees to a neight of the stoping mountains themselves, when the conflags at the stoping mountains themselves, which is the stoping and had passed on it was found that the town of Bernies five mises from the ridge, and four fourty eight straight north e west of Abricann was wiped out by fire. The burning conflagration had only taken thirty with the first percieved it to reach this town, fifteen miles five minutes from the start. Along the left of the conflagration however a remarkable phenomenous from the start. Along the left of the conflagration however a remarkable phenomenous occured before the charges of wind. The sea of fire, was checked all along the front of its left wing for a system of three miles, but retransed its programs in smother occured before the changes of wind. The sea of fire, was checked all along the front of its left wing for a extent of three miles, but retraced its progress in another direction, and reached two other towns, creating a general panci panic, and the people there had made for the ravines was open spaces and for lakes for safty. Though the conflagration changed course again, without great damage done to the main forests in these localities, the panic continued intensified by terrible detonations from somewhere, accompanied by dense emissions of smoke and lurid flashescof flame, and starring wondered what it could make starring wondered what it could mean.

Starring believed among these refugees the mental strain was becoming unendureable, and he wished he could help them but by his own side, the way was unapproachable. . He at first decided to nont a wireless telegram to Pandora and near by places imploring that atcumers be chartered to bring away the terrified people from this region, but an there could be no means of boats coming here those who had agree to accompanied him, suggested to have the reference brought to north Abbleann where they would be sheltered for the time being. Btarring however feared the city itself was in danger, and not then wishing to give many details of events immediately following the diseater, he decided to try this if it was possible to get to them. The whole ruined city as far as possible was lit up by the flames from this new paer part of the conflagration, everything covered with smoke and he said to the head scientist.

Abbiecan had been preposed, as a starving intentions of making an expedition for pastern and the billates and forcet like plains there were many large and itminuous sections, end commatimes there accured a terrible section of air which seemed to try and drag him and his followers irrestibly twend the danger zone in spite of all their resistance, symmtimes terrific sheets of flows, could be seen sweeping up, and then to disappear in the cloude of make. The following morning there was still complete darkness, caused by the dense volumes of smore, and the entire country adds around Abbicann was being

In the clords of smoke. The following morning there was still complete darkness, caused by the dense volumes of smoke, and the entire country side around Abelenan was being turned into a chaotic waste. All the trees of the forests were coing, with the approach of light however, he saw that the outlines of the caction of the city he new was in importectly remained. Indeed the streng tends of deorie, was such that the ourse of streets could not be followed. Yetbin Yet in spite of the horrible surroundings, and the universal wave of fire that threatened what remained of the city, tarring decided to examine the content of the remaining houses if there were any. As soon so it was possible, he first in coming across some of them examined the bodies of some of the victims burned to a crisp. Ethrain along the river shore others of his followers would watch for an opening, then land end start their own explorations, so Starring surripe he exactly come across the tower and clock, which has stopped at the exact hour of the disaster.

The clock had stopped at exactly one minutes after one. Starring said to one of the ment.

"It is now known by this that at one minute, there is y this hoge and beautiful city smiling in the late earling night, that in another it was a sea of crashing rimbling run and a mass of swiring figures and waters, with every soul of the eight million writhing in the throse of douth. The evening before no doubt all its church balls were ringing joyful chimes in the cars of Abblesanius twenty million people, the Che wait of nightly breezes flower expensions a horrible requiem for eight million dead...

Che wait of nightly breezes flower expensions a partie and dones, over facades suches and rects, and engles and through the streets of a populous and light hearted city, the L next swept a lone mang of either white hot ruins or upon a sea of water city, the Linext empt a lone mane of either white hot ruins or upon a sea or water there the city had atood. The sun trying to shine through a smoke haze, first glistened one moment on sparkling fountains, on elevated railroads, green parks, and beautiful forcets, its next dim type chose on graing metal, blistered flows wrecked sw squares and tremendous forcet first, and avril floods.

One day the and the city was all light and color, all gayety and grave, the next its ruins locked as though they had been crusted over with a hundred centuries of solitice and allence."

on indeed Anotecn is a yest charmed house. Its surviving portions skirting on the southwestern end for nearly three or four leagues the rotton dirty wreckage strewn waters of what still remains of the fleed, and of Lake Angeline too, its smoking rules had become the smoking and dreadful funeral tyre of no one knows how many, not one who lived long snowsh to tell a story that will stand prime arrive, unfortened as that of other dreadful out mittee. Abolesann was as dead as formed it tells out the flood lay fathoms deep in a tomb made in the twink line of an eye by the collaspe of their homes, and sealed forever under tons of explosion thrown wrackage, m.d., availables of sand rock dirt, and a harricane of all other debris.

And near the entombod city, the forest fires as from a world of volumoes poured its ctinking smokes in long walls of curling wreaths and funtastic rolls, that mounted thousands of feet aloft. uch was the disaster onlich burst upon the hapless people of pengal state, while almost at the same moment a sister State, Angelinia, was suffering from a kindred fate. These two states underwent the chock of natures assault and sank in grid before a begree retials a world.

Look at this once word re-clad hillside about fourty miles yonder, in the shade of whose sheltering trees, people had built even their summer resorts, or found their innocent pleasures Now this shadowing hill looks like a fiery vent, and the whole world seems aflame. If we do not succeed in our work, what will Clandelinia do next, for I KNOWnhe is responsible."

"It is hard to tell" said one of the scientists. "Since the war started Calycrinia is no strangers to destructive effects of the contest. Many other cities are threatened with destruction. A part of Calyerine was practically destroyed over two years ago by a great hur icame of fire that swept whole blocks away. If we do not succeed why not beg help of God on bended knees."

This they did.

This they did.

"DOESA any one know for positive what time the explosions really occured.fffff"" aked one of the scientist,

"Ucculd not tell for sure." declared starring. "I know I was not there at that dreadful time. But Ameline, these told me, too bud she is not with me just now, having left her on the beat that at about two minutes after one the explosives bunds their bounds and bors the terrible destruction to the ill fated city, she told me the first ten minutes of the shocks were not hardly bud at all, only tumbling down the highest build sections of the city was completely reduced into a hear of ruin, all that section being leveled to the ground, while the extreme sastern section u further seath, on the shore of lake angeline, sauk into the very lake, with a deatriction of they, on million people who were literally drowned in thi their beds. In the thore witnesses and that in the northern section within even a few seconds four million there were killed either in the wreak of the houses or singed by clouds of flume, and the ruins and streats of northern Abbleson were heaped with dead bodies, soon to be inconented in the coni conflagrations that were to follow, within ten minutes the northern section of the burning forests by the explosions, though for many hours the influench a portions of burning forests by the explosions, though for many hours the influence nortions of the city continued to burn untill all was consumed that gould be while litter the lower sections in the west and south west was overwhelmed in the ernormous flood that resulted four hours afterwards...

That part of the city was no more. The dikes of Lake inselline was invoiced by the concussion, and the openings let loose a discharge or widers, which rolled we not the city angul line everything before it. This city as we see here was desired, not by forest fires, and not by showers of red hot rocks and java as many believed, but by the concussions of d explosions, and by one all consuming plant of suffacuting, heat and clouds of flame hurled from forest fires upon the northern end by the explosions.

Death, came to the inhabitants instantly even before they could get out of their beds, and it was not a matter of hours or minutes. It was a matter of seconds, and they did not even burn to death. The buildings crashed into sudden ruin while they were anleep, and those who did have a change to awaken and leap not of their beds, died by breathing flame, and their bodies were buried under wreckage or burned afterwards. It is not merely true that no person who did escape from their beds us the houses begun to crash anish into ruin lived long appush to either asgree the buildings gut into the streets, or lived long enough to steps there ascape in any kind, and those who may have succeeded in escaping into the streets perioned there. This fact air will go on record as the most actualing of all estaets perioned there. This fact eit will go on record as the most actualing of all estaets perioned there. This fact the feeling of a man lost on a dead world like the moon-the con. "The manner of the annihilation of this immense city or at least three quarters of it is more unique in the history of all worlds great disasters then any catastrophe known. What I wish to know why it is that the date measure section which we have not gone to yet has in the history of all worlds great disasters than any actastrophe known, what I wish to know why it is that the satreme eastern section which we have not gone to yet has been said to extirely e escape. I don't believe it. Pompeli, and Linbon, and sarthquake horrors of other cities has no parallel, and cities not destroyed by floods or blasts are viped out by the demoniac Red Plague, and other cities are buried. But where the extreme southeastern part of Abbieann once stood, Lake Angeline covers now. That part of the city has gone out of sight forever. The half dead yielms brought says by boats from 111 fated shipping in the harbor of the city, talked of a hartigape of flame that had come non them, bud it is my opi opinion that the northern part of Abbieann almost recieved a visitation something like t at Pierre on Martinquie but of a hundred times

I can't understand this general, and it seems a dreadful miragle for a dissater of this time. The phrases of witnesses and though who escapee escaped with their lives was no figure of speech, but a literal statement of what had necessary the wholes to be lying in the streets, or rather on the ground where streets once were, for refore they arrived it was impossible in all places to trace the line between streets and building sites, they were surprised to see nothing of Abbieum, but togs of smoke, large stretches or swiftly moving waters, and forest lires in the east. The only place them that could be approached was northeastern Abbieum and worthern parts too which were on too high an elsystion to be reached by the torrents. Heavy of the victims were killed so suddenly that the expressions on their faces did not die by burning, though to the lines of agony or of fear. That surely proves they did not die by burning, though greater volume. were killed so suddenly that the expressions on their fuces did not have time to change to the lines of agony or of fear. That surely proves they did not die by burning, though scores of thousands of the bodies had been found charred, and half consumed, and they sure were not sufficiently for suffocition is slow and miserable. It can only mean that they were killed in the wreckage of their homes while saleep, or those who did scrape out into the stream means for them that the bath of burning fumes into which the northern parts of the city was plunged affected the victims like a terribly virulent posion when the first whiff of the heatened fire gases entered their lungs...

"Your statement seems strupse" said Starring."I have you see the that that wo the victims were found and at the vine in the streets who had died, with their hands to their noses and mouths. Yet it might be probable that that one motion of the arm was probably the only one that they made pefore death took them. Others were found who had fallen on their faces, and died with their noises noges and dies pressed into the noses and ips pressed into the outoith.

There was even no time for any one to rum, perhaps they did not have a single moments time to even any our, or to even breathe a prayer. It was as if northern Abbleaun had been just dipped into hell and then set out to cool. Despite the ravaging explosions, and resultant floods the for a forest fire in the east went burning on ... but that no longer made any difference... In the three quarters of the western section of the city all and the heat and smoke was reduced sufficiently to encourage a second and closer examination of the neurest explosion crater itself, or the area immediately surrounding it. Even after a few days of apparent retreating, another change in the direction direction of the wind might follow, so that an approach to the crater surrounded by andangered woods was attended with the watmost pril peril. Nevertheless Starring accompanied this time by only two daring scientists risked their lives to visit the place of greatest interest, and greatest horror to Abbiesam. It was about fourty miles from Abbiesam a little east by north, and going on horseback it took about nearly a day to get there. But he reached there and locked down into the huge crater. Here he spent three hours taking some observations of the wreckage of ground and stone all around it. He never saw a volcanic crater as big as this one. The opening of the cruter itself wan is a wast quir queerly shaped hole about five thousand yards wide, and nearly twice as long. This time there was nothing exciting to happen except that once in a while when a little brease sprang p smoke came down from some of the fires as to threaten his vison and make it hard for breathing, one particularly thick cloud away by no that he could not see his hand before his face. This finally caused him again to give up his study and observations, but he learned as he had suspected that this was no volcanic crater, it had no such formation, the debris was only of ground and abone, and no lavas of any kind. He also made the important discovery that about twelve miles northwest, was the crater he had examined first, and though smaller was nonenly of the same formation, and that the blast had hurled the same debris, and also of a nw phenomenon. Materials seen in caverus was scattered over the ground.

My also had been thrown up in high coordines, and the sends of a quick sand bog had been accettered over the territtry territory.

Sharring however waited within the smoke would be dispersed, and then again stood on the edge of the crater, and looked down on the appearance of and then again stood on the edge of the crater, and looked down on the appearance of and looked by a black bottomless chaem or crevises with perpondicular waits disappearing into the darkness below. They could not see bottom and wondered if it went down into a cavern or one of the explosion galleries. A part of the chaem opened out tward Abbieann but the ennounce column of smoke cut off the view in that direction. There were hundreds of large cracks in the pround all about then each about a foot or sometimes three feet wide. There were crusts of mulbogs all about, but they saw no debris that would tell of a volcamic cruption. The whole cast field of debris consisted of dirt, mud, hule piles of gigantic rook fragments and every footstep dislodged mud and stones, and their footing was most inxecure. Insecure. There were also clouds of sulphurlous smoke, though which the wind tore at intervals. The scene was the most terrifying of all, and gave an idea to Btarring of the force of one of the explosions. And yet he knew he had not seen the craters of the most violent of the explosions.

The trip to this crater was ever a long and rough passage, covered with all kinds of debris, tangled fore forests, and even bogs. Even in the forests were were there were hundreds of small holes and cracks all about the travelers and they had to step or k jump over many of them. And as they proceeded there were terrifying gorges full of hot burned forest debris on each side of them. Alls they proceeded there were terrifying gorges full of hot burned forest debris on each side of them. Alls they remained a few days near the explosion crater, they went to what was left of Velto Plantation, ten miles away and their position there too was dangerous. They followed an old surviving road to the point where the forest fire tornado had swept across it, and from there they followed down the track of the tornado.

The spectacle was tryely appalling here. There were number ease sucking tree tranks on every side, and the bround debris was still here in many places. Il around were masses of yellow mud colored smoke, Starring knew now that this was a part of the the passage of the forest fire horror. Fe far away he heard many fearful detonations and saw hage columns of black so smoke, alive with all kinds of flashes rise into the the air to the heigh of a mile and three quarters. Starring soon abandoned the region for fear of he or his followers becoming overcome by the heat, and on the return had a wonderful view into the awful smoking granier valley, which though only amouldering now wan like a tromendous seething gorge of awful volcanic activity. They tried to take a good look at this valley but it was lake looking down into a white hot smoking furnace, and they noarly lost each other in the dende smoke clouds, nowever they planted a record stake at the highest point they reached hear the edge of this valley on which they inor inscribed their names. Later Starring first returned to the northern subburb of the fragment of Abbleaun, and later in the evening some of the scientists came back from their splendid trip to reach the rim of the explosion crater. One of them said he and his companions had been enveloped in smoke clouds, and that they therefore by the heat, and enother by the smoke, and the others became exhausted and suffered immonsely from thirst. They had not reached the crater. On them was almost prostated to mean the return of black and white smoke rose from the forest to a height estimated at twenty miles in big puffs and immense rolls, finally spreading rapidly into a big mushroom shaped cloud, which under all the others became exhausted and suffered at twenty miles and fourty miles. It was fourty miles away, and seemed as near as five

The new spectacle indeed was most impressive, and the region was now shrouded in intense gloom, like that which posselly accompanies a total solispe of the sun. The cause of such a spread and increase of the forest fired was imexplicable. Thus it was that the efforts of starring so far, because of the continued threat of danger, seemed to offer no promish of success or conclusion...

"A thrail of the blackest despair is cast over this whole unhappy country" said starring. This whole region of Chiverinia is one whole vast tomb. Of Abbievanias best people millions are slain, and the Angel of Death int enticed by "Lundelinia has spread his pall over this section of calverinia, a flery sea is smithing her forests and the entire countryside is falling like stubble before the sweep of flame. Scores of big and beautiful cities are deed. A land is desolate, A world is grief stricken and angry. And I cannot yet make a single discovery. For the love of make what was the cause of the awful power of evil that robbed of life over fifty mill on people in this great disaster, in cities, and neighboring towns and villiages by explosion fire and flood.

Calverinia and the whole, of Abbieannia. It cannot however be proved as yet whe her whether the fires had been responsible for the great explosion disaster us many said, nowe however near east of Abbieann the horizon line had been wearing its strange smake cap for weeks before the great horror came, but there was nothing untill the last of hay to indicate that there was even the slightest danger. On that day a stream of fire burst from the slopes of some distant hills—and roared up the valley overwhelming towns and hamlets. A commission was appointed by the governer to investigate the outbreak, and it returned a reasona reasonable report on the afternoon of the 29th of May. But yet no one prooves that the explosions came from the fire sweeping over anything explosive. Of source many ere eye withnesses did report that they awe a cloud of fire rushing down on Adeleheidi and across the Arronburgs hum, striking the town of Ilall which had a population of seven thousand, and thence to Palos which had a population of 10,000 burning everything it in its pah path. But the explosions occured far from the fires.

Throughout the next day however for starring, the heat in the vinicity of the city of Adeleheid which he now was approaching was so intense, and the distant flames so carremitting that it was impossible vto approach the town during the early part of the day. As evening approach starring, and members of his men after a heroic battle with the heat, suffocation and smoke fumes, succeeded in making a dash for the town nearing the land close enough to enable him to see that the town was wiped out by fire and no one was there. Ade lehe id i now was an absolute smoking wasts, all the ruins being consumed. The surviving inhabitants of this city had been panic stricken, the morning the forest fire came up, when the sky suddenly blackened at first, and it became as dark as a thunderstorms approach. The people had been recued by river boats, and taken off just as the fire came up, and yet the rescuers seemed almost surrounded by raging fires as they worked, they were nearly roasted to death in their efforts, and expected momentarily to be engulfed before they saved all. The scene before starring was that the seas of flames still continued to pour up the sides of the distant hills,, slowly engulfing the whole north side within his view, while fresh and new fires were starting elsewhere....

What really had starring worried, was that though even now this is August, and it has been nearly three months sin on the disaster occured, no full word had reached the me main ational Headquarters, or Emperor Vivian regarding full conditions in the unful disaster zone. Even in many places underground cable communications had been interrupted and that accounts for the fact that maperor Vivian has not even heard from his brother, or any news whatever of the progress of the war and out the battles were turning out... Therefore the situation throughout the nation was astounding.

That the whole region through which _tarring was now traveling down the river had or was falling a victim to the direful visitation of forest fires, that desolated so much country was evidenced by his i night seeing tour. Ernormous columns of smoke rose majestically many miles high and expanded into wonderful shapes, resembling e emormous cauliflowers, gigantic wheels, and beautiful flower forms, all stronked lower down with with vivid flashes of fire, aweing the beholder, and im ressing the mind with fear noises that made starring suspect blasting by ran rangers grew louder continually, and the thunderous noises were heard a long distance. A toud explosion from somewhere occured, and a great cloud ascended, and bust apart..It seemed cas if the conflagration labored to burn the country up in no time, and greater noise following united in one continuous roar, all that time accompanied now with fog, and darkness, creating a feeling of fear and ans anxious suspense. He came to z a spot where the ejection of explosion debris covered the ground in some places two feet deep. The force of the explosion destroyed several districta in this region. All the people had fied, the smaller streams were dried up, and there was no one around to talk to or que question. Great physicalchanges have taken place in the neighborhood of Adeleheidi. Several districts have not yet been heard from, and the scene of the nearest explosion area was still unapproachable. Starring knew the situation here, and how every hour had brought sadder and sadder news, and how doctors and nurses had been overworked. Even now the public mind ras still unsettled fearing further disaster. Among the deaths in deleheld were many whole families. Starring heard that when the first relief parties ventured into the streets of deleheidi they found many corspes still lying unburied. The dead w r were to be interred in trenches. After the crash it was not expected even here that any survivors would be found, and hardly there had been no disappintment of the mournful reports that had been given out. All the earlier stories of the greatness of the disaster w r worked by the explosions have been verified. Not a building remained standing, and much of the ruins were consumed by fire. wen along the way from Adel wheidi during the slow trip the desolation baffles all description. go far piles of dend in the vinicity of big churches and Cathedrals told a likely story of the attempt to find safty and refugevin the great structures of worship. Men women and children panic stricken at the first crack of the cataclysm rushed from their falling houses and turned in their moment of depair even for open spaces and were overcome before they could even reach the streets. Bo far Starrings search among the ruins had been hindered by the fires that were still raging, and he for a time had been in great danger. In this city eve y form of life had been destroyed.

through a forest fire, and rescued eighteen fire refugees saved from a burning vessel. .The captian attempted to force his bay down further but was compelled to give up the attempt owing to the ints intensechear and smoke which n hing over the scene in a dense cloud. He did get close enough to see that the fire was branching off here. Numerous half burned bodies were observed by the river shored by gtarring, but nos were picked Nothing new concerning the original disaster has even nowcyet been learned because of all the communications that were and still were desteoyed and not repaired. It is known that twenty eight b vessels were in the harbo o harbor of little Heldi h when destruction descended upon that city. These included fourteen for ign vessels. All were destroyed simuntaneously being swift swept by the "great explosion horror and the cloud of flamk dflaming nowder smoke and sank at anchor. One ship would have escaped had the explosion come only a few minutes later. The ships anchor had been lifted. and the engine ulready was going when the vessel was overwhelmed. The waters of the very flood resulted was transerred or transformed into a steaming cauldron by the heat of the forest fires into which the sailors sprang crazed by their sufferings. All on board the ships were said to have lost their lives......

From St John have been recieved meagre reports of the disaster in that thty city. First varning of dangerous forests fires had been give on May the Io Ioth. All that day disaster seemed to fill the air. Because of the smoke of the fires the skies were heavily overcast for two months deep strange thunder at a distance was almost incessent, while at night the region was lighted up by the red glare of the conflagration. From the fires came mutterings that sent panic to the hearts of all the inhabitants of that city. Wrarer Nearer came the conflagration and the smoke rose in hige columns and rolled up walls, and darkness and smoke fog prevaded the air... Two days after it was as dark as midnight.

The towns of sichmondi and parklin Grove were destroyed. St john seemed to be threatened and fear was mon all, the The fires did not cease to threaten the town of St .ohn untill near the end of May. The smoke continued to shroud the cityband the people had to keep wet cloths about their mouths, and the heat had been almost unbearable. platinct reports like those of great cannons were continually heard from the direction of the forest fires. The sky continued to lower, untill darkness was absolute absolute. The heat and smoke fog made it almost impossible to live out in the open. Then came the distant crash of horror and St john seemed to have fallen into the earth. No one survivorssurvived.

Starring soon reached the hilly portion of the region where he could see with the help of his classes were still covered with refugees, to the number of many thousands, who were being taken care of gradually. Some were preparing to move away for fear the fires would come there also. Starring learned provisions were being conveyed to them daily.. Of many persons rescued from the fires the mahority were fearfully burned, and a hundred had died on their way to the hospital. The captian in looking on the scene said to gtarring who was standing alongeide-

"We have believed from the information recieved here from the region of Abbieann that the disaster has surpassed all that imagination can ever concieve. All the country is laid to waste us you see with your own syes, when we reach Abbieann we can look about a bit and see if we can find traces of the city."

Statt starring soon reached the city of St John, and conducted a conducted a search there. He came back reporting to the captian that the town was a heap of charred ruins, under which the victims may still lie buried. Starring was able to take some of the evidence on the sto ship but he could not proceed far inside the cit city on account of the stench of dead bodies. The forest fires near by still had a threatening aspect, for flashes of flame frequently were observed through the distant smoke clouds, and he was afraid to proceed much further. Here Starring learned from some dispatches that the Mayor of this city, and his whole family were dead. The citys post office was burned to ashes, and there was no trace of the citys banks. nd the .And the waves of fire were still reported to be moving nortward. Th y They extended now even to La Calso. As the ship proceeded on, they encountered five small boats loaded with refugees from El Torrio, who came up within eight and were in a pitable condition. They reported that seven other boats left the region of a fire at the same time but it is not known what had become of them . They reported that many persons were drowned while crossing the Mic-Hollester Rum from the path of the fires, where some of the towns were overwhelmed. The fires continued, and was progressing northward, and the whole region was being a waste of desolation being denuded of vegetation. These also told the captian and starring that over two hundred deathe had occured owing to the numbers trapped in the fire. Definite news however was lacking. Yet many osatestates were destroyed, and the fire was visible for a long distunce, and huge smoke clouds were blown westward. Great districe prevailed throughout the country, and at St Album where there were many injured persons. It was believed that about from five to six hundred persons had lost their lives at rittle St wincent. This number was greatly increased afterwards. The majority of the corpses were will still umburied. Therefore great tension prevailed everywhere throughout elverima.

STARRING FINDS THAT WICKEY LAUSIN HIS FIRST STOP HEAREST THE EXPLOSION SCENE, HAD BEEDLA HEAP OF SMOKING RUINS.. HE HEARS HOW THE STREETS WERE FILLED WITH CHARRED BODIES LARGE PORTIONS OF THE CITY WAS ENGULFED WITH FLOOD WATERS. HE SEES THAT THE CITY OF ST VINCENT DE PAIL WAS ALSO DEVASTATED..... STILL STRIVING FOR HELIEF FOR THE SUFFERERS.

The outbreak of so many disasters in the state of Calverinia, and other places, had been as gtarring knew preceded by strange and sudden earthquakes particualrly o in the southern part of calverinia, for a period of many months or nearly a year before the great abbisann horror... Yet for weeks and months before this in all parts of southern and southeastern Calverinia record breaking forest fires had been raging throwing up dense clouds of smoke of over a surface of land for hundreds of miles followed at night by flames that lighted the sky and could bee seen at a distance of three hundred miles.. This was succeeded by windstorms of poculiar type hot and strong, which covered the desky over nearly the whole country as thick as with thunder clouds with ke smoke and shut out thesun from view. and kept the whole country for days and day s in continual twilight darkness.

On the fourt gunday of the month of May 1913, date not stated here, as stated a an ernormous stream of wildly racing fire nearles across the grouburgs run with incredible rapidity, reaching the main forests, according to one report, and speeding a distance of fourty miles in less than fifteen minutes, some say in three minutes. This fire then swept away forest plantations, towns, cattle and residents, and covered the whole section in a sea of flames. The flames were forced onward by gale in a great wave, and this had caused a great panic among the inhabatiants of many towns in its path many fleeing to open spaces to the lakes, or to the shores of big and wide rivers. Therefore at the time the fire was speeding oust of Abbieann, the climax of all disasters was reached on the early morning of June the First, when the explosions occured destroying everything in its way. A loud explosion in the direction of Adele-HeidI occured simultaeously, and a dense rain of debris of all kinds fell which covered the country side. Then there camea fresh outbreak of floods, and no one yet knows the real loss of lives of r or of property. During the trip the ship soon reached the city of Wickey Lansin. Here Starring and Angeline miches went alone to investigate, and were told by the survivors they met how searching parties had found dead persons in the attitude of life.

About a hundred thousand lost their lives here. And there was not a building that had not been destroyed, and the ruins had burned for days. Heart rending scenes had followed the announcementds of the bodies recognized. The fires had continued for three weeks even though the greater part of it had been affected badly by the flood. Calverine, Pandora, Francis Atlanta, and other places had been full of refugees from all over the northern district of the disaster zone. The city was hardly even repaired and even now the survivors were too discouraged, too disheartened to rebuild their ruins for fear the enemy may start some other disaster and shakecdown everything again. Most of the surviving inhabitants were mwomen, and when Starring asked the reason, he recieved the answer " most of the men folk have gone to join the army."

The most ergent appeals had been sent to neighboring places but it took a long time before these appeals were answered. Heavy hearted Starring continued on and soon reached Bt Vincent De Paul city. Here he had a close up view of the gigantic forest fires once again. The scene before him was as if a long line of volcances many miles in extent were in full eruption. Columns of dense clouds rolled high into the sky going many miles high in fantastic rolls with immense sheets and tongues of flame.

The city of Altrone was reported safe as long as the conflagration continues northeastward, but a large area of forests north of St Vincent was in flames, and it was impossible to estimate the ammount of dd destruction.

The city of St Vincent as Starring observed was both shocked by the explosion and badly ravaged by the floods. A great area around her had been desolated. Famine even now continued to add its horrors to the situation. And day by day sin ce the disaster occured the inhabitants were continuing to flock into northern cities, and all are still panic stricken-rood from rations recieved was becoming scarce, and supply depots are under military guard. Atarring saw that nothing could avery the terrible suffering not even the arival of more provision ships. The situation was made far worse because Abbieann had ever served as the storehouse of the entire state. All kinds of reserve supplies had been kept there, and with the complete destf destruction of that city starvation sure became an immediate menance for all in the disaster area.

Ever since the disaster Pandora had been little more that a great military post, so that it was now mable to fi give more than shelter to the refugees. The fury of the distant forest fires, the dread of more explosion disasters and floods, have served to keep those in Calverine and pandora in constant terror, though no actual damagechad been known to have been done in the former. Thee steamer with Starring and his followers again on board, carried them safe down the river and stories being recieved from Heidi Janction, but when the news came of Abbieann and her fate, and then the dreadful flood, the nation was appalled.

In no land h wherever found, during all historical times no comvulsion of nature in reality comparable to the Calverinia catyolysm has occured, never to compare with the series of explosive and seismic disturbances which ended in June 1913 in the destruction of one qua ter of calverinia by flood, when an unknown number of lives were lost. Never before in calverinia had there been any violent commotion in any part of the Abbieann land, and the disaster thus described was the most appalling because of the sixideness of which it came. Indeed the awful suddeness of the overwhelming catastrophe throughout southern and Middle Calverinia gives it a fair overwhelming pre-eminence among the great catastrophes of the war, and all history too to compare with. The tremendous convulsion of nature produced by the explosions, and that produced the ruin with such marvelous swiftness, proves that the enemy is dangerous beyond compare. The destruction of Abbieann and her neighbors came without prec premonition, as to make escape impossible for the millions of inhabitants of the city, and other cities and towns.

Of course, what made Starving laugh at the first reports of the disaster, is because he knows the earliest reports of great calamities are often greatly exaggerated, but in this instance it does not appear as yet even now, though Its late in August that the first estimate of the believed loss of life was overdrawn nor the total destruction to property either, nor the fiercess of explosions an and shock. Therefore he kno s knows 1 it iscertain that nothing that appeals to human pity was lacking in this most apalling crisis. The immeasureable tragedy, had aroused the sure sympathy of the world, and effaced national boundaries for nothing that afficts humanity thus so aswfully

Starring said; Danger always hovers over the cities that lie in the path of the enemys destructive hands . Those who live in these cities must either face the perils or flee for pafty. Yet local attatchment is so strong with most men that they will p brave great perils from so dangerous an enemy like Glandelinia rather than flee to a safer location. The surviving people were working hard to restore as far as possible the city of Heidi Junction a ter the first flood ravages it suffered and were still living in it a few month; months after before it was finally overwhelmed by this great disaster, No comment o can color inmore sombre hues the frequent news disputches portraying the awful scenes and incidents that accompanied the destfu destruction of Abbieann, and that laid waste a large portion of Calverinia, The flood was also a serious event. All vegetation for hundreds of miles have been destrayed, that still now hundreds of thousands are said to be perishing from o want of water and food, and famine and plagues exist. Towns and villiages every day now even are engulfed in flames from the forest fires. The destruction according to the news recieved was of most amazing completeness over a quarter of Calverinia. G reat suffering still ensues even though aid is now reaching many and most of them are abandoning the region for safer locations and going where they can recieve aid. It will be necessary to supply them with foce for a long time and assist them to have new homes. In the face of such an unusually urgent call we should now give wings to our efforts since the flood has abated. If aid can reach them all it is best. We are helping the starving people of the other past difficulties and disasters, and we have now to aid these.

When news can be recieved from the interior of Calverinia it would probably be loarned how far extent the disaster might have been. Of course acording what Starring said to the Captian, it did appear to the whole world at first that whole ranges of volcances had blown up, and great eruptions came from the leveler surface of the country, because the disaster was so immense that it seemed impossible for it to come from unusual explosions. During the continuation of the trip the ship reached a p spot where in the distance according to people of a town by the river that in a valley a great avalanch of earth rocks and debris of all kinds came down a mountain side during the concussions of the explosions and overwhelmed over fifty nine villiages and one large town No one has been able to determine how many lives were actually lost by this slide but the total ran into the thousands. The concussion it is said sent 987,000,000 yards of rock and earth into the valley beneath. The aglanch travaled at the rate of one hundred miles an hour and was a hundred feet thick or deep Its widthwas from ten to fifty miles. The flames from the eruptions as we may call them had been seen for a distance of more than a hundred and fifty miles.

The noise of the loudest of these explosions was heard at Angelinia Agathia, 9,100 miles , distant. It was felt in Abbieannia 10,678 miles distant, and at many other place places , also throughout the whole states of Angelinia, Abyssinkile, Concentinia, Domdobia, and Angeline Vine . The loudest expl s explosions were said to have been heard over a sound zone covering one quarter of the earths surface. Even as Starring learned, sea waves were created by the ex: explosion along the sea shores of east and Western Calverinia, which was said to have destroyed all the towns and villiages on these shores, an all vessels and shipping there, and over a hundred thousand lives, raised a tidal wave at Angeline Junction, a hundred and eighty five feet high, covering a thousand square miles of land with a terrificflood, submerged into the bigger river a section of Abbieann the size of New York, submerged six river islands to a depth of fifty feet, sunk a whole country side, split thousands of miles of land into a million small and big fissures, and created the most ernormous fires and floods on record. Starring asked the Captian ;

"Is it likely as long as this war rages on, that are will be fur future disasters like this, ?" "It is almost certain there are sir."

"Some o in Calverinia?"

"Many in Calverinia." "Some in other Abbieannian states?"

"Undoubtedly."

The Gemini Leader Hendro Dargar's prediction that intelligence would sconer or later be recieved of the extent of the disaster; its results and so forth was fully verified as Starring in his sight seeing observed. Calverinia had been shaken badly from end to end by the supposed earthquakes produced by the explosions. The Captian said the shock had been felt aboard his ship, but it was not untill he made an exped ition to try and reach Abbieann that any one in cities and towns surviving had any idea of the seriousness of the situation in the stricken region. Acf According to Cablegrams recieved at Pandora, the first to know of the disaster, and reports heard elsewhere the dame was damage was indeed most immeasureably terrific and the loss equally as terrible. Even the nearest point qh which could be reached, and which was Little Heidi there was enough evidence of the frightful convulsion that had swept the land and left death and destruction in its path. The land all around Little Heid Heidi as Starring observed when he reached the place had been converted by the explos ion shocks into a chaoticcondition.

Trees were uprooted, and in the city not a single house was left standing. The river banks are se squeezed together, and the streets are fourty feet nearer than before. Even the bed of the biggest river gave up all kinds of junk. The railroad bridges across the river was telescoped by the contraction of the banks as Starring and all those with him saw, and the river wharf which was little Heidis Heidi's pride now stands as a sad monument to the explosion concussions ruthless strength, a mis mishapen mass of badly tangled wreck and angles. Further news of the concussion then reached Calverine further north, by a river cruiser which was at Heidi Junction at the time and left for Calverine barely in time to escape the flood . The officers of the ship had said that Little Heidi City was completely destroyed. Starring was told that at Heidi Junction the shocks were felt for about sixteen minutes, and houses of weaker construction were cracked and destroyed. Hundreds of persons had been buried innthe ruins and strick by the falling timbers and the stones. The loss of life was variously estimated at from four to six thousand in the city of Heidi Junction according to some reports published in Calverine, but some of the merchants engaged in business there said they had advices from the wrecked districts which placed the loss of life at from fifteen to thirty thousand. Since the first flood horror Heidi Junction had a population of one million five hundred thousand, and after only about seventy five thousand before this shock, which cout ravines in the fields and shock many of the houses to wreck. According to the stories in Calverine after confirmed the reports of the total destruction of Abbieunn and its environs and all shipping first by the rain of fire hurled by explosions, and then by flood, and gaid it was believed even up to this day that the whole population had been annihilated, with the exception of a few injured people rescued a few days later in the extreme southeastern section. Immediately advafter the recepit reciept of the above dispatch es, ctarring was surprised by recieving another disputch, from the town of Calverine sent by probably the Mayor, announcing that after the news of the catastrophe he had tried to reach Abbieann, but found the whole countryside covered with flowing waters. and the sky enveloped in smoky fog, and could not get nowhere near. He wrote that at the time the greatest construction prevailed in all localities in conse-q quences of supposed earthquakes and volcanic activity of the most violent kind burst ing from the ground itself. Loud noises were heard continuously for fifteen minutes early that morning which at first were believed to be severe and unusual volcanic action. 'e of course could get no real news for days because all telegraphic and telephone communication had been broken with all the disaster area. He was informed however two weeks after by some who came in a boat that the city of Abbieann had disappeared with all the people in it. Telegraphic communications with Angelinia Agathia was broken in every direction.

E He was informed that the disaster had extended that far, and that many thousands of people had been killed in Angelinia Agathia also. Starring felt almost discouraged. He realized now he was on a desperate undertaking. What worried him most was the still continued anxiety throughout the nation, of people in cities and towns who had friends and relatives in every one of the stricken sections, who for weeks and weeks passed in an agony of suspense and even now gar gave up hope as they did not hear whether their relatives were dead or alive. On One of these was a dear friend of Starrings who had been in the army for the beginning of the war. This was general Roswell Buster Johnston. This general was born in Abbisann, and lived there untill he entered the army. His mother, and two sisters, and his wife and four children continued to live in Abbieann, where Roswell only twice in the war was able to visit them. From one such visit he had just recently returned. That their fate has been the general could only imagine. wholly unfitted now for his allitary duties for a time he sat at his headquarters eagerly scanning the cable dispatches in the newspapers day in day out for weeks and weeks, trying to find a ray of hope from the doomed city. In the absence of dea details he found little encouragement.

"If the ruin was caused chid chiefly by a storm" said general Poswell "My family and all the others in the city would not have perished, and many would only have a thrill. My parents and even my wife and children and two sisters lived at almost the extreme southeastern section of the city beside the Arronburgs Run River, which is twenty miles north of take Selicia and Heidi Junction, which is known ad the as the Catholic City, and nicknamed Mt Zion for the unusually righteous conditions of every one in the i city. This section of the city lies about two hundred feet above the lowest level of the country. On the highest slopes of the northern town cluster seas of the most attractive buildings of the well to do residents of the city. If the greatest danger had been that of a windstorm which is a frequent visitation, all would have had a fair chance of escape as the buildings are windproof only a tornado being able to injure them, but I see that all of the dispatches describe the calamity as the shock from explosions like severest earthquakes, accompanied by the descent of a great mass of flaming debris, hot fumes and burning clouds hurled by the explosions which were mistaken for volcanic erupt o eruptions. The fact that all kinds of shipping lying anchored in the river parts of the city and on the suburbs were smothered and seared under the fiery showers thrown by the explosions leaves me little ground to hope that even those on the higher slopes could have saved their lives. Indeed as they were surely more nearer to the worst explosion their peril was tenfold greater. If the enemy is responsible I'll give no fee armies opposed to me quarter."

As Starring heard the present outburst of the horror around Abbieann, was at first believed to be apparently the cum culmination of a number of volcunic disturbances which have been unusually severe. So e some believed this to have happened, A giantic Giantic explosion of steam, gas and molten lave accompanied by a shower of red hot stones, and ashes erupted from the counts country side, which falling upon the city and shipping burned and buried them and that a large part of Abbieann was swallowed up by the earth opening up under it, and then the eruption caused the floods that followed. They said me eruption alone that night vomited such vast clouds of dust which darkened the sky for a whole night and day, and spread over the whole country side the darkness for a whole morning. They also stated that for z an eruption it has been the most peculiar and serious on e and the me most destru ctive the world had ever seen. Some claimed the Volcano called Mt Calverine which is south of Heidi Junction atabout a hundred miles, exploded like Krakatoa. The eruption was indeed a most fatal one in that countrys history even Krakatoa not equaling it. Investigations of that mountain showed proofs there had not been the slightest trace of activity.

MR. I. K. I DUNGSER

Even now sir though it is August the whole nation is still in ignorance of the efect effect of the disaster upon other sections of the country, because of the ruined communications. Because of that further disasters of such nature are apprehended, and fears are entertained that the whole nation yet may be affected."

"This is the way I heard of the disactor Captian" said Starring. "It was that beginning from one after twelve till nearly fifteen minutes after, a storm of fire, flying debrie, and a posionous cloud eveloped the city, and all country side around Abbicann.destroying everycity and town for scores of also miles, and that only out of Adeleheid were there any survivors. Even at Adeleheid I heard that one hundred and sixteen ships were sunk or burned an or shattered with all on board, including fourteen foriogn steamers. I could not get good nows however because all communication had been destroyed by disastors of the past, and therefore could get no communications for this either. But I recieved the information that many hundreds of thousands of people had been killed either by the concussion and falling buildings, or by the heat of the falling materials and singing clouds..."

"It was something like that # said the captian. "While I was in Pandora after giving my reports I waited for a time to learn results, and appeals were received by the city department from persons living in Calverine, who had relatives and interests in Abbieann that all river ships be immediately despatched to the region to render assistance. But no action could be taken even though seemer for us in the north than expected the full extent of the disacter was known, because the flood barred all approaches to Abbieunn and a steamer could not live in the torrent not even a big battleship."

The captian ordered his ship to steam forth for the region of Abbieann down the Arronburgs Rum River. The captian was Martinas Pietre. He wanted at first to telegraph to Pandora city, to the Mayor there, that he had a good bunch of investigators on board, coming to inspect the ruins of Abbeann but Starring acti advised him not to as all must for the present be kept secret. Communications with the whole country and the flooded area was still as badly cut off as when the disaster started, and starring knew no one had been able to communicate with any purt of the stricken regions, and therefore wondered how the people took care of themselves, or whether a general exedus of calverinia was starting because of the horrors of the past. According to all information he had recived recieved from many sources since the beginning of his adventure, a great many people, in wholesale numbers rather, had perished from the plague, hunger and privation, prequent battles of great severity were adding to the great losses.

When Starring reached the river harbor of this city he saw the ruens or remains of all the shipping that had been destroyed by fire, or aground. Far in the distance a nearer view of ravaging forest fires could be seen and it was as dark as a rainy day with the smoke in the sky. Here the commander of one of the ships partly destroyed had been ordered to return to Abbieann with all the speed possible, and to forward details of the disaster to the City Government there, which he speedily made efforts to obey, and here was his detail to Starring when questioned; made silores to obey, and here was his acceptant to Schwill state believed she had been "Gir all, can say is I never yet found Abbieanna! first believed she had been swallowed up by an ocean. The city must be still under the flood. I had first secured another ship from a town not ravaged, gone to Pandora for provisions and started for Abbieanna! traveled for adays and never found the city. I believe the Mayor of that city and four or five brave little child scout adventurers perished with the population. The concussion of the explosion sunk one part of the city into the riversoundings proved this to be true as many buildings are found under deep water. A forien A foriegn Ama Ambassador is said to have been at Abbieanna! I don't believe sir Starring, you will be able to locate Abbieanna! fear you and your investigators are making a wild goose chance. Might as well make a trip to the moi moon."

By this news Starring, sent respectfully some under river and ground cables messages to Pandora for hopeful vreports of whether there was anything left of Abbieann. He and the captian remained at Little Heidi while his crew worked to restore some communication with a cable to recieve answer fif possible. The earler report recieved notified gtarring that all wires were still broken down, between all points from Pandora to the Abbieann Territory, but it was gradually added that in view of reports that the cruption of the landscapes had wheel out all the city by shock fire and flood seemed to be a fact, and all boats available for the city which had been dispatched to the assistance of the place at the first news of the disaster, came back with the report that there was no such a thing as any location of Abbieann to be found only a sea of raging waters. The second dispatch Starring recieved,

A. 10 M

STARRING HEARS GRAPHIC ACCOUNTS OF THIS GREATEST OF DISASTERS, WHAT HE THINKS OF THE TRACEIV COMPLETED IN THE BRIEF SPACE OF FIFTEEN MINUTES. HE HEAPS OF THE PECENT CHOSET APPEALS FOR HELP.

" Starring said to Jennie Turmer as he continued to investigate the ruins of Warchann-"No such appalling disaster Jen, dis i distinguished by the suddeness of the tramendous blow, the number of the victims, the completeness of the desolation, the destruction of all communications, the wiping out of many cities and towns by fire. concussion and tremendous flood and landslides, has ever yet come to any part of the civilized world with such overwhelming and most harrowing force. Thy even the destruction of Pompeii is nothing compared to the ruin of this town here, and probably only by the flood. Look what is left of the abandoned town the refugees having mostly all left. Wreck of houses never belonging to the town. And here as I was told nearly fifty thousand souls sent to des ruction. Though all accounts agree that only a few minutes were required to everwhelm Abbieann and her neighborhood cities and towns with force and fiery cloudef explosion, consuming the entire population not of this city only but of a large section of the surrounding country, yet that is nothing com pared to the days and nights of unspeakable and immeasureable horror that the survivors of these flooded towns may have spent while the waters trapping them like rats rose high and higher every day. The first reports of the disaster were almost too incredible to be believed. That was why I laughed at it. But let's go on. Here's a ship. The sconer we can reach Abbieann or what is left of it the better."

The ship which was hailed by him and which stopped at a dock of Murchann was a Calverinian cruiser, which had left the city of Pandora the day before, for even nor relief work still continued, and on it were a large number of refugees. When Starring questioned the captian of the ship he confirmed the report that Abbieumn had been entirely destroyed that fatal night of June the First. Starring asked;

"Were they volcanic eruptions from the ground as is stated or had been stated?" "Yes VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS INDEED sir, produced by explosive powders set in thee the ground by our end i enemies. I saw the results of the disaster from a safe space and the entire section of Abbieann not touched by the flood was wrapped in flames. We endravored to save about fifty persons from the ruins, and of those mostly burned from so many vessels in the river harbor of the city. You must know my officers went ashore in small boats seeking for survivors, but were unable to penetrate the city. At the lower part of the city at that morning there was a trem indous sea of fiercely rushing water. We believe ourselves that not a single person in a Abbieann at the moment of the disaster escaped. If you desire to go to Abbieann sir, I'll gladly take you, but it won't be much of a scene. You'll find hardly nothing to make the place even in the part untouched by the flood. The flames consumed everything. The extent of the catastrophe sir cannot be imagined never will be. The captian who is a friend of mine on another shipwas seriously injured, and all of his crew, officers, engineers and passengers are dead. I passed the ship at sunup, and it was covered with debri, debris. We repeatedly had sent a boat in as near as possible to the doomed city, but not a sign of the lower city was seen, and not a living soul in the burning portion. Only flames were seen. One steamer was seen to explode and di disappear."

His ship had been near the scene of the explosion that fatal night but not near enough to be injured. The cruiser had first arived at the city of Dominica Rum at three oclock in the afternoon of May #ith 3Ith. The captian had reported that he had been obliged to turn his ship out of her course, and flee to the eastward, during the late morning of Mq May 3Ith in consequence of terrific heat and smothering clouds of smoke from a forest fire which was raging in the location of gandbed Creek. He tried to head the ship for the city of St Luca, but averse currents of hot air and terrific windstorms hurling clouds of flame and smoke before it, prevented him from doing so. He made a long detour, and finally far out of his course, arived opposite Abbieann, a little before Twelve colock near Midnight. while twenty miles off, the whole country for hundreds of miles seemed to blow itself to the stars, the explosion nearest Abbieann dest o destroying the city, and all the ship ing there. The cruiser after resuming her trip and while on the way to Pandora encountered afterwards the edge of a tremendous flood.

This caption then startled the inhabatiants of Pandora city by a report thay that all the people of Abbieann were supposed to have perished, during a terrific cruntive like explosions near the city, and all the shipping wiped out with all hands. None of the shipp had ever been recovered.

"Is sure appalled Pandora city those two days after I arived, when I reported of the cast catastrophe at Abbicann. If I had not been backed by my crew and some refugees I brought with me, and some evidence of it too I and my crew would have been in the insane asylum untill the facts of the disaster was confirmed by news and other reports. I only gaved fifty refugees from the effects of the disaster, and they were from Adeleheid city.... That was the first city to know it, The whole country yet was in ignorance of the effect of the disaster, as the news was not yet opread.

The ship had passed through a tarrificedly hot fog the morning before, which had been succeeded by unusually dark weather thand evening, Starring was suspicious of indications on shore where the forest fires had not yet traveled, and where the forests were said to be so thick that no one could have hardly been able to even work their way between the trees.

botween the trees. "I think we are making a mistake to anchor here." he said to the captian. "I don't like the aspect of thinks here, and the shore soke dangerous."

"I don't think there is any danger" answered the captian. The wind is on the west, and we are sone some distance from the newly formed fires in the south."
"Yas, but wind changes direction unexpectedly" gaid Starring. "I'll bet we will sorry by an by. It's not safe I'm sure."

"Well Let's forget it not", said the caption. "You surgested anchoring here, and we are here. If you wish though I li send the ship oft out."
"Never ind" said Starring. "But again what do you think of the catastrophe we have witnessed!"

witnessed?"

"I have heard from wirnesses" said the captium" that there was for about twenty minutes or half an hour an awful noise of explosions, that clouded the air with flying debris and then right away which was mysterious a cyclone of smoke debris and fire, and the shock overthrew all the buildings in the city, killing everybody in their very beds. When people still out in the streets were struck they fell dead. The cyclone of explosion hurled fire tore the musts at of many ships, blew others up, and sunk all the rest. Some afterwards as they told me came waves of fire bigger than the smoke clouds of the fire."

"That cloud of the explosions" said Starring, was bigger it seemed then any observed from volumic sructions. The strange fire burned the city everywhere at once, and then from volumic sructions. The strange fire burned the city everywhere at once, and then followed the flood. I have heard some vitnesses testify of their experiences, and there said they saw men rushing back and forth in the wreckage strewn streets and the sanks and the smoke and then showe and the shows the same of the shows and the smoke and the shows the same street fring it happend after twelve ocloci, all occurred within twenty minutes, some testifying it happend after twelve ocloci, oclock. The concussions overthrown most to fit biggest buildings first in three oclock. The concussions overthrown most to fit biggest buildings first in three oclocks. The valid to be me that some men and women got to the chore from some of lifet left. They said to be me that some men and women got to the chore from some of lifet left. They said to be me that some men and women got to the chore from some of lifet left. They said to be me that some burned there, or caught in the flood thay that followed. What I wished to learn was the mystery of that part of the city that sank beneath the Lake of Angellinia. Three seamen belonging to a vessel of which I inew knew of related to me that when the wave of flood waters struck the bark, it inew knew of related to me that when the wave of flood waters struck the bark, it into and hurled them down the obliterated river. The house rolled over and over in the flood nearly drowning the three men inside, inally they managed to cla ber on toy of the house which by this time had ceased rolling, and from this point will evitaesed the dir destruction of the southern part of the city by the flood.

I'e was also taken to the hospital at pandora, where he afterwards died ... The third one a little girl was also consciou for a short time under the care of the best doctors. the could not relate much of her experiences, yet che told me that on the ay day of the terrible director, she heard a loud report in the alteration of Lake Ce Solicia, and that something hit her on the head from the cooling colling, and knocked her out.... and when she regained her senses, a number of hours later, she four she was horribly formed, and glancing around, saw that she was floating on a wreckage jum and that she was surrounded by a sea of water, she died a few hours after she was rescued. "An Starring observed from his high" host of observation, the path of the explosion every bloom to Partern Abbiscom. close to Eastern Abbieann, which swept over also all parts of Northern Abbieann was indees indeed murked out in the strungest nammer unything contray than he had expected

The vinicity of the River shore, where during good times hendreds of vessels had gone to anchor, seemed as if swept by a whirlwind of flame and hot winds which like a tor---nudo ripped, tore, and shattered, everything in its pre passage, and set all the houses, on fire, and ret left few traces of smouldering ruins behind. On the other hand the extreme assetern section or the city, and udjoining parts of this section, were baried under a thick bed of explosion thrown rubbien, and where the force of the cyclone of explosion tossed fire and heatened wind was the greatest strong houses of b i brick and atone and concrete were leveled like pastboard. Some or many of these had stood against stones for over a century, and thectremendous force of the nearest explosions had swept all before it...

"Well what is it like?"?"?????"asked the caption.

"It is ike a glimpse of hell." said in epitomizeding the scene."If the mountain tops around us would have blown off their heads, and let a rain of molten fire comin come down upon us it could not do half what the explosions have here. It looks to me as if the very riverwaters rocks in sp sympathy, with the trembling earth, and Death was upon the face of the whole earth."

"But did you see much of what is left of the river harbor of Eastern Abbieunn?" asked

"Planty and I do not wish to see any more." answered Starring. "Whatever it was it was like a whirlwind of steam, hot rocks and boiling liquid that burst in fury from the mouths of a hundred volcanoes, and enveloped to the whole city of ableaun, swept the River norts clear of any inanimate and living thing, and not a sincle ship escaped, and I bolieve if there were any survivors among the burned and scorched crews, they must have died on bord the ship in agony."

"pid you have a good look at the ships."!
"ges, and every one of them are unrecognizable hulke, with dismantled and torn rinning riveing, and charred sheets, and to my horror; I had observed dead men lying havers they fellamong the black wreckage of their decks t showing no one approached hwhere they fellamong the black wreckage of their decks t showling no one upproached or were abl to approach Abbleen even now except us since the awful disaster..."

"now many vessels were lying in the harbor did you observe?"

"Now hadred and sighteen, and it seems us if the explains mysteriously wrapped these ships in masses and sheets of ilame. In disaster is far too big to concleve.!, I am ulmost sorry I came here. I fell lke I m lost on the dead moon."

"I cannot account for the explosions and the reports of it." said the chief scients of selectist." have looked over the whole scene of the explosion craters, and they are surrounded by a sea of smouldering and burned trees and seas of deep smoking ashes.

For three hundred feet from the biggest crater, the fire had been swept back and but he explosion craters further on the surrounded that the same of the same of deep smoking ashes. the explosion seemingly tward the vortex of a whirlpool of wind torn fires further on, and I believe the second blast hurled this upon porthern Abbieans. I have traced the scene and from the shore of the river in that locality, a flood of burning trees, set fire to everything in its path like a fearful tidal wave sweeping tward the shore, and engla engulfed everything, save one little angle of trees that stood through all the pall of smoke and fire, because it was cut off from the fire by an intervening portion of the stream, whether this fire set off the explosions or not I'd like to know. It

"I don't believe so." said Starring. "I have recorded facts that no fires burned there before the explosions but afterwards. That is also evident because the vaters of the river harbors are thick with unburned wreckage of shore and hill and in the midet of it all sallors and passengers from the sunken ships and s term terror stricken human beings had no chance for a struggle for life."

"That is a hard question to a strange to keep affect until picked up by ships until all the roaring flood," ast anked the scientist."
"That is a hard question to answer." said Starring, "where could you find a heroic cuptian immediately after the catastrophe that would brave the terrors of the catamity and hodily enter the harbors of the ruined and flood swept city upon the work of rescue!

"Il don't think so" said the captian. "I heard some of the captians the next morning came with their ships and ployed their way through floating trimks of trees and masses of houses, and debris which filled the waters of tye rivor harbor, and had made several attempts to land sailors in small boats, and rescue what surviving people they could

If a lawing shores are the first state of the range of the world have been sucide to enter the disaster zone at the time. I wan told there wan one vessel in southern Abbieann that escaped destruction in the harbor, and that was the ship artivors among her crew that the details of the creatrophe in the harbor it was the saylvors among her crew that the details of the creatrophe in the harbor in the saylvors are the creatrophe in the harbor. was learned. Rescue could be effected there, but not up here. That would be impossible

While Starring and all his followers were waiting for more favorable times so they could work or the inspection of the city better, he was to have a surprise which probably he would never desire to have again. The ship steamed up further tward the northeast so as to get to that portion of the city, and then cust off anchor at that section have a the north end, having reached a that portion on the evening of the 28th of section of the control of the contro in opice of the threatening appearance of the distint forest fires, Starring was determined to discover some kind of glues ind to make the attent at all costs while ever. The searching parties were divided into three columns, thirty men in each. The main one was led by starring, the other by a ranger and the third by the caption. Starring secured the limestone me materials, and all kinds of debrie that looked very much different in appearance to building ruin. This was placed inside a sack very men antherent in appearance to building run. This was placed there a sack and starring being strong should red it and spatice for other party that is the second to the butts it of the city, about a had, mile to whose Starring and his men were, fortunately this was in full view of the great forest horror. The cupitan had secured just that he had been directed to find, when he saw a large column of smoke and fire b lon upward from the edge of the forest surrounded crater, and along the edge of the firest a great stream of fire surged, pirecting his men to make all haste back to the lower section of the city, the caption turned aside to give quick warning to the party under grans, and the other as well.

It took fifteen minute a to arive where Starring and his rang was.

If took fifteen minute a to arive where Starring and his rang was.

For Code cake boys, get to the lower section if you would save your lives. The fire has spread to us of the explosion cruters, and I discovered some emexploded materials there if we don't get away destruction will be upon us."

At that instant there was a terrific druck apparently as it seemed in the sky and

At that instant there was a terrific druck apparently as it seemed as it

At that instant there was a terrific trush apparently as it seemed in the sky and so loud that it seemed as if a million thunderbolts had clapped at once, and as it died easy there was a terrific hiss of fire among the trees of the forests, and a vast column of smoke rolled upward durkening the sky. The fire came racing on tward that part of the city, and every one of the party started a race to see who could be the first. The nen of the second party became pants stricken, but starring rushed up to them and led them also on. As rapidly as possible every one made their way over the debris to the lower section. Very often one or the other would stumble, but his comrades would wait untill he recovered, then wh all would go forward again.

Two miles was covered in this manner, and each minute the sky derkened, and the heat was beyond comprehension.

The snoke came rolling in fogging the ck city end they could hardly breathe. Finally the snoke came rolling in fogging the ck city end they could hardly breathe. Finally the distance was covered, but heavy seas of fire were sweeping shoreward twend the city c side of the river. It was with great difficulty that may of the parties reached the safer side of the city but it was accomplished just in time. From behind the ruins every one watched the conflagration, which to granting was indeed a grand and yetm cet mat all a upralling sight. There was rushing forward with great speed a perfect wallil wall of fire, and occuenionally about it were columns of smoke. Several new fires also seemed to be instantly formed, and they seemed to be spreading in different directions... As many of the berning trees fell into the river great clouds of steam were raised, and they could easily hear the minister hissing plainly amid the roar and hiss of the

Being sure they were now beyond the danger zone Starring decided to make an obser vation. They left their hiding place went down to the river shore, being of course now very close to the column and sea of det hdeath. Yet they went as near as they dered without with ut court courting death and destruction,, and all about them the water it was what we call re boiling, and the stoam that came up and tward the adventuerers was so dense as to make it all but appossible to see through it. through it... perrible as was the fovest fire at this time, it was surely mild in comparison with that which was witnessed several hours later. Home of gtarrings more timid men were continually in a state of panic, and justly. Starring did not feel so good himself. even the captian was nervous and so were the beab brave girl and boy scouts, and some of the orders others. It was deemed just now too dangerous a task to make for a direction to return to the

the very earth seemed to have turned back into a molten fire on the opposite side. Everywhere in the woods the fire sarged, the trees snappedcand roared in the dir destruction, and when ever an explosion somewhere occured the earth seemed to have Let its foundating foundation. Even across the River the conflagration tried to pour a great storm of death. The culmination came at an early hour in the evening, when there occurred an explosion so terrible that the still standing standing wall of some of the buildings in the ruined city were shaken down, and the sky itself seemed to turn

all of fire, and the heat became unsupportable. Thick heavy clouds lit up by the glare beneath rose from other sections of the firest forests, and some of gturrings men became at once punic stricken, and would have fled but Starring restrained them, telling them it was more dangerous cut in the open. Stones hurled by one of the explosions foll in the streets, and showers of blazing fragments of irees and blizzards of leaves. Manybof Biarrings followers hurriedly shielded themsolves and the taller ruine to keep off some of that bleating heat. The scene was worse than they had ever observed it before, and the entire aspect of the country on the opposite side had chan ed into a seething heal. Smoke filled the air thicker and thicker the durkering the sky, and blizzards of burning leaves were flying through the air. When the heavens were filled with the secthing flames, as free untly happened, it could be seen that the main forests along the shore had now caught, and everything within sight and ablaze. It was even streaming like a wild hell sea of fire over to North pend and a branch line had already struck. There was a perfect calm in the air in the city but over across on the openatte shore the burning forest as lached to a fury, indicating that a fire horosome was sweeping on. Fords were inadequate to describe the nefund condition, and disanter to the ship was expected at any moment, and starring knew the fe five he had raced with to reach worth nend had caught up at lest. The fury of the fire horricane was viclent in the extreme. Coll Cologeal columns of treas were torn up by the roots while alf aflame and couried into the air or harled to eath, the whole flaming forest was in a dreadful metion and the fury of the winds covered the sky with b raing fragments of everything torn loose by the terrific gale. The wind indeed raged with fearful velocity, and the flaming clouds advanced with great rapidity, but no wind was blowing in the ruined

This gave evidence that the winds was raging only in the path of the big blaze. Even great columns of burning leaves c and bunches and sparks was hurled upward and f formund, and an explain to Flavrings caprise horded noward a storm of red hot rocks and toulders many feet in size, showing the translation best of the first in terming big stones red hot. The wind sweet commend twend both pend with the inspect of reada tornudo. The spectacle was apalling beyond description. Every one of gravings party ven thrown into a greater paric, for four that the fire harricane scald finally cross the river and strike their ant of the city, while it even see at that from evented the fiery clouds rained down burning branches, clods of red hat earth, and even whole trees at timess. Then partly cross the river came a swirling clo d of white hat anher and burning branches.

Starring took the ne nerve to climb to the highest rain he could find and finally returning said;

The entire stretch of the river within our vi view is a running wild wind tossed sea of fire, and it is sweeping North pend and beyond, but it is fortunately not touching near our anchored ship. The whole forest is in awild convulsions from the wind, and the tail end of the fire hurricane is carrying all before us. We can get to her but we had better wait, and also continue our explorations obly when the fires have passed the city. If we do wait this will be our last exper! noe with the fire and we will have a better chance."

Then one of the men said—
"I see the wind is stopping, and the smoke is rising up. The worse I elieve is over.
But sir you might be mistaken. You know if it co crosses north Fend it will sconer or later give us a performance if the wind turns northeast or northwest."
"You are a Calamity Jane " said gtarring."You think of the worse things at the wrong

"But I'm ""
"I'ld fon't want to hear anything more" growled gtarring.
"I'd don't want to hear anything more taken from the ruine at such a risk was to be taken to the boat when they could get there.

Before returning to the boat, there was brief services in one of the streets of the city! led by a priest who had accompanied Starring, a Mass for all the dead of the city of Abbieann. About the priest, stood officers, surviving sailors, and the rangers and the four b child scouts, while Starring served as Alter boy and so did Penrad. and the four b child scouts, while Starring served as After boy and so did Penrad.

The gloom was made more in ense by the knoweldge held by each one present that his or her her own life was in great danger. Salute was citen fired by explosions produced by the forest fire that had brought destruction upon so vast a column of forests.

While the Mass was being sung there was a cuccession of deep sullen detonations that sounded like the thundering of volcanic sruptions, and as the Mass was being concluded a cloud of smoke swept into the streets and again a darkness as of night followed only broken partly by the glure of flames.

This scene was fittingly dramatic another of those cin climateric situations which in succession characterized the whi whole series of events in this stirring adventure. It was a trugic detail which only a good novelist could make out in using his literary art to depict for the world the destruction of Abbieum and half of Culverinia, as others did of other great historic culumities of the world. It can be such details in which the luman touch ray unite with the awful sulfit, if cruel and unrelenting nature that makes the whole story of the results of this greatest of were category hies one of most enthralling interest, and then the inventing committies under graring in their adventure under peril and difficulties to discover real clues first as to what the disaster eally was, and then which and who were responsible.

TRIBUGH THEY FLERY ORDEAL.

ATOME SERVE CRUEL, AND THE FOREST FIRES CONTINUE TO FOREST HAGE OWARD. THE APACIONING OF APBIEAUS BY THE SATION CONTEMPLATED. GLASSINGS SPECIAL DAVER IGATION OF THE BUNIED CITY, AND ITS CONDITIONS.

Even while the explorations of the ruine of Abbicann by daring starring and his followers bent on in spire spite of their recent dreadful experience on the ship, while the suddened and sympathic world was continually harrying relief to those, who has suffered but had not died,,, while the halpless people throughout Calvevinia were trying to c llect their thoughts, and face the stern fact that they had lost all that they held most dear, nature goaded on by the enemy no doubt remained as unkind as the fee himself. The forest fires continued to threaten the ruins of the city, hinders its exploration and hid everything away in its dreadful smoke mantle, and the warmpth was remarkably unusual and the scene of subdarkness and glare i of the fire almost supernatural.

Starring hopend that the ship ship now was at the Borth and the fires would not endanger it so much, wen though constant streamers of fire fushed up the hill slopes near the vini vinicity burning all that remained in their way. Exploring parties belonging to Frame bend were driven in flight from the vinicity of the city, by one laghte of the Red Plague daily. Even when they were not terrified into flight, the work of investigating the ruins to find evidences of what the so called eruptions really were, and that of provining them was trying in the extreme on strength of nerve and will, mind and muscle alike. One of Starring as istants who was a correspondent said to gtarring;

"I have sir just returned from the ruins of Abbieann at this extreme north end unable longer to withstad withstand the terrible hardships and encounter the terrible sights that were with a every winute of the fourty eight hours of my stay there. hen I entered Abbieann at your orders I was surprised that more of the evidence were not in eight, and only what could be soon wan whole or half skeletons, not more than 10,000 skeletons were strewn along what has been left of the streets, the others being at least partly borned under the mangle of debrie of the burned rains, evely moment of my stay in Abbleaun I feared that the forest fires would again come too hear and belch forth its billows of draudful fireheat and smoke. The Red Plague continues to rage to the south, and some hills resemble volcamoes vomiting lava, but the fires sarge up the slopes, changing the condition of the forested region every hour.

I have imagined that all the while I have died and been in the reaches of the bottomless pit. The stench and danger of postilence in this city causes it to be a greater horror than was caused by the catastrophe, but it is believed all of the bodies not buried too deer in the wreckage have been burned by the smouldering fires in the ruins, but none of those in the interior of the runs have been dug out. If any laborers ever do come sir it will require months maybe years to restore what is left or clear the wreckage, even if a very great force of men and prisoners are emeployed, and when the work of disposing of the dead starts they'll only find skeletons of women and children. In the harbor of the city sir voir bouts are in constant readiness to take away the workers if the forest fires becomes more threatening. A watch as you commanded is constantly maintained ready to give warning, and if a wave wave of the Red Plague turns in the direction of North Bend the place will be immediately deserted. As ide from those working in the rains sir, there is not a human being, except the skulking Glandelinian buttinskie in this part of the region. All who have not been killed but m st have fled north."

"It has been more than a a week since we arrived here, appecting that the smealdering fires in the buildings would have exhausted themselves, and allowing the approach to the city to become easier" said Starring. "I had never expected the forest fires to be raging up here and at this rate. Yet we have vecieved more of the harrowing details of the catastrophe than we expected. I have sent some of my members to dig in the debris of houses and stores in search for ducuments and valuables."

"I have made the discovery sir" said the correspondent," that the number of victime was no great in places that in the great heaps of compingled dead identifications of individuals was and is most difficult. The deadly odor of still decaying bodies makes the work of investigating in the rains not only hereibly offensive but dangerous to the searchers as well, got that sir do you think caused the disaster. Was it eraptions

"It evroly most have been explosions." answered Starring." "Fut that wan it that destroyed and set all these northern sections of buildings afire and blasted it so terribly making it resemble a hundred per cent larger St mierre or the explosions?"

"It is supposed that the explosions occured near the verge of one of the forest fires, and the terrific flash, the crash of the eruption, and the fires must have produced a great flame and atmo, atmospheric pressure. The formation of any sulphurered hydrogen gas produced by they these sufficient combinations, and the positionus fixes of expleded materials doubt doubteless caused handreds of the mands to die in their beds of sheer sufficiation before the fire itself reach them or before they were buried under the ruins. This would explain the condition of the many bodies found to be covered with especial swellings, and strange special burns caused by the great and strange cloud of fire which followed the first crash of the explosions. After this there cause the tremendous showers of atones, debris of all kinds water, and and so forth from the oray ed earth property. Samy bodies not entirely covered in bed had the marks of wounds produced by this awf it hail of rocks. All the dead in rooms almost torn loose from buildings were covered by a lajer of this debris, ranging in depth from a few inches to a foot or more..."" inches to a foot or more

"But ain't there a mystery in the explosion fire" asked the Correspondent.

"In what vay!! "maked Starring......."

"Well in one discovery I made." unawered the correspondent...
"and what was the discovery out with it." the general denamed.
"Al came across a forest of trees, which was still a making showin; that the wave of the forest fire stopped about two hundred and fifty yands from the about of Alca.

term. And yet the houses were all dentroyed in that place."
"By II relieve; you dround that,"
"By II relieve; you dround that,"
"For int across unusual" said. Starring. Il heard that that place had been untouched."
"For sir, but I don't mean they were burned. They were wrecked by the concussion of the explosion. Put a few buildings sir were untoched. I looked into me of the buildings and discovered skeletons which proved that those who had been in them were killed.
They may have been suffected by the powder smoke, and the identification of each one of them by a strictor found in their clething was easily made out. Two of them were urisets. They may have been our occased by the power smoke, and the identification of each one of them by at articles found in their clothing was easily made out. Teo of them wore priests. Near the town the body of an old woman was found lying by a street car, to which a another car was attationed. The old woman was helding the hand of a mail skeleton which no doubt had been her granded child, as though about to get into the car when stricken down. A half skeleton, that of another little boy lay by her side. Inside the streetear was the skeletons of the passengers, nigh passinght passengers no doubt. I found in the streets of northern Abbieum eir, heaps of melted copper and iron, and los of silver. In the neighborhood of a telegraph office, I found the very instruments which mysteriously had been hurled a distance of a hundred rands. The metal of the "hat I am condering" said graving, "Is what our government will do with the ruins of Abbieum, and the hundreds of thousands of half skeletons lying within view or under the thick layers of debris." instruments was somewhat melted but the instruments were recognizable ...

"I do not know, but it will be the most serious problem which the aurthorities of our pational Government will have to solve, even during the war, and after the outer world and our unsuffering states have given assurances that the curvivors would recieve food through their benevolence ..

The investigation committee who were to come to aid no said graring, never showed up vet. I believe they are atterly inadequate to the situation, or either they are atraid of the forest fires, the nature of the disaster, and the enemy, and it is evident that the stench a week or before had been so horrible that the danger of planu plague was great, added by the heat of the forest fires. I do not think we can accomplish anything much untill sometiming turns out for the better. We are continually graying for rain. There was talk among the arthorities of the Entional Government of abandoning the ait of the city altographer, and placing armies of saldiers around it by the landedde the si's of the city altogether, and placing armies of soldiers around it by the landside and a naval guard in the river and flood sections, to make sure it could not be approach ed by the enoping enemy. If this were done as plummed, it might help to pr. serve this city as a sud momulment for the nations good, a historic scene forever of the greatest disaster ever comprehended, and it was said as much quik quicklime as possible could then be scattered over the ruins, and if this were done, it can be realized that a year or two after this axful war is over the ruins of the town can then be entered year or two after this arful war is ever the ruins of the town can then be entered with safty to visitors and tourists, who would come to see what a disaster like this really did. Another proposal was to have wurships bombard the ruins with the purpose file the first the still standing walls down upon the bodies and giving them thus wholesale burial, which however frightful to mere thoughts, would not be unfitting after the death they met. That poor Abbieann might never be b rebuilt became probable. Certainly the object of the spot for many decades, even if the wars whushal devastation did couse as the entire sorroundings and portions of calverinia were more terribly devastated."

puring a merning when it was a little less smoky and not quite so hot, attempts were made bir by Starring, and some of his followersto get a vew of the ain explosion crater extremely north of Abb eann, and see what really was the outburst. It was a perile to task however, how perileus can best be understood, when it is related that the forest fires were closer than a sal to this region, and that the fires had exploded something that one detonation shook even rulned deleheld, forty miles away.

Starring and his fellow officers, and the child scouts with him were driven back several times by the fiefe fiorce heat, and chocking smoke, but they reported that several times by the field flower hear, and chocking smooth, but they reported that they had all the appearance of the others, cometimes dense smoke hid the view, but it was certain that this was the explosion that did most of the dumage to Abbleaun and for that reason Abbleaun was no lonior a longer a city. All evidences seemed to confirm Starrings reports for near the crater the ground mysteriously gaped a thousand feet wide, and two miles long, an awf & crevice indeed. This day however was dealite the peril of the adventure a day of of partial freedom from the threat of the dangerous forest fires, and that then in the evening on september 25th near by a terrific column of tylek thick smoke burst forth, and as a result fear and terror were again among those who were exploring the city.

The renewed danger from the forest fire came suddenly between nine and ten oclock and great flashes of brilliant and sheens of light vere seen from the forests, and the clare illuminated all the sky, accompanied by r thick glowing red clouds, inters persed with glares and undulating rolls of flams. Tremendous uprushing showers and blizzards of sparks and great brac branches of blazing lmbs limbs ruse unward and fell among the unburned portions of the fores s starting new blazes.

Everywhere it second rose huge relling red clouds, and vivid flushes of light, and seven smaller now firms which appeared on the lopes slopes of a high and long ridge the day before multiplied in number and size. The steamer to set a better view passed North mend for about two miles. Evidently a new and big fire had broken out to the north of the main fire. In following the unusual steambout course, from both Bend to Herdridge Junction, they could see the long ridge enveloped in fire and large clouds of dense smoke. This seemed to mean a serious est atton. As the ship approached nearer, the land was hidden by the dencest smoke through which a deep red glow the that extended to the waters edge could be seen. A shower of sparks and ashes

4. 3.32 and a sulphoric a small and deeme smake caused the caption to change the course of the stu steamer, and the boat want ten miles to avoid the heat and smoke. The captian atill suffering from his burns, and the remained on seek during the passage of this barrage of smeke complained of violent faintness. After the ship ran out of the smoke and heat and changed the course, they retraced the direction and again spreached northern Athlean, The sprearance of the country here was changed to what it had been weeks before the catastrophe and starring was flabbergasted. Old ravines of the region thickly forested, locked like open mouths of smoking hills, and the desolation and furnace scenery was indescribble, and on a near view of Abbieum, when a west wnd clear wind cleared away most of the smoke Starring found the view of the city wire ghastly than he thought t before.

In the face of this increasing danger, gtarring to further his hopes for success in his unusual undertaking for his cause decided to make a careful investigation of th situation in the river districts northwest of Abbieann. The ship therefore left d for that direction on the following afternoon September v26th, to determine whether d for that direction on the following afternoon September v26th, to determine whether there was danger in parmitting the continued examination of the rulins to continue, inso much as the distant forest fires was creating so much heat as to make life almost unvearable in the city even though it was nearly thirty miles from the "Hell"

As Starring was about to rebourd the ship a large b laze of fire, brightening up the scene like a volcanic laws flow came .p tward his right, accompanied by an ernor mous cloud of smot smoke, and made it appear doubtful whether it would be prossible to examine even the nir northern country because of the danger danger of being lost in the forests and of being in the path of the conflagration.

Therefore the trip for the time helies was progressed, and the ship steamed on buck to

Therefore the trip for the time being was posponed, and the ship steamed on buck to North Fend. In that direction the appearance of the Red Plague was not so terrific. The ground here was covered with a thick layer of explosion debris, and the limbs of the trees were weigh ted down with it. After the ship passed a little north of North Bend, the debris on shore seemed less thick, and gradually decreased as the vessel approach sonalon Point. Here the steamer anchored, and to Starrings surprise a small bout came out from the shore, bearing persons who were surprised to see the steamer and the begged for food.

Starring learned they were forest fire refugees, about six hundred in number, all old men women and children who had fled from their burning villiages and towns, being forced to leave all their property behind. The river at Kohola Point was filled with floating and charred debris of tree trunks and limbs and, the bridge there had been comp com letely destroyed by the fire. The river water was boiling hot, and full of dead fishes, which the fleeing people had secured as food. At Kol Kohola Point many persons even little children swam out to the Mary Jane and asked to be taken across to the other and safer side, and this was complied with when the captian got Starrings permission. Provisions were distributed to them.

They ordered that all the refugeen should cross on the ship to the other side, and they were only too willing to do so.

Upon reaching the extreme northeastern section of Abbieann, the highest point of the city, Starring and all the members of the ship this time, except those to remain and guard it landed. There was a strong odor of burned flesh in this part of the city and access to the city here was difficult. The town was a rounded by dense forests not at touched by fire, and smoke sometimes came in in fogs so thick that it was impossible to see less than six feet. Fire orands were also falling near the unburned portions, and Starring became alarmed. Breathing was equited difficult, and the heat was terrific.

... owever the next day Starring traveled across a good portion of the northern end of the city. Starring was surprised indeed to realize he and his followers were the first persons to visit this region since the catastrophe. He came upon St Marie Street about fifteen mines north of southern Abbieann. The distance measures twice that by road. The streets through which the party traveled, was dangerous because bands of road. The streets through which the party traveled, was dangerous occause cames or hidden Clandelinian snipers terrorized his band, but all had gone armed, for the Clandelinians had made numerous assaults and had no fear of the adventuerers. A number of them had been killed in several places. Starring and his adventuerers also must hundreds of refugees hasteneing through the region for chelter, fearing the fore fire would overwhelm the entire country and are hurryingto sufty, everyons even expecting a repetion of the outburst of last week. In sections of the extreme northern parts of the city Starring saw more evidences of the torrible ruin, and here the wave of explosion fire was so sharply defined that a house on the edge of the blast was torn apart on one side, and not a section was ruined on the other side. Btarring walked then on foot for half a mile through the ruins of Abbicann, and saw not less than 22,000 skeletons o in bed in half wrocked houses with bedroom and other sections exposed to view. One building was torn u open, and which showed to be an op op orphan asylum. The victims in the beds in the domor domotory plainy showed the effects of the explosion shock, and also that the bedding showed that the vkc victims had been burned mystericusly as if surrounded by strange cas flames, here fragments of other buildings were found sticking in the walls of half crushed wooden houses, all scenes left as if a compade of wind had passed through. The cyclonic fury of the heated air blasts caused by the combination of explosion and near forest fire and explosion formed gases was shown by the uprooting of trees, many of which were turned upside down. Buildings looked like omaha, or umphysbure at after the As American mornadoes. A whole line of street electric light, and telephote poles extending for miles were stunding bottom upward. The same scene was observed with wooden houses for whole districts. Standing on their roofs and in line, and yet remaining on their own sides of the street. At one place four houses were seen standing on top of one another

Starring had witnessed the cyclones that devasta devasted quiverinian coast cities and no where did he observe effects of the wind greater than he found in Abbieann. In many pae parts he observed where many wooden houses had actually acted the beautiful known por-corn dence. The concussion of the explosions was extraordinary.

During his exploration of h this section, he was surprised by the renewed fury of to the distance forest fires, and he ordered his followers, and the two girl and boy scouts to keep close together, to be able to make a run for the ship if necessary.

The transfer of the second of

"Hold keep galm everybody" shouted gtarring. "Don't act like i lls."
"It there'll be enother big explosion." cried one of the men. "Cun't you mear that tereithe thunder. My beavens, let's get out of here." and just as he spoke a shower od of dust end flying atones fell about them, and the next moment there was a ten fold oranhalt seemed as if a volcano was active, but it was evident that the fires had setruck some gangers cants in the forests filled with explosives for blasting, and that was the reason for the detonations, so ally the panic Starring started to sing, and he finally calmed them, but angeline litches in looking east said it was safer to remain in this section of the City than going near the river just then, for to do so would be as dangerous as to venture too near a dangerously erunting volcanc.

One explosion was so terrific that the smoke and debrie shorting were visible for the entire distance from Ad-lchoid, to the ruined city. There was now a tremendous scene, and Starring and his party returned with all possible speed to the inner portion of the city to avoid the terrific heat, but saw nown by about fifty refugees coming through fleeling f for dear life. The wind dying down for a time, Starring and several of his followers came closer to the shore with the object of bring the sur refugees across. Indeed the sight of the forest fire was now a most terrible one. At Starrings warning gestures the steamer pary Jane; immediately put out down the river a ways, with some of her landing boats following her, the ship blowing its whistle continuously. A part of the party ran along the river shore, and a boat came ashore to jick thom up. Immense quantities of fire were rourig on tward the shore at this section, and the clouds of smoke were scores of miles in extent. Those on the shore lost sight of the pary Jane in the gloom and haze, but her whistle could be heard. Flames rose in great clouds from the horizon all this time, and another explosion occured somewhere more terrific than before and a black cloud as fierce as that seen from an exploding volcano and fill of fire and flanhes arose from the edge of the fire, accompanied by tremendous rumblings and a tremor of the earth, that tossed the river in waves lashing back and forth from shore to shore.

This column of smoke was caught by a current of air and carried southward, and finally it formed like an unbrella the base of which rested in a sea of flame, and a mantle of durkness was swept southwestward across a portion of the city, enveloping it. Then so heavy was the smoke that filled the air that respiration for the adventuerers became a labor, and a fear of suffication cause upon them all. They continued to be larmed for more than five hours and it was not untill the wind suddenly changed its direction and the cloud of smoke be blew eastward that confidence was restored.

Yet all night the whole horizon line had the appearance of a great crevice of the glowing Internal Regions at which great hellish forces were working to burn up the world. lames shot skyward at times in sheets that I ghted up the entire view of the city, and continued with increasing brightness. The atmosphere was full of smoke, and the heat was most terrific.

These flames could be seen streaming along at times at the actern edge, and another explosion occured and roared terribly. Sometimes it seemed to Starring and his followers that life in this portion of the city was unbearable, and the suffering of the four child scouts was extreme, and their clothing was wet from sweating. It was during such scenes as this that Starring and his reallewscarchers in working theore in working the rains up here f fought their way among the debris in their effort to find some other class as to the wreckage thrown by the explosions. Sturring, who whose work and service in the army from the very first dayof his arival in the ranks up to now, and which won him priase from all was now most strenucus in his desperate efforts to find clues as to the real nature of the explosion.. At the same time of course he was hoping to discover whether it really had been the cause of eruptions or real explosions.....

It can be writtenww written with feeling that appears now almost like a greatet propressionation of disaster, hat Starring and his followers had come to situation entertain a strange repugnance for his duty. for the firs, time in his life. In this feeling his followers and the four child scouts fared.. Starring ad Angeline wichees he, she, had actually discussed periously, a cossible exchange of cositions in the rulned city, as Angoline hickes thought content if the southern extremelty of the city than did the others.

"We had better het at of this." Angeline colled to starring. "We had better be getting out and getting out an fact an we can."

"Oh you are just got ing only fittle scared." Starring replied. "There is no need of any one going away from here now."

"It is much better that be sufe than to be sorry." continued Ameline Riches."If the fires a cut o to off from the lost we will be trapped in the city..."

Yet as soon as the air was clear en ugh, Starring a tended by one of the rangers, genet rated to a half torn down building which looked to be former court. In the rains of the structure between what was formely a ladges bench and the approximent jaced soid as a lary lep Pebatement room were uncovered what was believed to be run ration not belonging to the buildings of the city. It was out though of the constant the belonging to the buildings of the city. It was out though of the constant the belonging to current, and Starring cursfully no of the location, and then constalted with the caption of the steamer who had accompanied him. Two metallic like stones were also dus up.

Another section at Stannings indicated direction the other officers and some of the tangers : ade a similar effort to locate some class as to the real nature of the that. > It was wrecked just as any other section not covered or swept off by the flood. The streets are as completely buried out of sight by the fall of so many of the tall houses as were those of Pompell. Along the river water front Starving Observed there were a few malls station was found. Curiously enough he saw the clock mentioned that survivied the disaster. It was the clock of a big church tower which still stood. The face and hands of the clock were not destroyed The face and hands of the clock were not destroyed though its works inside were injured, and these hands indeed furnishes for Starring a real proof of what he had been informed. The hands of the clock had stopped at precise outly ten minutes to one, which wascto his surprise, showing that it was at that moment the first shock commenced, that finally overwhelmed the city at this part and destroyed the lives of all within it and its environs.

> The work of saylowing the ruins of this section of Abbleann for some of the treasure approach to be buried beneath them was begin by Starring, but no such traces could > be found. The valits of the ruined banks of Abbisann were buried beneath the ruins of the building, and no means could be found to set to them under all the rubbish. All the securities cash, notes and so forth of many banks buried beneath the ruins may aumount to billions of collers, this exploring the rules of Abbieum, steamers louded with half crazed women and children from imperiled districts in the neighborhood of the forest fires were constantly passing within his view,,, and were halled by those remaining on board his own shippp.

Starring said when the search for the treasure was futile,

"The forest fire itself did not give the slightest waring of the destruction that was to come. That I wonder is whether some ernormous imes mines on the ground had exploded, by means of battery charges set by the enemy ,or is it so what many believed that if it was not of eruptions then the fires may have struck some ernormous muti munition stores and set it off. But I can relate an experience of my own which can lay to some

I was a witness or al, ost a rae partak r of the Lake Selicia horror...... I was o t scouting with a number of officers and soldiers at the time, with a great little girl scout called Alace Gracedelinia accompanying me, when the ground trembled so as to throw our horses off their feet and we were dismounted in a way that would do credic credict to a cirsu curcus stunt that would have made us a fortune had it been done in a cahow. It did not tremble as an earthquake does, but as though a terrible sirucile was going on somewhere near the lake. As we rose to our feet, the whole levee or big wall of dikes keeping in the waters of the lake seemed to shudder, and a mouning sound second to issue from the water. Then there was a rending crash, followed by a grinding noise. It was perfectly dearening though so far away as we were from it, and the flash of light that accompanied it was perfectly blinding. Then there was a noise like that of a terrible hurricane, and where a fraction of a second before there had been a perfect calm I and those with me sebmed to be drawn into some sort of a vortex. The myse mysterious forve leveled a number of trees close by to my left, as if a tornuc had attack them from cehind, leaving bare a large a space of ground, a hundred parts square, and more then two thousand yards longs..._ransfied I stood not knowing ha what direction to flee, as gracedelinia almost screamed, and and the others threw themselves flat.

I looked tward the Lake Selician Dike, and above and around it formed a great black cloud which reached high in the air as if a volumni c eruption was breaking out. I t literally seemed to full apon the city of Schloeder town, and to envelope Sperryville simultaneously. It formed and spread out and moved with a rapiditythat made it impossible for anything to escapecfrom it, and I shouted;
"Volcano is erunting at Lake Selicia."

"Go on " said a commanion officer"It's no eruption. It's a tornado."
But from the direction of that cloud came explosions that sounded worse than any of But from the direction of that cloud came explosions that sounded worse than any of our greatest cannonades in a battle put into a few shorts singly, and a simultaneous rour came elsewhere that sounded as though all the navies of the world were in a tremendous artillery conflict. Lishes played in and out of the cloud in broad sheets to nguess and forks, the result blao being that for a moment or two intense darkness apread over us, followed by a stringe light that seemed to be of imagnifying powers. That the cities of speriyille and Schloedertown were doomed knew, but we were at that t m time prevented from seeing the dearf destruction by a spur of the hill that shift off the wive from the cities. It is immediated to tail how, and they shed there shut off the view from the cities. It is impossible to tell how , and they stood there so long inert without trying to escape, but probably it was only a few moments, but so vivid were m. impressions that it how seems as though I stood as a spectator for many minutes. When I recovered presence of my sensos I heard a new treemendous roar and saw a torrent of water fiercer than even the magara Falls pouring from the caps in the dike, then with a new roling thundering sound, the whole dike gradually crumbled and melted away into a torrent of water the full length, and believe me we sure tried to see whose horse could reach the highest spur of the hill fu first.

I knew there was so fi no flaming flash in the first wave of cloud that was sent down upon the cities. It was a heavy black cloud, like fire damp, then came the flashes. It was the most tremendous explosion I had ever seen, had ever been a witness to. As we draw out or up to the top of that rise of ground the lake seemed in the thross of a terrible convulsion. New gaps seemed to be opening in other levees of the lake, and water us flowing in broad streams in every direction and a terrific flood was result water us flowing in broad streams in every direction and a terrific flood was resulting. The two cities were ruledwhile we were still in sight of it, the torrent carrying all before it living the inhabiants no time to even escape. Andmany of have lived in those cities and who had escaped are homeless, and without and loved ones left. dead in bed just as they were when sleeping. All bodies not buried in wreckage were curbonized or rousted. Even great trees with roots upward and also scorched by fire were stream in the city in every direction. "Uge ruins of solid buildings, and still hot and gacking wreckage piles were also observed. Starring elieved the reports now that the completeness of the catastrophe is evident when it was stated that as was known for the present time now no one save the new handful of survivors picked p from the wrecked ships in the river harbor that futal saidright hor hour, escaped. And even then, they too were enable to tell what had not all the peak of the passed through that they could not hardly say a word. Starring believed it is certain however that the disaster case

Sturring himself remembered that at the time of the great disaster he himself had bee been in the city of Pandora, and the people of that city had awakened to hear for ever twenty minutes load detonations, when which had been so load that the reverberations exhead from calverine fur north of pundora on the north to Crowley city, on the southern boundary of Angelinia gtate. The fr fearful crashing seemd cease at about twenty minutes to one, and in the morthing the city of pandora had great closues overhead. The inhabitants were alarmed, but the Mayor of Pandora, did everything posible to ally allay the panic. We partly succeeded, but scarcely had the feares of the people been allawed, when there came the news that in an instant Abbleun. Its proving its been allayed, when there came the news that in an instant Abbleaun, its people, its houses had seen plo blotted out of existence.

After a search of four hours in the ruins, starring found no trace of anything sue picous that he was looking for. And from everything he saw he felt more confident than ever that even 10,000,000 was not too great an estimate of the loss of life, veryone in the active event the real named to most be real and and which the track of the form o In the city except the men population must have perished, and surbub suburban Towns and cities added hundreds of thousands to the number of victims.

That he was quofounded about was how was the Calverinian and other government again.

to care for all the flood and forest fire refugees, whose number was kn increasing every day. The entire eastern section t of Calverinia as far up as Abbleann has been or is being devastated. All plantations for scores of miles, and small villiages have been destroyed by the forest fires, and tall the refugees have either taken to the hills horing to be away from the danger of the advancing conflagration, but who are still menunced by the seas of fire.

As they could not be relieved, taken to places of safty, fed and clothed the situation was becoming very alarming. Werk must be done quickly or the disaster will become ten hundred fold worse. Hundred of thousands it seems must perish as it is before help can reach them. piver ships alone cannot suffice. Abbieannia can do nothing as all communications is cut off. It seems the whole world met help.

Starving indeed had not looked for what he observed in cestern Abbienn according to reports hourd that the city was lett intact. As said before the or what is supposed to be called streets and all the neighborhood around what a few months before was the largest and most properous city in all Abbienn were found encumbered with heups upon heaps of ruins covering dead bodies beneath. Herever buildings stood still with all the interior exposed to view, all the dead sere seen in the beas, or lying outside stark nuked, their clothing having been burned off from their bodies by a hot strenge singe of flame, this they themselves were pertly rousted. In the wast materity of instance, not fire but shock or fumes seem to have been the sole cause of death.

Even in one exceed interior of a house Starving say great number of bodies hunt

Ever in one exposed interior of a house Starring saw great number of bodies burst as under by some kind of terrific heat, and either lie in bed or on the floor or unid the wreckage disembouled. In many instances however he saw that the faces of the victims were quite calm as if killad before they were even avened, as if they were stylcken with death instantly just where they lay without a moments wurning or awakening or if awakened without time to imagine for an instant the deadly is peril hey they were in. Only a few every now and then were found, that had stamped upon their faces on in expression of indescriable terror.

The errifice city and the reighborhood, at ill reaked with a housible as order of

The entire city and the neighborhood, still recked with a horrible or odor of burned flesh. o one had come to see the ruins untill he arived, and that accounts why bodies could be found as thick as seen on a battlefield. He came across one place where he saw an entire family of women and children in ten houses, all laying amid the reckage and the bodies in a horrible state of decomposition or already mere skylentons.

Starring believed, for there is no one living apparently, to tell the exact facts. that the explosions may have occured in an area of burning forests, and that there That the explosions may have occursed in an area of burning lorests, and that the torus was coddenly shot from that region a great sheet of flaming materials of the forests by the explosions accompanied by a great thirlwind of flame and heat, precisiously as is reported at the headways of such fires, and that the explosions of such fore force three all this month north end of the city. The entire quarters of Lastern Abblesina are completely leveled with the ground, fruming nothing but heaps upon heaps of ruins covered thickly over with explicat I sion explosion o debrie or mingled with it and every other sort of wreckage commingled ...

. That horrible revelations of the havor wrought to human life which these grim mounds the city not even a trance trace of the streams that existed there also could be seen. The great city archouses and immense factories and mills, along the river frontt, are smached in on the side fushiong facing the direction of the incoming flood waters enroofted, and gutted throughout their entire length, their contents either piled in heaps or along the streets, or floating in the water.. small tugs and hundreds of river sallboats and steamers, rowboats and launchos have jummed the selves i to buildings, or floated way down the streets, where they were landed by the incoming flood waters, and left by the receding floods. On the north side of the city of Dorothy Gale thousands and left by the receding floods. On the north side of the city of botthy where thousands of houses not wholly demanded and jammed in great confusing masses against one another as if they were an immense junk pile thrown away. I have seen great piles of human bodies, dead animals, rotting vegetation, household furniture, and fragments of the housen themselves piled in confused heaps right in the wain streets of the city. In the river itself h m human bodies had been floating around like cordwood."

"I seen one section of the flood except Abbisenn that terrible morning" said one of the Rangors. Asctime passed on however, the terrible truth was pressed home throughout the nation on the minds of the people that the mortality by the flood and explosion in the Abbieann region had possibly reached eight mill ion, or nearly the entire population, and what the less from the disaster was throughout the rest of the zone of herror could n never be estimated.... As I said throughout the whole flood area, the exact flood dead innumbers will never be known, not even in bbisann, and as no list of the dead was never accurately made out, as no one could make any list out, and there was no one there to do sit, and it and more so the terrible flood waters, may have curried down the rivers and into the sea also, and washed on distant and lonely shores many of the bodies that mover were recovered. The unknown dead of the Abbleann horror sir, will for forever surpass far the number of those who are believed to have perished in that awful flood throughout other portions of the country, when the tempes of flood waters ruged and the waters devastated so many thousands of to ms towns and villiages and cities,

"Well he whatever has pened" said starring looking again on the ruins of Abbieann with a feeling of great removuse remourse," "whatever happened one of the greatest catas rowhes ever known to mankind, was this flood that devastated so much of Calverinia and Morthern Angelinia State, following immediately after one of the biggest explosion crushes ever known to happen. Though the ammount of proper y destroyed may runs into the tens of thrillions of dollars when it is ever finally checked up this was never theless the slightest loss. That which makes our flood horror so exceptional is the terrible fact that it swept away half as many lives as did many of the battles we have seen in this war so far, or destroyed so many lives as were killed wounded and captured in the recent battle of Headrick Junction or Gedernine Creek, and trunsformed a most rich and preper prosperous country and valley for more than ten to thirty miles to the thirty thousand mile into a vast hell and charnal house. By Heavene Captium if it can be rightly proved, without any bogus about it that glandelinia did this, I cannot even concieve what the resy recult will be. Abbiemmia, is mobelizating it is true, but when the real facts of the disaster comes out, a hell of a new kind will

"Yes, and Abbieann was supposed to be located on the main line of the MicHollester and Pandora Railroad, and was at the time a city of more than eight million inhabitants twenty eight thousand of whom were foriegners, mostly Itilans. It was the most important commercial city of Culverinia, annihilated, and such as will give the popular title by which the disaster will be known. Even the Mic-Hollester Run Valley has long been famous for the beauty of its scenery and its dense forests.

where the flood waters came from is a mystery. Far north of Abbieann there is a lake reservior of very immense size owned and used by the flatinal government for the winter and summer reserv of the imperial ramilies and government for the winter as about six hundred feet below the Abbisano Level, and it is about sixteen miles long and six miles broad in its greatest width. In many places it is nearly a thousand feet deep, and it holds a lurier volume of water than any dam in this whole country. The dum that ret restained restricted the waters is nearly six miles long, two hundred feet in height, one hundred and ninty foot thick at the buse, and as tyl thick at the top which is used as a railway. It has may immense spill and sluceways, and had stood for a century and never broke. This dam was never believed to be a standing menance to any section of the Abbieum district, even in time ofsevers freshets, and was fully equal to all ordinary emergencies. And the dam has been proven structurally strong beyond conception with the evidence that strangely the a awful vibrations of the explosion effected it not in the least and is still in the same condition. It also has more than a sufficient means of discharging a surplus volume of water to i irrigate the farms during our long summer dry spells, and never was it feared that such a reservoir situated in a region even noro notorious for its freshets would ever yeild to the ernormous pressire pre pressure and send down its resist ristless irrestible waters like an a valanch to devastate the valley. The fact that such a dam withstood the concussion as flabborgasting . But where in the world did all the water come from. Supposing this dam had done it, it would not have made one third that much flood, orests of tress and rocks, where were harled high into the air by the chock f the if-estible flood which rushed down the country side and the valley like a haricane aped. From where ever it started, it is said it took about three or four hours to reach Abbieann, and with the procession of the deluge, forests of trees, logs, debris of toms and villiages swept away by hondreds, rocks, railroad iron, and indescriable masses of drift were more and more compacted for buttering buttering power and what the advance torrent of the fierce floodepared, the sea of debrie in the wake of the ilcod made up of mountains of buttering rams, destroyed.

Even one | quarter of Mildred greenburg looked like an immense Galveston because of this, and so did Angelinia Agathia, Dorothy Gale and other big cities. It issaid that the distance rom Abbieann to Dorothy Gale, something over eighteen hundred miles vere build beneath the streams of buildings and wricking term from apper towns and cilies that reached from the irritatest, described the incident of blooms, and carrying the amfort mute incidents to the their deaths, it of all readers know of the horrors of Jayeston warricans of 1900, well the people of for the Jake west three while borrors similar to that with all the accessinging terrors of that itseater, hericans winds too produced by beats of distant forest fires, and of dangers from fire, and all this not in a day but for my fee than twenty dur and highly together. The forest fire attentions of piled to high on the houses to picess, and they the dobris in all directions of piled to hill find its from the houses to picess, and they the dobris in all directions of piled to hill the little from the twenty feet high, but tone means of the blacking embers of the distant houses starting big fires here and there that spread rapitly. One big long ridge of reckage was curried down from other cities and howes, internised with hindred of men women and children of every describens, and all this was harbed into the northern streets of Porothy Gale. and piled together inone confused mans. streets of Porothy Gale. and iled together inone confused mass.

The principal work of destruction was completed in sixteen short hours in the worst dumaged parts of the city, and jet in all that brief time the accumulation of many a life time were swept away, thousands of lives went out, and the du dismal day following found a population, stricken and paralyzed, and helpless still before the contucontinued ravages of the worst flood on record. How how, and each day, the situation changed for the worst, and the mid became dazed midet the greveous scenes. t s continued fury of the flood, of seeing houses going to pieces. The bodies of human beings, the cara carcasses of animals of all kinds, were strewn on every hand, and there had been so many bodies that at first it did look as if the whole population of the of the city was being annihilated. The flood was filled with them coming down from the north. Starring who witnessed the flood in norothy Gale, himself, saw the corpses w swept into the one chaning tides of the flood, and brought down the streets as thick

16 straws, and knew they were more from other towns than Dorothy Cale. He said of

"I saw many faces, even of little children prod protruding above the water, there the foot of a child, here the long silking dresses of a young dress, there and here and nearly everywhere a tinty hand or foot, and just beneath the glassy surface of the water full outlines of bodies might be seen, such scenes drove men and somen to absolute desperation. When I not fied notified Violet and her sisters above the boation location of the floods down ow down there they would not hardly believe it. puring the flood, and afterwards a great deal of looting was done by Clandelinian vandals. Many stores had been closed, their owners being compelled to leave to look after their lamilies, and hol homes. The winds of distant is forest fires and the fire huricanes forced in the the windows and left the goods pray to the vur vultures. Ghoule striped the dead bodies of all kinds of jwe jewelry and articles of value to use for their wicked countrys cause. So extensive was the flood that no troops outside could render aid, and the city after the flood was placed under martial law by the surviving men citizens themselves, while the national Guard by wireless was asked for aid. One commander sent seventy thousand men, the remmant of a flood torn army to do police duty, but they could bot not get past the flood to the city. Three divisions were sent from the half flooded mobilization comps of Angelinia Agathia, but these too were barred by the flood ..

Hundreds of desperate Glandelinian vandals in disguise roumed the half floor to floode flooded streets crazed with liquor which many had drunk because nothing else could be obtained with which to stop their thirst while they went at their ghoulish work. Number less bottles and boxes and cases of intoxicating beverages were scattered about an

and easy to obtain.
Robbery and roiting from Glandelinian vandals continued for many days and nights and at night as the city was in durkness, the effort of the city aurthorities to control the lawless element was not at all successful. Big bonfires were built at many various places from heaps of rebbish to enable armed citizens to see better where real watchfulness was needed. I heard that more than six hundred looters and vandals in the city were slain in bloody combats with the citizens. The most rigid enforcement of martial city martial law was not able at all to supress the vandalism entirely. Thirty three Clandelinian vanida vanduls were surprised by a gang of a hundred men but fought it out successfully against overwhelming odds and after killing sixty of the hundred men escaped with their loot. I myself was going to take the train on the following morning of the beginning of the flood, and was at the main station when the worst of the flood came up. There were thousands of people in the big deept depot, and we all remained there for nearly fourteen days .

The back b part of the building fell in during the height of the flood, and I with many others were forced to seek shelter in the left wing. The streets then were literally filled with dead and dying p ople. A big orps orphan asylum near the station was a most terrible scene. I saw there over fifteen hundred dead children, and all the sisters cure believed to be dead. We took the gravest chances to breasting the flood by means of a strong river steamer, and as we went through we saw seas of water, float ing wreckage bodies and other horrors. I saw later during the recession of the flood one thousand foot dray with countless numbers of bodies being drawn by four tugs to be buried in the waters.

indeed the situation at that beautiful city beggars description, I cannot tell all I saw there. But fortunately the whole city was not so terribly wrecked, but nover theless fully seventy per cent of the business pertion of the city was wrecked, and the same percentage of damage is to be found in the residence district. Along the river wharfs great str steamers, not river bad even ocean going ships, and big river warcraft and many other kinds of shi pping shipping have been bodily thrown by the flood on the big river piers or hurled into the city strects, and li there great masses of iron and wood, that even the resultant conflagrations could not destroy...... They observed that the total decolation beyond the crater, and the mighty mass thrown around by the explosion which covered the earth were almost incredible, even beyond believing Jennie marer said;

"I can't hardly believe my eye sight. It seems like a night mare to me. Thy beyond here, and down the slopes of the hills beyond, across the valley of the Mic-Hollester Run, chocking up a part of the river, and stretching beyond it to those foot hills and the nearest forests pointing) five or six miles arther away, has swept a vast billowy shoot of earth, m.d and debris of all kinds, broken trees, sliding hillsides and broken forests, oblitering obliterating eve y foot of the erstwhile smiling landscape. Thy even a volcanic er p eruption of the Krakatoa or the lift Pelee type put together in in one eruption could not accomplish half of this. It sure must have been some terrific mine that did this."

Here and there they observed huge disordered heaps of rocky t debris thickly intermingle intermingled with forest trees, the rocky debris, in the distance recembling nothing so much us the giant concrete, black gubstrucut substructure of an ernormous breakwater n shattered by the sea waves. It was also carious for them to see on the further side of Withe charp line of demarkation, between a brown sea of md and gray clay and the shattered to green forests on which it had engroached, or again the lakes formed in every tributary When of the Mic-Hollester Run by the massive dams no suddenly raised against the Manage of their stream maters. One ernormous lake was more conspicus among the rest... It was there that one of the main tributaries of the Mic-Hollester pun had been arrest at there that one of the main tributaries of the inte-Hollester per had been arrest ed at its issue from a wide pass by a monster barrier ad of debris thrown right across its course. And neither living thing, nor may sign of life of any kind could be discerned over the whole course and excurse. And indeed gave for the distant noise of the forest fire east of them, all was silen silent, dismut, and solitary.

nement it however Sturring knew, lay more than a score of humlets and some small and big towns, and mestimated corpses of men women and children, who no doubt had been overtaken by swift and painful deaths.

Although the city of Riverview was not severely injured, nearly all its abled bodied inhabitants lost their very lives in a manner which showed the extroardinary forst force with which the explosion had. Hen the "supposed cruction occurred here, and debris of all kinds began to rise and fall, the young and old fled panic stricken from their houses in panic, some scarrying across fields making for the opposite hills and deep mather with the position of the proposite will know he will know he will be a third and a third and ablance the made their houses in panic, some scarrying across listes making for the opposite miles and down paths well known by all. A minute later came thicker darkness than even made by the hour of midnight, plinded by this, and dazed by the falling debris, and other horrors of the scene, their steps, and ulso their senses failed them. And before another ten seconds had passed every soul was caught by a swift aval avalanche of debris which rushing down a hillside, and dislodged by the convesion overwhelmed them in a fate more horrible than if they all had been buried alive in a bed of quick sand, none oscaped except those who had been frightened to leave the city. Starring had heard of this. He realized that this one as well as some other supposed "eruptions" had convulsed Central Calverinia and the whole of pengall State onnthat on that fatal midnight how or just a few minutes of the beginning of June The First.

The wave of main disturbance produced by the explosions traversed fourty two provinces of Calverinia, o er which the earths crust was shaken most violently for fifteen minutes, in nearly over three hundred shocks of a seconds duration, while the same shocks were somewhat slighter at a distance of two thousand miles, but enough to do some ruin and cause unic and come commention, and was felt under the distant sons a like distance, making themselves felt on the neighboring contenent of Starring knew that the shocks had been felt in Pandora Abbieunnia, though II miles from the center of disturbance, and yet it produced a conousein at that distance never noticed before, which broke windows, made people jump out of their beds, thinking it was thendering, and which according to their wording lasted over twenty minutes. Owing however to the character of the move a movement, and concussion and the distance, which was comparatively slight, the damage was confined to the wrecking of some roofs and chime chimneys and millions of windows, in glass. The worst or some roors and chime chimneys and millions of windows, in glass. The worst affacted was Bengall State, and Central Calverinia. To commence however at Pandora Calverinia, which is two hundred and fourty miles away from the scene of the disaster on June the Foist, one minute after twelve, the inhabitants were awakened and alarmed by a audden jolting of their houses, which contuned over two hundred times, and many sought refuge outside their doors. There was each time a nou noise like the firing of artillery, no underground mise which accompanies earthquake, but sounds at a distance. The people even claimed there were so shocks exactly like an earthquake but a jolting sensution, and many became dizzy and some were selzed with nausea.

These indications, together with the sudden jolting, and the stranger movements of the nelsmographs denoted a strange dis a disturbance, at a considerable distance from this second biggest Calverinian city, but the first surmise that it was located anderground with the exploding of Mt Joan, was incorrect. The scene of the catastrophe was indicated with only litidings from its outskirts, as all direct news was cut of for the interrupting of railroad and samy other communications by the shock and fload.

Starting did not know how far he would have to proceed to go to anyother explosion hole but he believed he was about more than fourt, miles may from Abbleaun, and only on the attaile at a of the destriction area, beyond the city of Abbla Abbleaun. Here although the minor of shocks caused by the explosions had been an anally severe to destro; all the lindcape and towns within the district, to displace all the forests of trees nothing mas all except the appearance of the explosion hole was observed.

At one point owning to the lateral spreading of some embankment there had been a slight clakege of the line of round, and Sturring and his followers had to proceed with custion for fear of walking into an explosion or uter before the and it. rossing the entruce to a portion of the beautiful Luke Angeline they came to the farm fields or what had been farm fields, and pushed over a country of hills. Turther along their Further along their line of travel signs of more violent effects of the explosion became more numerous. Huge farm houses had been strange strangely turned around or event mined and hamaged, roofs were off, sinkage . In the madews and other ground became more sightly, and although their was a large rock that ier between them and the plain of greater destriction, it was evident that they were still in the area where the vibrations of the explosion had been more vicient.

The main deman of saminum maximum destruction,,,, was observed closer to the series of the explosion as well as father off, and expectely on a large plain, once dotted with small villiages, homeofeeds, furns, etectr, bomes and to no of large size and beautiful for ests, supporting under the garden file culture of the Calveriniums about sixteen thousand sight handred inhabitants to the square mile,, and containing two cities, ha Verse, and Rivertown with populations of about five handred thousand for one, and about three handred thousand for the latter, giving probably a round total of two million five handred thousand people. Within about twelve miles of livertown, a strange absideance of one west scale had taken place, trees were as prooted a structe sibeldance of on a vast scale had taken place, trees were up rooted or standing in all positions, even upside down while over lessor areas the soil in want places had slipped down carrying with it dwellings and their inmates. Starrings followers were thrown into constanation. A little later the wind began to chiff from the scuthwest to the north, changing the shapes of the clouds to the reverse, and a long rolling wave of smoke cloud thick and heavy as of a thundersturm spread over the sky from the north and at the same time the heat became more intense and a wind hot and smothering becan to blow. Starring could see more panic stricken people fleeling in the open beyond the city, some made for the mountains far to the north, and others scught to escape by getting across the stream. The scene indeed was one of the wildest confusion, whole families assembled on the jettles near the river, and and slong the river beach, nearly all falling on their knees, and screaming forth appeals for stoats from the ship to take them to the quosite shore. The bats did so. The air was so filled with smoke that it was barely possible to breathe, and at times it semed as if suffocation must be the fatte of all who could not be take, on board the ship or brought to the opposite side. For many hours strange and systericus explosions were so frequent and heavy that it seemed as if the whole centrh would be shaken from its axis. Thousands were througing the shores beyond north, sid, and many went into the hills beyond to run the rink of starvation, jerils from the forests overtook them. Others no doubt gent to the other further awa, towns, there to depend upon the chairty of strangers. Every boat weed to take ref. gees across at Starring orders was cro ded with those ready to flee. In clustered on the upposite shore were other refugees, and hundreds finding it imposible to be taken aboard the boats quick enough swam out risking their lives in the hot water in order to avoid the danger that filled them with more terrible dread.

One refuges who took this mode of escape was a little boy, when the greater threatt of the fire came and fear atruck to the heart of every one of the refuges throughing the fire side of the shore, the little boy rushed to the edge of the shore, and then after glanding around for a few moments, before any one could restrain him plunged into the water. He succeeded in removing his shoes, and then kicked off his pants. Being then little weighted with his clothes, he swam out to the steamer Hary jame, which was nearly a mile off the shore in north end. The little lud creached the hip saftly but was much exhausted. He was then sent to the safer side of the shore. Indeed from all parts of the country not cut off by the forest fires, refugees were coming to the shore in dense crawds. The mountain reads were filled with ranic stricken and struwing fire fugitives, and even when ariving there their terrors did not decrease, and they were as anxious to press on to some safer place, as they were to get to the shore, starring heard that all the roads were dotted with dead, and many were recorted to be dying.

as anxious to press on to some safer place, as they were to get to the shore, guarring heard that all the roads were dotted with dead, and many were reported to be dying, having fallen from weakness on the way.

Starring offered rwards rewards to some of his men and removers if they would go out and assist types those who had been reported to have fallen by the way, but they were too full of fear to be tampted by any offer. The panic was greatest that evening when the glare of the flames rose. like a dazzling sheen, and the skies were filled with rolling and whirling clouds that seemed flery red, lkeny even believed that the flames were about to overwhelm them from the very heavens, and the terror that ensued was uncontrollable.

Scores and scores of others were taken to the boat first, and then transferred to the safer shore some distunce beyond the river. The scene was like rescueing lost souls from hell. The small boats of the and amid all this scene this was a work of much damper, as the river was rought, and almost chocked in places with floating debris.

All putural water and supplies had been polluted by the heat of the forest fires and the refugees had be take the chances of the river water as it only was the only kind obtainable.

It was evident to Starring that this whole section of Calverinia would have to been be abandoned by the population, in response to the classrough toward they the manifest threat of continued danger from the fires, when asked by the captian who was anxious for the poor refugees, Starring instructed him from his own side of the shore to keep up all possible arrangements for the embarkation by boat of the refugees on the opposite shore, and also to make known if the situation seemed to him to necessiate partial or total evacuation of the opposite shore the means at his disposal or those he may need. While this was to be done starring was to

All of the neighboring terms far to the northwest on the opposite side of the stress, from Ruckelen, to at Pater effected that hospitality, to the refusess. The torm of Probe been near Guadeloupe greek, was the farthest but the most favorite refuse for the fleeing people. Starring likewise considered the advisuality of transferring the forest fire refusees to the town of Beauty reek, many miles north forth nead where the forests was not so thick, and the danger if certain much less never theless. The exclusing the cross-starring likewise that authorities of the state advised an action also as to order the depopulation of that section of galvering wittle heavy rains came to forests was not so thick, and the danger if certain much loss nover theless. The exodus he knew was continuous, but the main nurtherities of the state advised an action also as to order the depopulation of that section of calverinia until heavy rains came to make the dangers of the forest fires a thing of the past.

The people in their fright were convinced that volcanoes may be in bad cruptions somewhere and that these had nade the forest fire accurace, and therefore utter and un reasonable fear possessed all souls. Even the northern towns was believed to be unsafe. In the all this rescue work was going on gavering and his party on the other side in the city came up further north. With the greatest difficulty, they succeeded in reaching this section. The effects of the nearest explosions here were simply tremendous. The highest buildings known had been hurled flat to the earth. The bombardment of explosion thrown debris, was not sufficient to account for this, and neither the air blasts either for this and all other evidences pointed to the also passage of a furious blasting blast of fire and gases, traveling at ernormous speed from the direction of the explosions and with incalculable force. The denosit of boulders, and stones and debris of all kind has ernormous.

The effect of the explosion at this section was more violent than that which effaced the other sections of Abbisum, and swept away its people from the carth, and here the adventurers were close to the fires. Vast columns of smoke and heated gases and flame still poured appared as from a world of active volcanic craters, and new forest fires were breaking out on mountain sides and summits, and some hills looked as if they were hurling ward whirling windw whirlwinds, which rushed intermittently upward upward now from one point, and now from another, and racing with one mother, poiling clouds fires had continued to menance the Extring was surprised even thugh for months the fires had continued to menance the existence of the whole Calvonian forested country. Already a sea of foreste had been destroyed, without cessation t the forest fires had raced onward, and now from the parent up one new fires were forming on the north side, and up the hills new conflagrations were traveling.

It had been known that there had been further loss of life, and what was more dist a distressing a large number of persons mostly women and children had been impresoned by the fired in a sort of clearing, and being surrounded by the seething hell; that been impossible for assistance to be rendered to them under any condition by any human beings, and it was believed these unfortunates who were at grande giver juda all periohed. The fire that seethed through this region, burned caroes all the trails and reade, filled the river channels with floating and smouldering debris, and reached the extremety of the outher half of porth pend on the east side, having spread through a sea of forest making a fire sea of it, and turning stones and boulders and all kinds of rocks so hot as to be almost incandescent.

By this terrific conflagration were the women and children at the clearing at niver grands surrounded. It was hoped that the clearing would be an extensive one. Starrligs members left on the ships hearing of this made desperate efforts to reach them, but it was impossible to get any nearer to the fire scene than two miles. To go any closer meant estain death from the heat. The Captian could see from a height that gradually and steadily the tidal waves of flames spread, and it was surely feared a wave of fire would soon sweep away the doomed victims. The towns they had fled from, though unknown by name had been destroyed, as was other places and many inhabitants of these villiages were believed to have been lost, but it was impossible to tell the number.

Starring know that throughout all of Calverinia the conditions were impossible to describe. Often thousands of gentlike reports every minute from the direction of the forcest were heard, followed at irregular intervals by louder crashes, and after each report the hills seemed to tremble. Believing that the whole territory of Abbigum was doomed the refugeog continually appearing on the shore continued in a state of patiell panic, just as fast as possible they wert leaving for the other side on boats. They appearedly did not care where they went, and all that they asked was a means of lauving the place they had come to regard as an country full of infernoes. Tak hundred refugeos and probably a thousand or more went to quadeloupe on foot in and state of poverty, many almost naked, ad among the homeless ones were many too old or too young to care for themselves. Many children were orphans, whose parents were victims to the rage of the lieres forest fires.

Starring in still further investigating came they unexpectedly to a small crater near the outskirts of the city, a crater that was about five hundred feet across. On the west it everlocked the culminating point of the forest, which seemed completely crumpled and mined at their bases as a result of the explosions, and might easily collaspe. cullaspe. The region had an incundescent aspect from smouldering forest fires. In order to make known his due presence at the point where he stood, gtarring waved a flushlight signal, which was replied by a corresponding signal from one of the pangers who signalled to starring in this manner. In order to show gtarring where he was.

Starring felt a number of strange cormotions, and his shows were damaged by the heat of the ground. Tree all about in this location were smouldering or burning like torches, smoke was dones, and an iron bridge crossing a creek which was completely dried up, and the sandy bottom hot, was melted into all kinds of strange shapes. Only the viaudact still stood, and the heat where they stood was intense, and the whole aspect appear of the scene most termitying, bluzing smbers fell around him, and he picked up a large blazing branch at the unburned portion, which however he was unable to retain. The whole spot was charged with a smothering heat, which became so violent that Starring was finallybobliged to retreat.

And his retreat from this region was more difficult than his arival. A wind sprang p up harling a blinding rain of ashes upon him and his during followers

the most descenses circumstances is inspection of the entire region north of North Pond and he declared that the entire north end of the chore in that location had sauk partly into the river because of the concussion of the employions. He enganted that a trochab established in this region to keep the refuses out of the dangerous district. Winds sometimes very strong was still blowing red hot ashes over the entire northern part of the city, and this extended for a distance of fourty miles. He had found other explosion made crownesses in the ground in that locality, adding to the terror of the scene.

He sure had a lot to write about to show to lolet, and her sleters when he would make his return. Starring could see that thousaids of poor refugees, prayed, stormed and pleaded in vain to be allowed to board the boats, and he forming a line of men on his side of the shore decided to from the ruins if possible to construct some sort of a poitoon pontoon bridge across the strea , for he wished to check the wide spread alurm and subdue the panic. He specially commissioned this work, and the strain to which these poor helpless refugees were constantly exposed was driving many to despair which these poor nearless retained were consistently exposed was driving many to despite and even insufity. It is seven thousand of them, destiture and hungry had been brought across to the other side, and as an extra precaution gtarring ordered every one of the refugees to keep their clothing what they had on wet at all times for fear of attraxting attracting the flames from sparks. He feared that if the panie stricken were driven to extremes, they would all jump into the river and drown or parboil themselves.

Fresh terrors continuously shook the nervious refugees of the sorely stried country side. Even the paric of those in the warly morning had not subsided, and the multitude of the Semi crazed citizens were still rushing up and down the river shore, in a useless outlook for vessels to bear them away from this scene of devantation and genth when a bright glow appeared over the summit of some of the ridges in the northeast, while a new conflagration appeared in the east near north Bend.

Suddenly a new confingration appeared within their very yiew. An ernormous stretch of hime forest was split in twain by a mighty fire wall, and with an indescribbe and mighty sky rocket like hiseing and rour ing, an ernormous whirlwind of flames and smoke and forest fire gases, rose high into the sky.

The effect therefore of this new evidence, that this section of Calverinia was being my rapidly rendered unfit for human habitation upon the people weak with constant strain and mentally unblu unbalanced for the time being was extraordary. It also had some effect effect pon gtarring too. It was cutting off his further passage to the north effect effect non starring too. It was cutting oil his lutter passage to the southward and southwest was impassable. It was evident that he and his followers were prisoners in the ruins of abbleuns. mong the refugees many appeared to be driven insone by the scene of the new fire, and one man while innthis in this condition threw hims: It into the boiling waters of the Esther Creek, and the un fortunars creature was parboiled to death before he could be rescued. Other miserable beings threw themselves into the Mic-Hollester u River, while still others wandered about in utter distraction, muttering and mounting in a heart breaking monotone..... The new conflagration, which threw up clouds of smoke IO,000 feet high, and where the flames appeared to less three hundred, appeared to advance up the mountain sides in a long angular line, appearing to stretch nine hundred feet wide at once.

It formed and spread on the southern slopes of thesigh these ridges, and it was feared this would completely overwhelming the di disparing inhabitants, who for some days had been cut off by forest fires from any hope of aid.

The conclusions of the Aven adventurers mission to Abbieann increased as the pressure brought to bear on Starring, in order to induce him for mercys sake to take decisive steps to aid the refuses in their evacuation of the forest fire zone. He gave instruct ions to the Captian of the Mary Jame ordering facilities to be placed at the disposal of persons desiring to leave the opposite shore, and seek refuse among the ruine of the city, a now special privilege, and yet these were insufficient to satisfy the advocate of evacuation, who insisted that Starring should forcibly remove every old man and all the women and the children, who refused to go, from a danger likely to end in terrible disaster at any moment.

Yet after this for more than Sixteen hours the slopes of these ridges appeared like ernormous volcanies volcances in violent eruption, and the situation grew constantly more threatening, increasing the panic, and the numbers of the terrified refugees. The boats of the Mary Jane was compelled to incessantly make trips back and forth to bring the refugees word of danger. Once an explosion occured somewhere during a rescue and a boat bad of refugees were showered with flaming brands, and and apparks and hot sand, and the concussion almost captized the boat. Outside in the main stretch of forest the conflagration and the wind produced by it was in a terrible fury, and the feer of a tidal wave of flames was in the minds of all.

The exedus continued from the opposite shore, and it was feared that if the conflagration conflagration spewers this section it would come without giving warning of the convestation that it was preparing to work. The hills looked like volcances all but somionent, and explosions from different direct of directions were frequent. Once an explosion of terrible force occurred, and flames and I flaming debris shot skyward, and rolling smoke floated out in ernormous clouds. The outburst was accompanied by the greatest fire display ever seen since the trouble began.

povelopements in the conditions of the forests indicated fire harricanes to come pre-appearance in the conditions of the forests indicated the number of course destructive than ever yet, and another explosion occursed driving even the refugees in the outskirts of the city into the interior. It was only by good for tune that Starring and his followers were not Alled. Believeling that the forest fires were not touching the woods near the biggest crater of all plainly straight north of the other, he almost one addition that the forest of all plainly straight morth of the other hand one addition that the superior of catting photographs, and described the city has almost one addition that the superior of catting photographs, and described the city has almost one addition to the city and the superior of catting photographs. the city, he planned an expedition for the purpose of getting photographs, and descriptions of the conditions within and about the crater, and the nature of the forests there, and a shotograph also of the forest fire near thatblocality.

Forming the expedition, was a war correspondent and a chotographer, for the very Angelinia Acathia Times, and asserta of the Rangers, and Angeline Riches, the two boys and Jennie Turmer. After a wearying march which took most of the day in the face of fierce heat and and terrific winds, and occasionally blinding fogs of smoke, and through amoudering fires, the region of Rander manually pur was reached by eight oclock in the evening. The correspondents and the rest of the party was also accompanied by a kindly disposed priest, who gave such information as was in his possension. He insisted on a pause being made for refreshments and a badly needed rest, and in a clearing of the forests a cump was pitched and a supper prepared. It was this generous courtesy of the creet, and starrings desire to delay till the following morning, that saved the expedition from destruction.

The original plan had at first been, that the visit and investigation and photograph ing at the orator should be made as quick as possible, which a quick return to northern Abbicann to avoid all danger. While the evening meal was being prepared, the priest who knew the region, pointed but the work of ruine that had been accomplished by the far reaching force of the tremendous "eruption. Starring engaged the priest in a short convergation.

"Father, do you know this region well?"

"It remained the my post though I was certain this locality would be swept from existence as we so that the content of the content into the air, and rolling forward with express train speed. They watched the hot flames consuming whole block long stretches of trees in a breath, and they watched also the priest, and starring and even the four child soutte, calm and brave, giving encouragement to those whom they regarded as their follower followers.

Such a display of flames us was seen has not often been written in fire stoecs stores of witnessed in stores, buildings, or forests, or even witnessed in any blaze of city fires as was here. It was terrific and awe inspiring. From the advance of the flames greater danger was apprehended than from the direct effect of the heat or the fire hurricane that was expected. The fire partly encirled the clearing, then reversed, and the party had a chance to make a break before it retraced. When the start was made on the return trip to Abbitamn, the deserting followers were gone, some others were even left to find their war across the burned areas as bost as they could. For Starring, and the remainder of his followers is wa it was a weary, smothering, hot and a long journey. It looked like a sight seeing tour through the infernal regions. The distance was increased by the lack of knowledge of the path, because of the thick curtain of the smo oke the the smoke, the buffeting, pue punching blows of wind, the heat, and the durkness and the smoke, the buffeting, pue punching blows of wind, the heat, and the durkness and the strange black forms of every object caused by the glare in the sky. ground tremble. It seemed to the weary travelers as if the very flaming mountain tops swared above their heads.

To add to the horror of the situation, the travelers encountered every now and then a sort of ambueh formed by skilking glanded hisas, who in spite of the danger they too faced were so is triving to frustrate the investigators in their work. They had to fight their way through in the face of heavy gun fire, ass added by the other to fight their way through in the face of heavy gun fire, ass added by the other horrors, the enemy even used hand grenades, and scattered hordes of climicalism of the fire, and the undulating relations of in the region, were seen unid the glare of the fire, and the undulating relations of flames and the moke clouds everhead of the fire, and the undulating relations of flames and the moke clouds everhead of the fire, and the undulating relating form behind trees, and then behind trees, gliding and leaping over the rocks, durting from behind trees, and then behind trees, firing continually at every moving object of tarrings band throw a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment, killing and injuring some of glarrings followers without a single loss concentment.

As they reached the open country, another big clearing, great volumes of smoke as white as steam were leaving from a valley, and with that great danger hanging over the country side, it a was concievable that they must get back to the shelter of the ruing, which they finally reached, so it was to those that went to take photogrephs of this crater new nere forced to seek homes in theoretins as far from the forest fire as pessible. From Abbisann the sight of flaming hills lanked as if them Turn covered with incumdescent matter. Starring in an interview with the cautian of the Mary Jane predicted that the forest firm would continue to frustrate his efforts for a work or more before it would pass north of Abbienn. With that throat of danger hanging over the site of Abbieann it was becoming inconclevable that glarring and all his followers, hundreds yet in number, should remain there, in the face of the fate that had befallen the city. The scientists remained, to study the terrifying phenomena and the conditions that followed the passage of the dream if fire in the hope that something might be added to the sum of knowledge, sufficient to justify thr the risk, and be of great value in averting such awful calamitics made by the enemy or many weeks the summer sun did not look down upon even this ruined city of silence and colitade, shadowed by the dense clouds of smoke from the forest fires, the towering burning summits of high hills, the walls of smoke from valleys and plains, that fire that had poured forward in a fuor fiery sea that destroyed such huge forests, adding to the horror of the other disasters, forming into a combined catal con that if it had been a true one would be told in long defail, and in many novels, magazines and story books as long as the world shull Inst.

"This condition condition " said tarring to the captian " is brought on by the aid of such a dry summer we are having. You know Cartian, we have not had a urop of rain anywhere, throughout caiverinia and other states since early pril. This seems as if Nature was aiding the enemy to do his dirty work. If this fire goes on the country will be devoid of all its forests. The drafting of the men citizens of towns and villiages a is not helping any If a whole army of soldiers cannot step these flames how can the drafted men do it. Nothing but rain will help."
"Yes but it seems a dry summer follows a stormy showy winter." said the Captium.
"I never saw so much it snow as we had last winter. Now there is no rain. We cunnot hip ourselves we have to resort to the Almighty."

"Well" said gturing, after a few moments silence" I'm going to stick in these rules of the city now until the forest lives are burned out or naws passes us. There is no use in trying to go near to any of the explosion creaters, for it seems every time we make a decision to do su, the forest lites dome and trustrate our purpose. It is porter for us to explore more of these rules, look for reports on the disaster, lind witnesses it possible, and then when lavorable circumstances allow, then we, if go to the orders, and they down the disaster, "That's a go" he answered, and thet shook hands on it.

STARRING OBSERVES AWFUL SCRIES IN PARTS OF HEIDI JUNCTION WHICH HE REACHES HEXT..... WHOLE COUNTRY SIDE APPEARED TO BLOW UP SHIPS SAID TO HAVE BEEN SWALLOWED BY AN EMOUNOUS WAVE. HARPOWING TALES BY EYE WITNESSES OF THE DESTROYED CITY, RUINED BY EXPLOSION SHOCK. FIRE AND FLOOD ..

As the captian also told Starring, when the Abbicannian Government Relief Expedition was th first to penetrate the ager sections of the devastated districts, and had sent back messengers asking for more men and provisions, these gave detailed description descriptions of the terrible scenes, and said they were never able to find where the city of Abbieann had stood ... The captian remained at the spot untill it would be more favorable for a landing at the ruined city of Adeleishid or Adeleheid. Thon after waiting three days, they made a forced landing near the city ... hoping the heat of the debris left by the conflagration had cooled enough to allow an investigation. After a terrible experience in crossing fil gie fields of hot smouldering ashes, and blasing blazing fragments of trees, and rubbish, the more daring ones of the party, the little girls remaining on the ships, succeeded in reaching what had been the streetd of the city ...

In gtarrings party this time, were detatchments of his Calverinians, and a number of mangers, and Penrod and Radoliffe. The two girl scouts were invited to come but this time they declined fearing it was too hot for them. The few survivors who had been rescued were at Painer, and casy Know, suburban villiages, to which they had fled when the ex forest fire struck the explosion torn city. Nore than a thousand of them had died of starvation and exposure to the fierce heat, s n since the desti destruction of abbieann. The heat from the smoking ruins of Adeleheid was suffocating, and the stench from the charred bodies which filled the smouldering streets was almost unbear able. Only a few walls of buildings were standing. A house clock was found intact with its hands stopped at One minute after twelve, the exact hour a of the first earth tearing explosion

The offices of the Adeleich Adeleheid River and land underground cable company was partly standing but its left wing had disappeared. Not a drop of water could be obtained, and the still remaining darkness caused by the clouds of smoke from the forest fires raging elsewhere but close by shrouded the city, and continuous flashes of flame added to the horror of the scene. All the town was razed, and the smouldering ruins glared fearfully, and sent a pall of smoke high in the sky. Starring or any of his followers could not trace any of the strate, or by ways, and all he observed on ever every every side was huge heaps of smoking ruins and smouldering ashes.. At the landing place of the city Starring observed some burned and ruined walls, which he believed indicated the spot where a large factory had stood, and also slight traces of much larger places could be seen . One of the guides pointed to the spot w where hundreds of bodies had been found by the rescue workers lying in all attitudes, showing indeed that the victims had b met death as if overwhelmed by a sheet of fire. and the guide said that every vestige of clothing had been b rned away from them, and also also grim piles of bodies had been stacked everywhere, showing that death suddenly had stricken them while the crowds were vainly seeking escape from the strange and monsterous fiery deluge hurled upon the city by some of the nearest of the supposed, eruptions.....The guide indicated unother spot,,, where a group of nineteen hundred children were found in a mass of wreckage. wery one were locked in one anothers arms. This may have been the wreck of an orphan asylum. The anks of the city also were totally destroyed, and the money boxes fortunately were found intact. They contained in all over four hundred million dollars if it is be to be counted in American money, and also including other securites, which was sent on to Pandoraffor safe

Many of the parties with starring were overcome by the terrible heat and stench of the burned bodies, and the surgeons accompanying them were kept busy. Starring decided to report that there was no trace of anything of which he was looking for. The country around the city for as far as eye could see was covered with the smouldering flaring wreckage of the fire swept forests, and along the rivers banks only a few small trees half burned, all bent riverward by the force of the explosion blast, were only left standing. Starring wished to view the explosion crater near Adeleheid but was told it was dangerous because of the fires. The whole town indeed was a mass of smoking ruins under which many of the victims as he believed still li lay buried. Starring was told it was impossible to advance to the north of the city owing to the heat of the fire which was most intense. The nearest prtion of the unusual conflagration still presented a menancing appearance. Starring wrote on a piece of paper;

"I have inspected the city of Adeleheid first. I could not approach Adeleheidi as the heat is so intense a person cannot land on shore. I was able in the former to find the securit securities in the rained banks safe, buried under the rains of the banks, but could find no trace of any other important buildings, or even of the rubbish thrown into the city as would indicate lava. The town is strum strewn with barned corpses left hastily there by the survivors who fled when the forest fire struck the ruined city, the cremation of which the conflagration did of good work. Mothing is left of the villiages on the north section close to the city. The list of dead cannot be set mated."

However if he wanted to Starring could not have given a description of the horror of the scene to save his life. Hever since the world began, has human eye witnessed the real horrors of the greatest disasters and gruesome scenes of real calamities without a shudder and yet this was worse. As the guide said to gtarring;

"Before the forest fire struck the city, there were many hundreds of immense flaring funeral fires on which the bodies of the dead were hustily thrown thrown and these sent up their flames to mock the still flaring forests fires work of destruction beyond. It was estimated sir that over twenty thousand bodies of the dead had already been burned before the conflagration hit the city. Calverinian soldiers and surviving men citizens formed the cremation parties. They told me the work on which they had been engaged was the most terrible they had ever known, and the many bodies w many of which were already charred and scared by burns, and crushed by failing debris were souked with coal tar and gasoline to make them burn the faster. These awful funeral pyres were emormous heapacof wood and branches of trees, and one of these made as much flame and smoke as a house on fire. Upon these the bodies were hurled and what was left of them consumed. This was a precautionary measure to prevent the outbreak of disease and palgues. They were only about helf through with only a quarter of the number of bodies when the forest fire came on the town and the workers and the remaining inhabitants had barely time to escape with their lives, and a terrific glae suddenly arising scattered the embers of the funeral fires and started conflagrations in the city. The forest fire surrounded the city, and then it was totally doomed. """"

How long starring remained in his efforts to explore the ruins of Adeleheid he himself did notknow, but nevertheless the work of exploring the wreckage of the annihilated cityhas continued yet. Yet what was left by the fire, s there was enough already revealed to him to indicate that the very worst anticipations as to the result results of the explosions can be realised. All the streets and all the neighborhoods around, what had been before the disaster the best and most presperous cities of its size are now covered with heaps of ruins in all directions concealed no one knows how many dead bodies still below. As the guide suid, all the dead that he had seen were stark naked, their clothing having been burned from their bodies like so much tinder while they themselves were burned to death. In the vast majority of instances the greatest numbers died under the fallen ruins, but also fire also seemed to have been the sole cause of death to many. Twen as the guide had said, great numbers of the bodies had been burst asunder by the terrific heat and lie disemboweled. Yet in many instances the faces of the victims had been quite calm, for so many of them had been stricken down instantly in their beds while asleep without a moments warning, or with hardly any time to know of the deadly peril they were in. Others however who might have been awakened by the first uproar and tried to escape have on their faces un expression of indescriable terror. The entire city and the neighborhood while Starring was there reek with a horrible oror odor of burned flesh. The total number of dead Starring declared could be estimated at about fourty thousandd thousand, but as the disaster toi took place within fifteen minutes, and in that quarter of an hour the vast mahority of all these people were killed, it could not be fully estimated unless the number of survivors of the town could be known. It can be supposed so far however for Abbieann itself that there was nobody living apparently to tell the exact facts that there was suddenly shot upon the city by a most terrific explosion a terrific sheet of flame and hot clouds of debris, accompanied by a terrible gaseous whirl wind of other explosions to say, and horrible flashes in all directions, over the land andacross the sky, precisely such as are now reported as been seen by others.

Starring now believed this for in Adelcheid he came upon heap upon heaps of terrible smouldering ruins, covered thickly over where fires did not touch by the debris thrown by the explosion, earth rocks, gravel, dirt, and mud and all kinds of vegetation intermingled. That horrible revelations of the havoc wrought to human life which these grim mounds might—yet reveal can hardly be imagined. In all quarters of the city not a trace of even the streets that had existed can be seen.

Along the river front there were a few walls standing, and the ruins of the marf Companies could be seen. One of the most curious sights in Adeleheid was the faces and hands of many clocks of all sizes and even watches, which were not destroyed, and and they all furnished an important record in the story of this terrible catastrophe.

The hands of all these c.cl clocks and watches found had stopped at exactly one minute after twelve, showing that it was at that moment that the city was overwhomed overwhelmed by the explosion, and all those thousands of persons who did not escape on time were destroyed. Sturring then visited the camps where the refugees were, and finally heard this thrilling and painful story from the captian of a pansanger steamer a story of horror and pain, sorrow and terror. It is as follows, the captian being Francis St Pierre;

"The steamer Evening Bell of which I am captian, left Calverine on May 6th, and after a very long trip down the river was off Abbisann at six oclock in the morning of May the 3₁th. I noticed that not any too far away to the east a great forest fire was raging, and the whole horizon line there was walled up in the greatest check of rolling smoke I had over imagined of seeing. I told my mate it put me in mind of being on a river, running alonside the bettemless pit of hell with its smokes rising high into sternity. Having business in one of the southwestern wharfs of Abbienna I allowed the ship to creep slowly in tward the docks, finding there among others a score of other big ships, river ru r tugs, burges, pleasure crattand the like. I went to anchorage between seven or eight am A.N and got my passengers loaded on for the nr northward bound trip for Calverine at about pleven P.M. At night.

We remained waiting our turn to pull out as a number of ships were with us, and therefore we did not get a start untill about Twelve colock. We had hardly pulled our anchor when it seemed as if the country north of Abbicannia or Abbicann had opened out and was hurled into the air by a most terrible explosion. The shock hurled me down the stairs into the cabin. The great boom sounded as if all the navies of the world had blown themselves to pieces at once, and staggering to my feet, I rushed on dock and there came another such crash but much closer this time, the city appeared to disappear in a cloud of dust, there was the continuous awful roar of falling bu ldings and simultaneously a strange wall of fiery smoke and embors swept over the crumbling city and country side. The shock of the crash to the ship was terrible, and it nearly captelied her.

The steamer Evening Bell was struck broadside by the strange burning mass, and hearing the roar of a score of such explosions at once, and sooing the great wall of heavy smoke approaching the steamer accompanied by rolling and shooting flashes of fmale flame, all the the passengers on deck in panic and screaming wildly sought shelter wherever it was possible, jumping into the cubicoabins, the forecartle, and even into the hold. The flashes became terrific as if the whole country near Abbieann was being blown into the air, and the noise was earsplitting.

I was thrown by the second shock into the chart room, but the burning embers were borne by so swift a movement of the air that they were suddenly ewept in through the door and port holes, suffocating and sourching me most badly. These embors burned me terribly about the face and hands, but after the wroar seased I managed to reach the deck. I could not see anything of the city, it seemed to have sunk into the bowels of the earth, for it was obscured in a thick whitesh gray cloud. As soon as it was possible, when I reached the c decks, I musted the few survivors of the crew, who seemed able to move, ordered them to slip the anchor, leaped for the bridge, and rang the engineer for full speed astern. The second and third engineers and the two firemen were on watch below, and so had escaped ininjury. They did their part in their attempt to escape but some how or other the men on deck could not work the steering gear because it was jammed by the debris from the eruptions.

We accordingly went ahead and astern untill the gear was feee free, but in this running backwards and forwards, it was two hours after the first shock before we were clear of the wharfs. One of the most terrifying conditions I observed was that that the atmosphere being heavily charged with dust from the fallen bul buildings of the city, and the smoke of the explosions it wastotally dark like a closed room. The moon and stars were completely obscured and the air was only illuminated from the flames of the burning buildings of the city, and the shipping. It seemed small to declare declare that the scene was most terrifying in the extreme. As we backed out we passed closed to the burning ships, every one of which were a mass of flames. The steam was rushing from the engine rooms of a number of ships, and the screams and shrieks of those on board and the panics . I observed were terrible to hear and see. The cries for help were all in vain, for we could do nothing but save my own ship. when I last saw these vesnels a number were settling down. That was about two colock in the moring. morning. When the grening Bell was safe out of the River harbor of Abbieann and its horrors and desolation, I made swiftly for Pandora. Ariving here and when the ship was finally safe, I therefore mustered the survivors of my crew as well as I was able and searched for the dead and injured.

Many women and children I found in the saloon, where they had vainly sought for safty but the cabins were full of burning embersh ad been blown in through the port holes. Through these the fire of the explosions had swept as through funnels, and burned the victime were they lay or stood or cringed, leaving on some a circlar circular imprint of scorched and burned flesh. T and others brought a score on dock who were thus burned. Six of them were dead, the others wived survived although they were in a dreadful state of torture from their severe burns. Their screams of agony were heart rending.

Out of a total of fifteen hundred passengers on board the Evening Bell a hundred and fifty are dead, and the rest are in the Pandora Hospitals. And out of a total of fifty six of my crew on board, including myself, and the two mates, twenty are dead, and fifteen in the hospital. My first and second mates, my chief engineer, and others were killed also. The ship was covered from stem to stern with tons of earth debris. It was two cays after that I was able to briging completely to clear and search the ship for any damage done by this explosion rain, and to see if there were any corpses in the out of the way places. Then I searched I found some men women and children in the forecastle. Their bodies were horribly burned, and they had died in agony. And on the arival of the ship at Pandora it presented an appülling appsarance. Dead and calcined bodies lay about the deec deck which was also crowded with injured helpless and suffering passengers. At the sight of our ship immense crowds came throughing the river docks of the city. Prompt assistance was rendered to the injured by the aurthorities here, and the poor tortured survivors including my men were tak n to the hospitals and the news spread abroad that my ship had been caught in a volcanic erupi eruption. At first , thought it was that myself. The doud were buried and , had omitted to mention that out of twenty nine orphan children I had also on board, cix only survived. To make it worst for me most of the others had thrown themseles themsolves overboard to escape a dreadful death, but , believe they might have met a far worse one for it is the actual fact that the water was which was around the ship was literally at boiling heat, because that section of the river was flowing down from the part of the country where the hottest of the forest fires were raging on both sides. of the stream.

Indeed I will have to say that to many the escape of my big steamer was a miracle, the woodwork on the cabins, and the bridge itself, and everything that could burn on deck were constantly igniting, during the escape from the explosion zone, and it was with great difficulty that we fow survivors managed to keepthe flames down. The ropes, awnings and tarpulins were completelty burned up.

I witnessed as far as darkness would permit the entire destruction of the city of Abbiecan. The flames of the explosions envoloped the northern part of the city... with such rapidity that it was impossible that any person could be saved even if they had been awake and got out of the houses in time. Other sections of the city seemed to turn into white clouds and a terrible roar told me buildings crashed before the concussion of the explosions. The darkness of midnight was suddenly increased to that of crebus, but , could d distinguish by the light of the burning city, some people who got out on time at the first shocks running about distractedly in the streets closer to the dockes. The nearest of the burning buildings stood out from the surrounding darkness like black shadows. All this time the strange cruptions were rearing and the whole country side seemed to be shaking like the severest earthquikes. and in the intervals between these terrifying sounds. I could hear the tumultious cries of despair and agony from the hundreds of thousands who were perisheing.

And these horrid cries added to the terrot of the scene, but it is impossible for any one to describe its unspeakable horror or the dreadful sensations it happened to produce on me and , y survivors .. It was like witnessing the end of the world, and you were about to go on the left side of heaven, nd I can add that after the first shock was ever, the survivers of the crew rendered willing help to navigate the ship to the docks of Pandora, I do not know even to this day whether it is true that all the inhibatents of Abbieann perished or not, but there is no trace hardly of the city, and where it was at the lower sections a great lake is there now...It was about daylight fourteen days after the rawages of the vilcod that , made another trip to the location. We had rim through a forest fire shead for the site of abbieann, and at six fifteen oclock were at what we could then call our anchorage of the place called Heidi Magnolia's Landing .. We avigated some of the flood, for I could not tell which was or had been a river. When the agent with more men mostly investigators came aboard they told us that the flood had been acting ugly since its beggining and that the city of Abbieann was a thing of the past.

There were about eighteen other steamers and coasting craft moving up and down nub navigating the shoreard a shoreward part of the flood as near as they dared one of them being a River war Cruiser. Then there were six other large vessels and two revenue boats. The Abbieannian investigation boat put into the v berth next to ours and let drop her anchor. We however could see nothing of Abbieann and even soundings found no buildings under the water. But to go back to our horrible experience and telling of the first crash. There was first a terrific shaking of the air, as if some one had jostled me. I was looking tward what appeared to be a sudden and most terrifying eruption, and every soul then awake on board looked too. .I can describe however what we had observed of course, neither the awful thunder that followed but my thoughts were that if the end of the world would not exactly appear like that then what would it be like. It was just as if all the country side north of Abbieann had been blown up by a volcanic eruption ten times worse than the explosion of grakatoa. The concussion made it appear to me that the ship ji jumped up from the water and then down again, and immediately amid the crash as if of all the cunnon of the world being c discharged at one shot. a most immense pillar of flushing flame hurled straight up into the air, then it opened out wider than the huge black cloud itself, and came rearing down out of the sky upon the city und us. Some of us with my second officer Hendro Heid rushed to the forecastle to heave the anchor, I shouting orders frantically, and the chief engineer tried to get down below. As we reached the ships head, there was a crazy, wild earsplitting thunder of crashes that shook the ship like a frightful convulsion, and the fiery cloud was upon us. Fragments of stones and earth, flaming branches and wreckage, scalding water and real spinshes or flashes of flame dropped and clattered like heilfire all over the ship just as we got underway. There was another roar with redoubled fury, and with it all the water in the river harbor seemed to suddenly gather up and rush among the shipping. Every craft neeled over suddenly to the strunge tidal wave, and seemed to careen and sink. When the wave struck us it flooded us fore and aft, sweeping away the masts, smokestacks and all the boats and all the raffle on the deck and many persons who did not get away on time. I got into the cubin by that .:

that time, and was nearly killed thereby by the heatened flashes coming through the portholes, and being hurled about the cabin by the rocking of the ship before the force of the wave... I remained there for a few minutes before rushing back on deck and now and then I saw a charred and shricking sailor of a passenger rolling down the hatchway, and died as he went, so that quite a pile of corpses formed. I clambored to the deck, and began turning a hand to saving the injured who were lying all about though even then more debris were failing. As I was about this work, I went forward. I saw one sailor whose face was scorched beyond recognition. I o so saw no more of this man after that, though I had known him by his clothes, but I was told by one of the survivors that he had jumped overboard, and got on a raft that had been hurriedly put together. All this time the sea was r sea like expanse of suddenly forming waters was rolling like the heaviest kind of sea swell during a cyclone, more distant eruptions were still rouring, and the air was full of strange shocks. When I looked at Abbieunn while de p desperately pulling away for safty our ship, the sight was terrifying. One whole section of the city seemed to have disappeared under the waters,, the other part of the town was either gone of disappeared into intense blackness and in its place was a long wall of gray black smoking or rising clouds of dust. All about us all the ships were sunk or aflame and between us and them and the shore dead bodies floated singly or in groups. We escaped, but we do not know what happened to all those on the other vessels. I was taken care of also in the hospital of Pandora."

The guide himself told starring, and those with heem that an examination of the bodies of Adeleheid City indicared that one of the fiery storms hurled by the exp lis explosion nearest, and which which had burst over the town must have been comrosed of some strange posionous gases or chemeicals, for all the victime had their hands over their mouths and noses, or were in attitides showing that they made des --perate efforts to escape suffocation, and the like. Also all of the bodies not within the ruins were roasted. And the latest reports from the regions north of Adeleneid were to the effect that the land was in a strange position and that all of the country west of Abbieann had sunk, .. The refugees from Adeleheid had arived at Calverine, and one Calverinian cable steamer in trying to repair one of the river cables reported to have found the cable sunk in sixty feet of water, where only formerly it was only five feet below the surface . Also Starring was fully informed of the horrible situation at Wickey Lansin, where it was believed fully more than thirty five or fourty thousand lost their lives as a result of the concussion of the explosions, and that all r the reports were proove proven to be true. A good part of the city of wickey Lansin however was flooded.

Some time before some one had told at Starring that the whole of Abbieann had disappeared within ten -inutes into the bottom of the earth,, that all the inhabitants were instantly and horritly killed, and every place was desolated, and that the volcano near Abbieann called the Bottomless , had suddenly first du dischaged discharged a torrent of flery lava which rolled down its base engulfing everything before it and then blown itself up bury the city of Abbieann under its debris. There was no such volcano any where near Abbieann.

The guide then told this story about the destruction of Adeleie Adeleheid "The fear first began with the near approach of a dangerous forest fire, which headed northwestward tward the city he said. "He said." I don't live here, but I was visiting a friend at the time. On that morning of May 31th the inhibatants of the city awoke to find heavier clouds than usual covering the sky and shrouding the whole country side. Far away somewhere to the east horrid detonations were heard, being as they said echoed from Calverine far northward, to Francis Atlant southwest. The Strange c cannonading ceased before night, and a heavy strong smelling fog came upon the city hidding objects even as far as acrosss the streets. Then the inhabitanti were alarmed, but the mayor did everything possible to allay the vpanic, believing the forest fire would not touch the city. Who thought of an explosion coming.! I was on a river steamer that reached Adeleheid at about four minutes to twelve with sixty other passengers. We were watching the terrific glare of the forest fires in the far distunce, when with a most frightful roar, and terrific fire works lke like discharge, something similiar to a cyclone of flashes, debris and water and torrents of rocks swept down upon the city and river, sweeping all before it, and destroying a large fleet of small vessels at anchor.off the docks . There the accounts of the catastrophe so far obtainable for me caased. por twenty minutes all was smoke. I couldn't see a thing. Hot untill morning could we learned what had happened, and then heard that fourty thousand corpses were in the wreckage of this city. I and the sailors brought sixty eight half charred half dead homan beings on board the ship but eighteen of them died before noon, and only one of the whole number were even expected to recover. That awful morning the whole sky from horizon to horizon was hidden hidden behind a huge veil of violent and leaden colored haze...... Ernormous quanities of the wreckage of large and small shipping, and houses strew the surface of the river, which to my surprise seemed to be increasing in depth rapidly and beginns b minning to overflow the shore. Huge tress trees , and too often bodies were coming down the river. I feared a flood and then decided to leave for the hills but the Captian told me not to fewar we were too high to risk a real torrent .

That morning, boats, and larger shipping were edging off from the devastated city with women and children frantic to get away, and some begged for even a passage on the steamer. The whole country side around and north of the city was covered with broken trees of the forests, and furious seas of fire from the straight south, and southeast, were roaring on tward what remained of the city. The city here stretched nearly sixteen miles along the river water front. The smoking forest fires made a horrible background for the ruins which were burning in many places, and a frightful odor of burned flesh filled the air.

With greatl difficulty, I and a manber in a boat effected a landing. Not ae of not one of the weaker houses were left intact, and heups of earth, stones, gravel and all kinds of vegetation intermingled with clay and dried mud were seen on every side, and even then as now the streets could not be traced. Here and there amid the ruins were heaps of corpses, with all of their faces downward downward. In one corner of a ruined house, a hundred and fourty two bodies of men women and children were to my horror minglod in one awful mass,, arms and legs protruding, as the hapless beings fell amid the crashing houses in the last struggles of deathscagony.

Great trees with roots upward and scorched by fire and plastered with mud and gravel were strewn in every direction bilings blocks of granite stones were scattered abouid, and from under some of them the arms of a woman man or child could be seen protruding. And most nit notiable wasche utter silence and the awful overpowering stench from the many thousands of dead, and also sir the careful inspection showed that the fiety cloud of the nearest explise explosion what had overwhelmed the city must have been composed of psionous gases, which instantly sufficated every one who inhaled them, and of other yeases burning furiously, for nearly all of the victims as , and others had observed, had their hands covering their mouths, or were in other various attitudes, showing they had desperately sought relief from suffocation, and all the bodies appeared to have been rousted from the heat in the cloud itself

I found a horse and buggy and a man in a deard group in front of a ruined church. Every farm and plantation around Adeleheid had been destroyed. Stones and debris of all kinds fell further south than Adeleie Adeleheid and at Jemtorn. Many persons here were wounded, and about five hundred were killed. Calverine which is in a great distance from Abbieann and also Pandora was in darkness for a time bef because of the smoke of forest fires. poats and canoes and other ships crowded with refugees were said to have arived at Pandora, and their occupants had been recieved most kindly .. I was also on a ship heading for Adeleheid which had on board, a number of Governmental delegates,, a number of soldiers,, a detatchment of regular infantry, and fourteen priests bent to do what they could for the survivors. The vessel also carried a quanity of fire wood, petroleum, and quicklime, for use in the cremation of the bodies of the victims of the terrible explosion horror. Also on board were a large quanity of disinfectants, and stocks of clothing and provisions for the refugees. The refugee women and children of this city, Adelheid had assembled on the hills some distance from the city, and it was reported over a thousand of them had died, because of injuries, or overcome by the terrific ha heat caused by the fierceness of the forest fires razing in the distance. As we approached Adeleheld the country for miles around was covered with slowly moving water and with wreckage of houses, but when we arived near the city we came to higher ground all rolling forested hills and so steamed out of the flood zone. Then while nearing Adelahid Adeleheid the ship came up with a number of tugs, towing barges f covered with refugees.

Every one was crying. The heat from the distant forest fires, was almost suffoc ating, and we feared we e would not reach the city on time as the conflagration was heading for the city. Only a few good houses were still standing, or all of the stronger ones. When we got there we saw on all sides portions of corpses, which se were gathered up by the soldiers, and burned on one of the big open squares. Not a drop of water was procurable on the shore unless we chance drinking the dirty muddy river water, and the darkness caused by the clouds of smoke from the forest fire shrouded the town, and the terrible noise of the flames added to the horror of the scene. The buildings on the quays, and all qeaker buildings on the northward side of the city were razed to the ground. There was no trace of the streets. At the place we landed we came upon some ruined wall, indicating the spot where one of the big cathedrals had lately stood, and here in this locality hundreds of corpses were found lying in all kinds of attitudes, showing that the victims had died

Every body I came across did not have a piece of clothing on them, and in many cases their abdomens had burst open by the intense heat. Curiously enough the feat ures of the dead were generally calm and peaceful, though mostly on the faces of children children terrible fright and agony were depicted. Indeed I observed grim piles of bodies stacked everywhere sowing that death had stricken many of them, while the crowds who had escaped from the buildings after the first shock had vainly tried to seek refuge from the fiery deluge. Before the conflagration hit the city we boarded in trips back and forth nearly five thousand refuzees and took them from the vinixity vinicity of Adeleieh Adeleheid, and brought them to Pandora. Yet at that time the dearth of provisons was beginning to be felt throughout the region. Numerous families were completely ruined, and all shelterless, while the means at the disposal disposal of the aurthorities were much too far beyond means to cope with the situation. To make it worse communications were cut off from all the surrounding cities and towns by river, railroad, wires and so forth, except by vessels daring the perils of the flood, which were seized upon by the inhibatants to flee from the hell they were in. The stories I heard from the survivors at Adoleheid added to the awful details of the particularly harrowing account of the Abbieannian Passenger steamer called the St ann. Their chief engineer Reese Whilliams, who was then at the hospital at Pandora suid to me that the vessel loaded with women and children arived at Abbieann near midnight prepatory to land. Two minutes after twelve bells was struck, there was a damable crash and roar, and frightful eruptions near and close, far or scattered but scores at once was heard almost simultaneously, raging for fit fifteen minutes, causing concussions that threw down the buildings in the city, followed by four such frightful explosions as no mind can concieve.. Clouds of fire, smoke dust and debris mud and water, and vegetation of all sorts, toppling and roaring swept with lightning speed over the city and river. The St Ann was nearly sunk, and caught fire at once.

The concussion shook the air, and the boat was tossed by big waves. The Engineer said that he could never forget the horrid, fiery chocking cloud of horror which enveloped him from the sky. He said he rushed below, that he was not badly burned, not so bad as most of them. Most of the children being down below escaped when the unusual explosions came the engineer was going to his post to cast anchor. when he came up he found the ship all afire aft, and fought it forward untill morning, when some other ships which were said to have arived a little later came to the rescue. At the time the captian ordered me to up anchor. I got to the windlass, I noticed the captian was badly burned. He had inhaled flames, and wanted to jump into the water of the river, but we prevented him. The first mate was so frightfully burned that he died, having inhaled flame. From my own ship a good number were saved but they were in a frightful state, except the captian . Although on deck and unprotected, he was little burned. He said there was an awful noise of explosion, and then at once a cyclome of smoke fire and all kinds of debris, but such was the awful posionous checking nature of the smoke that it burned worse than fire.

Whom it struck people they fell dead. The cyclone of gas tore the mast at of the s hips, blew others up, and sunk many of them. Soon afterwards came a wave of fire bigger than the smoke cloud."

ADDITIONAL D'TAILS OF THE TERRIBLE CALAMITY.
STARRING OBSERVES SCENES THAT BAFFLE ALL DESCRIPTION.

STARRING realized now he was witnessing the aftermath of one of the greatest disast disasters that had ever happened. The disaster even at Adelheid was almost as complete as at Abbieann, even this city had x ceased to exist, and that half the population had perished. All the survivors were homeless and facing starvation and perils from forest fires, and were still in urgent need of all kinds of provisions, and that the visit of vessels that could come could come for the work of supply and rescue was imperatively required.

Even the Government had requested that for the purpose of rescueing the people who still are in such deadly peril and threatened with starvation, any one man may send as soon as possible the means of transportating all refugees found from the stricken zones, and convey them from the path of forest fires. The Secretary of war has also been directed, as well as the Navy to take such measures for the rollef of these stricken people as lie within the executive discretion, and they earnestly commended this case of unexampled disaster to the generous consideration of all the people of Abbieannia, Starring how that the profound impression made upon the people of Abbieannia by the terrible calamity was manifested by the action of the proport when he succeeded in raising great contributions as well as the nation also in mobolizations by the wholesale and so forth, to crush Glandellinia. Others had been sent to report the extensive character of the catastrophe.

Flags in cities and other parts of the country, and in fortifications, and within christian armies, and all other places as well as in all priviate residences were flying every day at half mant because of the disaster throughout calverinia, and the loss of Abbieann. Members of sixteen hundred families in Calverine were lost in the Abbieann disaster.

Starring made a statement in regard to the unusual explosions around Abbieann which he declared was very much similar in effects as the St, Pierre dia disaster when a volcano there exploded from its side but of a hundred times a greater violence than Krakatoa, and was probably caused by some unknown high explosives of some high of an most immeasureable quanity. Starring said to the captian, as he had spent some time in the study of explosions, and is considered an authority on the subject;

Thin is what he waid:

"All the evidence gleamed from the newspaper accounts and from a magazines and other writing, and story books is all contradictory, and inconclusive. The blasts were of the explosive type similiar to those which made our big floods before, but different in the nature of the destruction, and thesize of the flood. In the case of this great disaster the explod explosion was great enough to powder most of the debris-ro this the still white hot flashes of the immense quantities of powders can be ascribed the destructive fire in the city of abbieann with a ten billion dollar loss, and among the shipping in the river harbors and docks. The report of a terrific rain of fire, was simply this white hot flashes of still unburned powder. Gases probably were present and did burn, but any fire from this source would have ascended, owing to the lighter weight of the gas. The sudd on hurling of clouds of water and mud in another explanation worthy on theypresent evidence of the depth the explosions dug. The explosions are peculiar for they had enough force to powder most of the debris ejected."

Starring still heard other evidences of experiences from persons in the great disaster. This was from a passenger on a ship. He had left Francis Atlanta for Abbieann at midnight on the 20th of May and arived at the latter at about eleven oclock of May the 30th. For the captian and his crew the greatest difficulty was experienced in getting near the city, the air being thick with smoke of distant forest fires, and the night darkness intense. The ship had to group its way to the anchorage.

Appalling sounds were issuing from some distant places, and clouds of of smoke for a moment conveloped the steamers deck where the passengers and the others were gathered gazing at the glow of the fires, some being engaged in trying to take night photographs of the scene. Rearing a most tremendous report as if a million bombs going off simultaneously, and seeing a roll of smokewisi smoke rise high into the sky, the passenger dived into the room, dragging with him another men, and shutting the door tightly shortly after the first immense crashes had ceased, he heard a voice which he recognized as that of one of the Captians crew. Opening the door with great caution, he drew him in. The nose of this man was burned by the intense heat. And this passenger was the only one on board out of a number of one hundred and eighty nine that escaped uninjured. The heat being unbearable, he ermorged a few moments and the scene that baffled his eyes or greeted his eyes baffled all description.

All around on the deck were dead and dying, covered with mud, roxrocks and gravel, There they law little children, as well as men and women, and indeed the appa appeals of the children for water was heartrending, and even when water was giving to them they could not swallow a group for their throats were filled with the burned powder, or burned with the heated air. On the aft section the ship was burning,, and he finally jumped overboard, and stranger still found the water.

of the river intensely hot. He declared he was sweptat on ce by a wave in the river, which washed him against an upturned river motor boat to which he desperately clungs-finally he was h joined by a man so dreadfully burned and terribly disfigured that he could not be recognized. Afterwards I found he was the caption of the ship, and he was in dreadful agony, and begged piteously to be put on board the ship. Securing some wreckage which contained some bedding and a tool chest, hewith the help of ten others who joined him on on the wreck, constructed a rude raft, and placed the caption on it. Then seeing two upturned rowboats, he asked asked one of the men men to swim and fotch it. He did so picked up two of his country men, and returned to the raft. Secing a ship which had escaped the effects of the eruptions, he paddled the raft twurd it waving a white flag. They beere rescued and taken to rrancis Anna. Three of these did do before reaching the port. A number of others have since died.

None on board the s hip were ever known to recover. The one who had saved himself said the scene on the burning ship was awful beyond description. The grouns and cries of the dying, forv which nothing could be done at all was horrible beyond all comprehension. He described even if a woman as being burned to death with a living baby girl in her arms, and that it seemed as if the whole world was after.

The infinal inflamable material in the forepart of the ship that would have ignited that part of the vescel, had been thrown overboard by him and some others.One other ship disappeared as if blown up by a submarine explosion whatever he hadcheard made Starring now realize that the Bengall state catastrophe was even more terrible than at first reported. Refugees streaming past even now declared that their homes were wiped out by forest fires, that streams of water are turning boiling hot, and that large areas are still submerged.Other districts are also xr crowded with refugees. Almost half night darkness still continues.

After more investigations further on, starring we wrote this note,-

"To general Robertsonia ...iviani .----

All river villiages near Abbicann including the city of deleichid and Adeleheid, were destroyed simultaneously with the bigger city. The entire Aegion is covered with explosion debris, and great forest fires is making our work painfully slow. Smaller streams have dried up, ad and still thousands of persons are flocking to the hills not knowing where to go persued by fires. I do not believe untill connumi cations are restored that our country can relief relieve the stupendous distress, famine is said to be raging, and plagues also, and there is more urgent need of ofor the services of the Abbieann Red Cross. The terrible supposed eruptions, is not yet discovered. The central and eastern parts of Adeleheid struck recently by the forest fires are still burning, wery body among the refuggees is mourning the loss of relatives and friends. Eusiness in other cities not touched by the disaster is at acomplete standstill. Abbieann was the financial and provisioning city of Calverinia. Elsewhere the forest fires are still raging more violent and disasterous explosions may follow. That I have seen tends now to confirm and emphasize the horrors of the terrible blow that has fallen upon Abbieann and all of southern and central calverinia. Indeed no such appalling disaster, distinguished by the suddeness of the bloow blow, the number of victms cit victims, the immeasureable property loss, and the great flood and forest fires, the completeness of the desolation, the reported force and effects or the explosions, has ever come home to the civilized world with so overwhelming and harrowing a force. The convusion convulsion of nature in grakatea was not greater than the alightest of these terrific explosions, and nothing can compare.. Our Government requests our aid in transporting what refugees we can from the stricken region, where famine stares all in the face day by day. Every gtate overnment has appealed for aid. Abbieann is surely wiped out completely, and the inhibatants of the surrounding towns have also all perished. In the city of St Vincent which ISLL I'll reach next they saw thousands have perished, and the land has been laid to wate. waste .Plantations have been wiped out by the explosions, and floods, countless stock have been killed, hundreds of millions dollars worth of crops destroyed, and the means of subsistence have been wrested from the people .

From present indications the forested country around the explosion and flood zone have been turned into a smouldering smoking desert of hell by the remains of burned trees, and so far as I have discovered fifty thousand homeless have been counted by me, and no one is able to xa care or provide for the, them. It is a most fortunate circumstance that we do not have to wait to find ways and means for extending help on occassions like this. All our people are not only willing, but they have been doing all in their power to aid. The machinery for collecting and distributing aid had been as I read in papers sent in motion at the first news of the disaster, and we know by experience how effective is the work trusted to be accomplished. The impulse to give has stirred the heart of every as one and we hope as soon as communication is restored something can be done in bringing a speedy relief to all..."

10,000 persons killed in the city of St Vincent De Paul.

GREAT ALARM AS TO THE FATE OF THE COURTRY SIDE. AWFUL SUDDENESS OF THE CALAMITY AT ST VINCENT DE PAUL. GRAPHIC STORIES TOLD TO STARRING BY WITHESS; S OF THE HEAREST OF THE DEADLY EXPLOSIONS.

Arter the inspection of the city of Adeleheia was over Starring boarded the ship once more with his forces and the four ci child scouts, and by night the whole force started next for the city of St Vincent De Paul where conditions had been reported to be worse outside of biblioann ... The great explosion took good effect on this city as he heard and a shower of stone, and clay had even fallen thirty miles away from the city itself, and dust was two inches deep. Seven thousand dead had been the first report, but now it had been estimated that the total number of dead had reached near ten thousand. and most of the victims were said to be women and children as half or over half of the men population were either out in the army or had been drafted by the government to aid rangers and the others to fight the terrible forest fires. Hundreds of met most beautiful estates in the vinicity had been ruined. Throughout the whole region north of the disaster zone great alarm had even now been felt regarding the fate of such a beautiful town as St Vincent De Paul, and also Abbieann. At that time a gigantic forest fire was beaing furiously down upon this city, which was surrounded by forcets and which had not been touched by the floods, and the northern region of the country had been utterly destroyed. It is feared that even the estimate of IO,000 dead is exactly too gmall . From the news of the stupendous disaster the whole nation still was greatly exp excited .

Starring was willing to go slow with this part of the trip after leaving the ruins of Adelcheid, for he felt he must rest up after withstanding the terriple hardships and his encounters with the horrible sights that he had witnessed every minute of the two days of his stayb there.. starring had been surprised when he reached St Vincent De Paul city, that no more dead were in sight. But he was told that thousands of bodies had been strewn along the streets only a week after the disaster, and others being at least partly buried under the wreckage of the buildings, but now all of the podies found on the surface at least had been buried a week after the disaster, but none of those in the ruins had yet ceen dug out as it was impossible. It would require months, unless a greater force of men is employed,, otherwise all of the dead could not be properly disposed of Every moment of his stay in Adeleheid Starring and followers feared greatly that the forest conflagration would come up as stated and surround the city wi y with its billows of death dea, ling fire. The fire continued to rage elsewhere, great clouds of flames sometimes almost roffing the sky above making a most awe inspiring scene. Starring discovered that the reports that all of the surviving inhibatants of St Vincent De Paul had been brought away saftly from the danger zone was not true... No one had escaped here. Like at Abbieann. A great wave of debris hurled by the explosion swept across one prtion of tye the city, destroying the lives of all in that section in an instant. The others were said to have fled down the river shore, and were rescued by some ships, but this had not been, confirmed.. Other williages near St Vincent, were destroyed by the explosion, and a flood of debris was hurled o all over the city.

Creat indignation indignation against the plandelinians grew, and grew as the panic among the survivors subsided, and so many men victims of the di saster who survived entered the army to fight that few of the survivors had any males among them. It is well remembered that while other disasters had occured elsewhere throughout the autum and winter and ea I eas early summer, glandelinia was committing vile massacres of children esle elsewhere. Everyoweek as far as the abatement of the flood would allow some provisions had been brought here and there for the refugges, but famine continued elsewhere. Starring could observe where ever he came upon refugees that they were all on half rations, and when it can be also remembered that danger ous pestilences is also an immediate menance, it can be understood why there should be plenty of food to give to those who may be attacked strength to fight the disease. What gave starring some hope however was, that the nature of the flood , its results and the difficulty of any persons getting to the disaster zone, for one good instance prevented any such an added horror as vandalism, and anyhow so complete was the devastation that there would not have been anything for the Glandelinians to loot to boot.Of course a there are the most severe capital penalties methed out to all who are caught stealing in the wreckage.

As Starring was ariving into the vinicity of the city of St Vincent De Paul he met with a covernment Tug, sent from Fancis Atla, which arived at the same time, bringing with it five members of the Gemini, a ton of supplies for the survivors, consisting of wholesome foods. The tug had been compelled to go twenty miles out of her course because the tug encountered a column of the tyickest thickest smoke and seething flames flames on both sides of the stream which she could not pass. In the river also were a number of ships and boats inconstant readiness to take away the workers, if the forest firec bears down upon the town as is warned, and a deligent watch is constantly maintain ed ready to give eet ze warning, and if the conflagration turns in the direction of St Vincent De Paul the place will be immediately deserted. Pesides to those working in the ruins, starring could observe not a single human being within the city. All was have not been killed have no would felt to some wemate country. On poard this tug, was a man who witnessed the distaster from the start, and who gave this account of the event p preceding the disaster at St vincent and Abbieann and also of the catastrophe itself, as backed by other eye witnesses, who were on the River Coal Battage barge, called the "queen" Before the catastrophe a strong body belonging to the scientific commission, presided over by Dargar Horner assemed assem bled in Abbieann on May the 21th, the fr few days before the calamity for the purpose of studying the effects of the raging fore t forest fires. It was for a time agreed by the members of this commission that the relative direction of the movement of the conflagration, and the valleys debouching out on the river regions, were such that the scientists tould affirm that the security of the region was complete as long as the wind retained a southwesterly or a westerly direction, and this announcement was made to ally the fears of the ffi frightened citizens.

The moon rose clear over St Vincent at about six lock oclock in the evening of May the 3Ith. The great forest fire was raging to the southward, and the wind was blowing northeastward. A few minutes before twelve oclock a great white column what appeared to be smoke and dust, suddenly be inched forth from some section o not far from North Bend, and which appeared to suddenly open up a rent in the ground for a Li long distance. The outbreak caused the utmost consternation and panic among those of the inhabitants of the city who were still not in their beds, who fled tward the river parts uttering frightful screams. There was a terrific noise that would have drowned out the lounest thunder ever heard and a moment later a gignatic mass of thick impenetrable black smoke torn by terrific red flashes poured upward and forward and fell with frightful rapdity ipon the city. In a very short time before the shocks the whole city was a mass of ruins. From the concussions the waters of the river were violently agitated and everywhere was heard the sound of railing houses, and vessels were seen to oveturn and sink or burst into flames. Also the cries of the doomed beings on shore, and afloat lasted only a few moments, when the stillness of death fell uponnthe city and the whole region.

Only six vessels of all the shipping in the harbor of thi this city had withstood the terrific apparent convussion of nature. Many of the survivors who were saved by the surviving ships crews, declared they had sprang overboard, and despite injuries recieved by falling debris, and rocks and fiery clouds, succeeded by diving and swimming for two or three hours in sustaining themselves, untill they were picked p by the crews of the surviving ships.

Nothing then had remained of the city of St Vincent except vast nears of smoking ruins, indeed resembling a vast furnace of the infernal regions. But here and there in the open spaces large numbers of partly purned, and asphyxiated bodies could be seen lying on the ground or amid the ruins. It had taken thousands of workers to dig out and pury what dead they had been able to find. The smell of the burning flesh had been observed three miles away. owever now as it was luck for Starring access to St Vincent was much easier, and by this time the ruins or the city had ceased to smoke. It has been learned by him that the surange rain of fire ceased at a distance of one hundred yards from the city of Wickey Lansin. Starrings talk with survivors of the disaster at gt Vindent, confirmed to him all the previous statements as to the awful suddeness of the catastrophe. It is thought that an ernormous quanty of some umknown explosives might have been liverated, with gas liquid also, producing by force and noise great atmp atmospheric pressure, which overwhelmed everything before it, and tye the concussions which leveled every building. The strange fumes absorbed by th the bodies of the victims caused them to burst, and the fire coming aftr afterwards carponized them ...

This no doubt was followed by a terrific rain of all kinds of rocks and debris which enveloped the city, and one survivor said he had been out late that night and said at the moment of the explosion he hau the impression of being violently drawn tward the explosion by a strange powerful currentbof iar. Then the whole country opened into eruptions, according to the description of the κ man, and flung tornadoes of fire and debris at every city and town within range.

On account of the great disaster, and because of its effects Starring had heard that throughout Abbiemania and the other states all business had suspended, and this was alarming news to him. The people in all cities had towns had day after day month after month assembled in the churches, at all hours, Cathederals and the like, where often special services were and are being held for the dead of all the war disasters of the people and a services where and are the services of the case of all the war disasters of the services of the case of all the war disasters of the services of the case of all the war disasters of the services of a services of a services of the case of all the war disasters of a services of the case of all the war disasters of a services of the case of all the war disasters of a services of the case of all the war disasters of a services was reging, and many sections of the disaster zone was now becoming entirely depopulated, as people who can were moving off northward. Starring on boking things over observed that prov provisions were needed in the vinicity of St Vincont immediately for nearly three hunsed thousand poeplepeople, and a ship load of line or lime for sanitary purposes, for the stench there from the dead bodies was overpowering. Starring hower said about general Hendro Derka: the Great Gemini;;;;;

"I have heard that general Dargar has asked the aurthorities of every city by telegram to render and continue assistance that can be possible. Great praise is given the great Gemini leader. He and all his followers have worked desperately and and inf indefatigably to succor the survivors that are so hard to reach because of the nature of the disaster, and the destroyed communications. He in person has bandaged the limbs of the wounded, and has worked without sleep and food, and they say he is now completely exhausted. For Fourty persons rescued from the ruins by him, are in a hospital at Calverine. In addition to the species already secured, and $100,000,00 were rescued from the half ruined bank of St Vincent. The whole nation was said to be quiet. and Strange to relate, in view of the great number of inhabitants of St Vincent who were swept to death by the midnight explosions, Starring learned that very few corpses had been found by those who had been engaged in the worl of burying and cremating the dead bodies. This may be due to the fact the that the most populaous populious quarters of the city are buried under the wreckage of all their tall houses , and with the conflagrations raging in the ruins, the bodies under near underneath might have been entirely consumed. Starring also heard of many strange and most incomprehensible incidents which had been recounted in St Vincent. The charred remains of a little girl, with her clothing still on, and unburned, and in perfect condition had been found there.

The crisp bodies of young children have also been found, but also the clothing they were were uninjured though their bodies were charcoaled. The path of the strange torrent hurled by the near explosion which swept over the city of St Vincent, Starring discovered marked out in the strangest manner. The vinicity of the northern limits where the vessels were destroyed was swept by a whirlwind of flame and smoke, which ripped, tore and shattered everything in its passage but left few traces of debris behidn. On the other hand, the centre and adjoining southern parts of the city, were only shaken down by the concussion of the explosions and also recieved a rain of debris hurled skyward by the explosions, and then fires broke out which consumed everything that could burn.

Every one Starring talked to of importance, told him that ever since the catastrophr catastrophe occured the work of succoring the refugees continued incessantly and still was going on .. One ship filled with refugees rescued, had to pass through clouds of smoke and flaming embers close to a forest fire, at the risk of catching fire, in order to a bring the refugees to a safer place, and then to repeat the harrowing experience in order to reach the other terrir terror stricken people waiting for aid.

But this ship succeeded b in bring to the nearest places of rerugee 5,078 people mainly former residents of what survived in villiages around St Vinvent. This was on a g n Sunday night, a week before starring came. Since then the steamer as the result of other most daring trips through "HELL" had succeeded in bringing many other persons to safty places. On the very day before Starring arived she rescued nearly a thousand persons, and piloted some half injured ships, who took on board other forest fire u fugitives. The other ship the Mary Ann having done everything possible in the efforts being made to succor other fire fugitives left the region on such a mission just an hour before Starrings arival. Tugs had distributed to the sufferers still remaining large quantities of buscuits, milk, brandy, and cheese. Starring was emotionally interested in the stories of survivors, and in the efforts for weeks and weeks being made to succor the refugees of both disasters. A woman named Marie St Claire, who was a hospital nurse in a hospital in St Vincent, and who was among those taken to a refugee camp untill she could be convoyed to a j hospital, in describing her experiences, said that on the night of the terrible disaster, she had just finished her prayers and gone to bed, and was hardly asleepp, when she heard a loud report, fe t felt her bed j jump wildly, the furniture she observe dance, and noticed the rocking and swaying of the house, wherein she fainted. When she regained her senses, a few hours later, she was under some wreckage horribly burned, and glacing around she saw no one else alive. This laiy though she survived tobtell the tale said she would never be able to forget it as long as she lived...

A little girl whose name was Mary shannon, the nine year old daughter of the Mayor of St Vincent, who with her mont mother, two brothers aged five and six,, and one sister also aged six, was asleep in their beds when the explosion came . This little girl is in a hospital in Pandora, and is not expected to live. Her Aunt Clara Shannon, who was in the refugee camp at which Starring visited told him the following story of her experience;

"I was just preparing for bed, when the butler called out to me;

"Look at that awful cloud shooting up inthe air."

"I immediately immediately went to the window, and as I saw a vast mass of black and white cloud come rushing forward as it seemed to envelope us all, with a strange noise, there came a tremendous report, which caused all the windows of my room to fly out and the whole house to shake fearfully.Part of the house crashed, and I rushed to my clothes closet in panic, suddenly experiencing a feeling of suffec ation, which was followed by intense heat. The other section of the house broke into flames. As I was not hurt, I assisted my nephews and neices to escape. They were carried out of the house, just as it crashed to totall ruin. when we got to the street the two little boys died. His mother also died, the two sisters however surviving but terribly burned. Im I fortunately did not sustain serious injuries."

Starring found there were after all many survivors out of the city of St Vincent and all these refugees of the explosion disaster even new continued to be greatly broken by the terrible experience through which they had passed. Starring saw the Mayor who new survived and he was in a pitiable condition, and he cannot take his mind from the scenes. He was the last to leave the ruins of his purning home. And he speepoke in the highest terms of those who did such noble rescue work in the race of dire perils . The captian of another ship reported to Starring that at about fourty two miles southwest of Accieann, after the explosion horror on the late morning of June the First, the river rose and increased in width a dand its current sped with c great fury, breaking as if on rocks. This continued for hours, then the river broke its bounds. The schooner labored very heavily, but sustaining slight damage, though beyond control during the phenomenom. It was believed the action of the flood elsewhore did this. Shocked by the news of the disaster at Bengall State and elsewhere, which had destroyed his residences at Adeleheid, wharehouses and stores, an aged merchant of Calverinia, sat silent and amazed on a pier near the refugee camp, and when questioned by starring at first only looked at him vacantly. Sitting beside him was his eight year old daughter. Near him stood his wife, portunately he had not been in Adeleheid at the time of the disaster, neither had his wife or child. They had been in Pandora, having left Adeleheid because his daughter had wished to see what the great Pandora city was likee like. As he refused to speak his wife said;

"We had also a home in Adelsheid, and another in St Vincent, on the stream called the Morne Rouge, near the mountains" she said. "These whomes of ours were filled with valuable curios and men mementoes of various trip cal islands which even the biggest sum of money could not e replace. All these and my husbands places of husiness are owept away. The loss to us will reach $10,000,000. We had many friends among all the people here including the Mayor himself and his wie wife and children. We usually remained in Adoleheid city all the summer. My little daughters desire to see the bigger city of Pandora proved our salvation."

Her husband was so terribly overcome by the news of his loss that he could not find voice to talk. Starring also learned that dispatches from the Local regions were giving more attention to the living and the injured than the dead,, and had become more urgent in their calls for food supplies for the millions of refugees. As it said before because of the cutting off of Vivian Wickey by the seige, and the wars horrid pprogress Abbieum was the storehouse and main supply station for the whole of Calverinia, and all of its supplies have been destroyed by fire, or swept away in the ernormous flood that had followed. In addition a large tract of country as big as the whole of North merica has been laid waste by flood and forest fires, and battle and massacre florrors thus depriving the surviving inhabitan ts of vegetable and moat supplies, for the cattle and all other kind of farm unimals and fowls are reported dead or dying of starvation.....

licarly two months have clusped since the great disaster begun, / and no one knows when all of the refuses can be reached with supplies, and this new disaster has rende rendered more cleatitute those who were homeless because of other disusters, and it was harder to reach them, for they had not been fully succored either as disaster

after disaster had come so quick one after the other./

All other cities and towns as Starrin; knows have surplus food that could have sen sent to the disaster zone in a day or two if all communications had not been destroyed, and thus aff rd relief enough untill the urival of the larger supply ships sent from bigger cities and ports. As it occured at night, at all points within the disaster explosion zone, and mostly all the inhabitants of the towns and cities, were evidently in bed sound asleep no one had a chance to escape. The ejacta thrown upward by the explosions came down like cloud bursts, and the cities were caught like rats in a trap.. If every one had been out in the streets there may have been some show, they could have fled under cover, or to the rivers. In many towns the river shipping at the docks did not ga have a ghost of a show to get away. Yet every one who knew the cities and towns and its people can easily imagine the scenes of wild horror that must have been inacted when the excitable people aroused by the first c ash realized that escape was impossible.imps.

STARRING HEARS MORE MARRATIVES OF MEW AND WOMEN WHO HAD THEIR OWN TERMIDLE EXPERIENCES, SCHIES IN THE STRUCKEN REGIONS.

Additional horror day after day had been excited since the disaster happened, by every account furnished of the terrific explosions and concussions and floods caused by them, which was published by all newspaper concerns and correspondents, throughout the region, and here is another which Starring himself heard from the experience of a war correspondent himself:::::

"Tre sir I had hard times to go through the devastated regions in which I explored in order to get pictures if I could, for all communications between the triple disaster zone, and all the country is destroyed, and so many hills here and there are so covered with forest fires of the most severe kind that they appear like a great number of volcances in terrible eruction. The nearest of the fires was twenty five miles east of AdeleheidI, and yet the flames from that could be visible more than a hundred mile miles and the smoke four hundred. when I first heard of the disaster Inwent out and believe me after two months of the travel I believe I had passed through hell. Never again. But I'll tell you my whole story sir. Knowing that I wished to go on the special trip the City Government of Francis Atlanta paid my passage on a refugee boat. It left the city at seven oclock in the morning. I wished at that time sir not to go to view the results of this Abbieann disaster, for it had not happened then but some of the later ones before that. I must tell you sir 7 arived at Abbieann in time to participate in a part of the horror and only a miracle saved me. Terrible flames from the distant forest fires raying onward along the eastern woods were visible during the entire journey journey. At midnight it was seen that a big ridge of hills were all afire about fourty miles away. The ship ran into a dense gray cloud, and the people on deck were almost suffocated and went below to get relief.

The atmosphere became so dense with smoke that we could not see a thing ahead of us. We were then encountoring an unusually degree of heat, which finally forced the captian to order the steamer to be put about, and steam northward untill we could be clear of the dense smoke and get away from the unbearable heat. At four oclock the steamer put back tward the original course again, and encountered a thicker cloud of smoke rolling northwe northwestward, and was again compelled to put off.

It arived about ten miles south of Adeleheid at about six oclock in the morning morning of May the 26h. It was seen that the forest fires were dangerously close and there was a tremendous roar of explosions occeassionally in the distance which I believe came from the dynimite used by the fighters to breach the forest in the path of the flames. Great flashes of fire played incessantly over the smoke filled sky, and there was a fog from it all day. The forest fire was first observed so close on the week before my arival. Huge volumes of flames shot u ward, and the people in all that district were fleeing. There had been a continuous uproar all that time. The northern forest district from west of Heidi Junction to Evan SVille has been completely destroyed by the fire. It was impossile to proceed beyond that point on account of the hot debris left by the fires. The whole region was on fire. A huge hill was observed to be lit rally burning up. On the 27th and the 28th, the whole country side was covered with wreaths of dense smoke, and everything was ruined by the heat and the smoke. Many persons were brought to Adeleheid in boats from towns menanced by the forest fires. All of the refugees were nearly dying of thirst, and all of these people had been thirty seven or fourty hours without a drop of water. All of the cattle were dead because of the heat and he lack of the water. And on account of the scarcity of water and the destruction of communications, it was impossible at present to go into the ing interior and investigate the extent of the forest fire disaster, and tward where it was heading. It was impossible to sau say just how many people might have perished in the flames if any did, but the number will probably run into the scores. We left Adeleheid at nine oclock in the morning of May the 29th with orfe orders to tow a relief boat full of refugees to or near Abbicann. A quarter of a mile further on near North Bend we recieved a message by shore from a boat that because of the forest fires about to cross the stream, the passage would be impossible. impossible. Mevertheless we proceeded on our voyage. When opposite north Bend there was a ground virw of view of the forest fire now only ten miles away. The whole sky was covered thickly with rolls and cauliflower like columns of smoke and there was un incessunt flushing of flumes through them... Great quanities of sparks and light embers were blown in clouds in the dr., and were fallig falling tward the river obscuring everything. It was impossible to get close to the town of Costello. We attempted to proceed to St vincent through a great cloud of smoke overhanging the river and the country side,,, but found it impossible. It meant suf ocution to try it. We returned and entered the bolt again miles down the river w but there, it was the same,,, result. On the horizon there was nothing to be seen but rising smoke clouds and leaping flames, and overhead the sky was dark...

On the orizonthere was nothingto be ween soon but rollingclouds and leaping flames and other forest fire scenes. We were forced to put back because of the fierce heat and set stoamed down the river to find a branch stream that might conduct us past the fire and give us an opportunity to reach Abbieums. Opposite Turpo Town we encountered a hot gale of wind carrying clouds of smoke and debres debris. To the north the entire territory of the danger zone was clearly visible. Besides the large forest fire numerous smaller ones were agle and smoking or blazig, and the rear portion of the main one where it had passed and left only the smouldering embers a great stretch of white and gray cloud rose thousands of feet high. Buch of the smoke was going westward and it was quite durk. When we were close to Turpo town we passed to the windward along the center of the river tward St Vincent, and saw no sign of life. It is believed that every person within the forest fire zone had left. The refugees at the towns were in dancer.

It took us a long time to get within range of Abbieann, and we got there just on time sir, to see the terrific disaster. First we heard a m s most extraordianry noise, moreextraordinary, than those ever heard when a tornado approach approaches. It seemed like when a flock of Blengiglomenean creatures were wining winging tward us us fast us they can fly. Just previously the air had been very calm, although the moon and stars were obscured by smoke clouds. At the same moment when he heard the sound he fel felt a strange vortex of air likened to a swift passage of some heavy body. Then there was a most terrific roar,, a noise similiar to the firing of some huge comnon but a hundred million times louder to my way of believing it, and I saw a huge black cloud rising high in the air with the under part arching downward and rolling and rapidly traveling tward Abbieann and all over a as far as eye can see . The boat I was on was twelve miles from the city, As the cloud traveled I heard other numerous explosions far or near, as if whole fleets of volcances were firing a tremencous Krata Katkaoa eruption at each other. A spur of some hill, and a stretch of dark forest prevented me from seeing what happened at Abbleann, but I distinctly heard the roar of falling buildings. I ran to awaken the captian, who however had been aroused, for all on board came running on deck, but all at once something blackand stifling enveloped all of us, followed by a shower of something scorching and hot our rinning flared into flame, mo many of us writhed on deck o in mortal agony and r only gaved myself in the neck of time when I rushed below. I heard that Abbieann was wiped out, and I believe the cloud had been some species of fire damp produced by the awful magnitude of the explosion , which had been wide enough to envelope the city and the country all around .. "

After this interview Starring and his followers left St Vincent city, being more distressed by the probable fate of the city having not hardly believed it before. As the boat traveled onward, the whole crew, and all on board including starrings followers were on the alert, and every eye was directed tward the forest fires. Tverybody on board was afraid that the forest fire was going to cross the river through the section which the ship must passs, and destroy everything before it. For several days di during the onward trip, the forest fire had been traveling on, and immense quantities of forests had been destroyed by this time. Many inhabitants from other villiages villieres were still fleeing before it, some had asked to be taken on board, and Starr ing himself said there was no room. Starring even while in the cabin could see the forest fire from the rear windows, and although the nearest portion was said to be to be fully five miles away, he could hear the roar of the flames and seei the fire rushing upward with terrific stretches and speed, and the immense clouds rolling upward tward the heavens as if the whole world was burning and tye the end of the world had already come... hile traveling on they passed a town covered with smoke and fog and which had also been hanging we overhead for several days like the blackest kind of a roof of a dark cuvery cavern which darkness only broken by a torchlight.. The smell of burning pine and leaves was very strong though somewhat sweet sweet and while on deck many of the crew and others were obliged to wear hundkerchiefs over their faces to protect them from the strong fumes. The captian assured starring that there was no danger, and if there is he would not attempt to run pass the danger 2 011 P .

Starring feared that many more perished in the triple disaster than he even heard about. If the disaster overwhelmed such a big city as Abbleann, and spread as far as it is predicted, then it might as well be as great as if the whole of the United States had been wep wiped out in the same fachion. Starring said to the Caption;

"ThenI was informed of the disaster at Abbieann I was in my tent with Angeline Jennings helping a her work out a do code letter she had secured from the enemy camp. At I had just finished, a courier came riding up and hunded me a message. It was written by some one who I did not know and therefore laughed and told the courier that he might as well let the fellow have his joke. But when I recleved a note on the disaster from Gertrude Angeline, ams as I knew her, I felt funny." At first when they believed it violet and her sisters were almost prostrated over the now of the terrible disaster of Abbiegans many of their best friends resided in that city. On learning of the explosions and the results they were vild. At first they believed Gertrude Angeline and Angeline and her venturesome friends had been killed, as Violet said, she and her sisters knew they were in a part of the city at the time where they would be exposed to the worst of the blow . Sertrude Angeline 2was known as one of the most brillian car careers in the army for a girl scout, and held many prominent positions of trust with the greatest of the christian armies, and the Emperor himself, and was favored greatly by the Vivian Girls. For nearly two years shechad kept the enemy in a state of terror. The explosion came undoubyedly from the plains north of Abbieunn. The cloud of the blast rose in a vast amphitheteur over and upon the city, and extended in a magnificent sweet from Point Caltor on the south, to Adeleheid on the northwest. The force of the explosion could have b ried the city entirely with rubbish from one end to the other, and why it did not do so seems strange."

Indeed it seems most of all that Adeleheid city and the northwestern nection of Abbleann had been desto destacyed by an immense mass of fire and debris which fe,, fell on the city after the explosion hurled the c debrie skyward. It seems strange captian that the reople of these cities could not have been on their guard then they have read and heard the news of the disasters bfo before. Any one could regard the enemy as most dangerous. They should have regarded the gramblingsof the distant disasters earlier before much as the people of those afflicted cities and towns probable and surely did when they experienced these disasters.. The enemy seem to have done here however what he did elsewhere but to this time more auddenly. It seems as so many statements make that these explosions literally blew up or tore up the whole country side, completely destroying the city of Abbieann and many others, and altering the appearance of this portion of the country, making many believe at first it was some great and unusual eruption. I he have read that fifty miles away hundreds of people were killed by the fulling debris, and the resulting floods killed more than the explosions did.

such et e n ernormouse ernormous clouds of smoke and debrickand dust were thrown upward, that it did look like oruptions. In the ammount of material ejected by these strange explosions, the slightest makes even the so told story of the eruption of Kraj Krakatoa seem vees very infer n inferior, and the city of Abbicann with its population was annihilated. Besides captiab, though o some light is thrown on the character of the terrible disaster, by which the city of Abbieann is blotted out of existance, the exact nature of the outbreak is a matter of spectulation. Few eye witnesses of the disaster, who were on ships at the time of its orrusce orr occurance have been found wlive, and the stories they tell are far from being consistent and circumstantial. It is positive however the exp expl explosions were no strange c volcanic erustions from under ground, and that the town in whole was not destroyed by a tremendous shower of huge stones boiling lava and volcanic ashes and dust as many said, but that instant death came to all who were caught under the fulling ruins of their homes which crashed before the concussion of the explosions, and those who were in the northern part of the city that was envoloped by the could were stifled by the resionous cases which accompanied the shocks and concussions. The most remarkable feature of the explosion that a was reported was the sheet of flame which is said to have poured over the northern part of the city hugging the earth apparently and setting fire to everything within its reach.

The menner in which the vomitings of the explosions were deflected in the direct ion of the city of Abbiesmn and other places p presents one of the most difficult problems connected connected with the explosion which no scientific experts can even explain though they were called upon to investigate. It was said that the expl sions sounded as if all the mountains around had not only blown their heads off in eru tions but that the explosions were more extended than that, and that it seemed as if all the entire mountains had been torn to pieces and scattered cutward, as well as uupward and in all directions. And why did the explosions hurl the fragments with desolating force in a direction close to the earth .. ?

On the occassion just referred to there was another strange phenomenon to the explosion. An ernormous volume of dust hurled by the blasts was shot high into thr the air, it attaine d a attained a height it is estimated of fully thirty miles maybe fourty, where it was taid taken up by the counter currents, and wasted across more than a hundred miles of land in a direction far contrary to that of the prevading land winds, and then deposited in the shape of strange impalpable powder as dark and as fine as lambblack in the streets of Calverine, and the surroundin country.

The sumecp phenomenon was noted during the late explosions when a great shower of earth debris made its way westward from the explosion zone to the city of Francis Atlanta, although a westerly wind was blowing steadily all the while.

Ever since the disaster the scientific corps of the Abbi ann Weather Bureau at Sacramento, Abbie annia State had been engaged in stud studying the direction of and force of these upper air currents, and the strange phenomena connected with the ereptions of the explosions, and if they succeed it will materially assist them in ariving at sound conclusions. Experienced geoglositets and meteorologists accom punied the relief boats on the expedition to the disaster zone for the purpose of studying these and the other phenomena of the explosions on the ground, and valuable scientific results must thereby follow .. "

"There has never been witnessed in in the experience of human beings so awful a scene of destruction as that disaster at Abbicann" said the Captlan. "The accounts of the awful cataclysmn in hich the whole population of a city as large as Abbieann. and including other towns and cities were in lifteen or twenty minutes overwhermed by the cracking buildings chaken down by the concussions of the explosions, or those floring into the streets being secondarily overwhelmed by the thick showers of still burning powder, that belched forth like powdered fiery lava may well make our whole country feel how tiny and insignificant she is before such a fee of Abbieannia, and indeed all the rest of Abbicannia too, when in the face of such powers the enemy can if she has done so make lature so through her mighty and mysterious thross out of time, and beyond what any other disaster never has been compared yet. As I have read and even seen, many poets and even story writers have set their wildest imaginations to book for and plays and shows, and actual frightful acts i in picturing and giving drama of hell and all its horrors. I believe Milton was one of them, and ante mother, the latter probably the greatest. But I don't believe the worst Parts of the Infernal Regions, and all its flaming terrors and all its horrid gnomes and other flendish creatures as they concieved them are not more hedious and appalling, than the stories of the frightful experiences of those many millions of hapless inhabitants upon whom diseaster after diseaster has powred down their flaming and consuming storms of crupted debris, and flame, and of the frightful nerve draining floods that followed after, combined by the immeasureable forest fires, terrific m battles, fury of the Clandelinian soldiery, the immeasureable massacres of children, and the wholesale destructions of hundreds of towns and acres of cities for every disaster, and also general Starring the ract may be is that the Day of judgement, as fortold in the prophetic visions of the holy ones, could hardly impress the human mind with more immensureable horror, and even terror, than the extic extinction in fifteen minu tes of the greatest of Calverinian cities, by the blast of explosions, flood and a com plication of other catastrophes. It will be one of the most impressive events for us all, and if you my dear sir can really find proofs that the enemy has been respossible, and that the explosions were not really volcanic eruptions as the majority are inclined to believe, you yourself can rouse the nation in such a manner that God help Glandelinia. This coming so soon after many others before, is a holocaust that makes even resisting Calverinia, may all civilization after all seem very frail and feeble before such an enemy, seems so at least. There is nothing like a contemplation of your earthquake or your volcano horrors for knocking conciet and wanity out the out of the human heart, w but when its comes to disasters of these kind then the world itself stands appalled "

The boat was now heading for the city of Wickey Lansin. As he knew well, as it survived the disaster to a great measure by m r miracle this city is already filled with thousands of refuses from other places, and more are daily coming in. The terror even now has taken a new form. The forefires were manurevering like an army in battle , places hit hard by the explosions, but not touched by flood, were in the likely path of this new scourge, even wickey ransin, and there was great and imminent danger of starvation before help could even get there. The victime of the awful disaster. or fugitives of forest fires, driven onward day by day, and who have escaped with their lives and even without injury are dazed and as helpless as children. Starring knew they are absolutly destitute of everything save the few garments on their backs, the raging fires giving them no time to save a thing, while all the men folk of these towns have fought the fires griving to check them. The food supply in Wickey Lensin is even so small that with the utmost caution it cannot last long among those who have come there already, to say nothing of those who were still to come. wen from all parts stragglers are making their way there, and many fugitives or wd crowded the shores and begged piteously for the captian of Starrings ship to take them on.

But there was no room on the boat,, and all the relief expeditions that were expected to bring to the city all whom they could rescue were stopped in their progreen by the terrible fire.

All the districts for many miles about Wickey Lansin as Starring and his followers observed is a desolute waste, and even the whole appearance of the country had been trunsformed. Starring did not believe that there were any persons left alive outside of Wickey Lasin, and that those who have not perished had fled eother to the city, or elsewhere far out of the disaster zone. "ow many were loats lost in their endeavors to escape in small boats to other sections will never be known._ut anyway all that is certain is that many did take to the rivers and other streams in this way and of these but few have been heard from. Fires are now ceping across many streams. in which even a steamer could go through only by a miracle.

Starring had been surprised also more and more in his life than he had ever been before, for ever since he had left general Concentinian Arronburgs Lines, may even before before that months shead, over the whole country no matter where he had travled there was and had been and is t still even in the middle of day, a twilight and some times midnight darkness from the great black canopy of smoke that continued to spread so fur over the sky that rose so high from the many tremendous forest fires, and that yet the whole state sometimes in a stinky markiness that even surprised the records in far away cities that were never touched by the catastrophes......Also to add to the devastation, many smaller streams which took their formation from mountain heights, and which allowed had not ever overflowed their banks in their whole history dried up so that a terrible famino of water threatened. The work of exploring exploring what ruins there are in Wickey Lansin started by Starring and days in A what was left of Abbieann, studying the nature of the ruins, the parts still under water, and the fires beyond. He said to Starring;

"I am inclinged to believe that the deaths among the people of Abbieann could never be exaggerated. I really believe that we will learn in a few months more that the disaster was still more immeasureable than we know of it now, for I am not so sure any one yet have heard the the worst from the region /. As near as I can ascertain the spurts of flame from the explosions showed the ammount of explosives used."

The difficulty of searching through the ruins of Wickey Lansin increased tward late afternoon, when the cloud which had scattered so deep a murkiness over the carly part of the day began to c become a solid and impenetrable mass, along the horizon it resembled the thickest gloom of night or when you look into the big opening of an immense dark cavern. But as in proportions as the blackness gathered, and the glow of fires increase in their vivid and searching glare Starring indeed became alarmed. The glow was of a larid and intolerable crimsom penetrating through the thicker and rolling clouds of smoke along the horizon far and wide, and lighting up the whole city every now and then from street to street, then to suddenly die into a slokly paleness.

Starring indistinctly heard the mouning of the fire wind, and a noise as of 5the roaring of the sea waves, the hinsing murmurs of flames searing pine trees and other noises, and he said to one of his followers-

"I believe it's coming. We might have to make for the ship."

He looked again as the cloud appeared to break suddenly from is its solid mass, and then by the glare of the flames to assume a mimicry of huge and stranfe strange yet horrible shapes, and then the glow seemed to vas vanish suddenly one into the awful abyes of shade, and to leave the city in darkness, making Starring think of the agents of terror and death.

Fearing a new horror, he said; "Let's go."

The retreat from the city commenced, plowing through debris or clambering over high piles of wreckage. gmoke started to fog the city bearing with it the smell of burning leaves and pine. Even the atmosphere was terribly stale, and hot, and suidenly a wine wind began to rise, and then as they came noar the wharf where the ship was they were surprised by the place becoming lighted with an intense and lurid glow once more, but more brighter and nearer and more extending this time. Starring stopped to look. Strangely bright, and gigantic through all that darkness, which closed around it like the walls of hell a immense stretch of forest far in the distance glared a mountain of leaping fire, racing madly onward like a cyclone, and a noise like shooting of artillery sounded from it. The horizon sky seemed riven in in two by the leaing leaping wall of flames , the two sections seemed to take two monster shapes, one confronting the other. The glare lighted up the whole atmosphere far and wide. This seemed hear headed straight for the river itself. Other parts of the forest were still dark and shrouded, save in three places, where streamed suidenly and increasingly large serpentine and irregular rivers of new flames racing madly to join the purent fire.

Onward gushed this source of sudden disasters. Starring hallose d to the ship, but suddenly a duller shade fell over the air. Instinctively he turned to the rear and behold for a moment a volume of blackest smoke gushed forth, hiding out the glars of flumes which had rushed on an avalanch of fire. This su sudden and awful illumination, the burst of floods of fire, chanced to darkened before the smoke just when Starring and his party had gained the direct path loading from the city to the river port, and here he was arrested by an immense throng, more than half the refugees who had been in the city, and who had fled at the slight of the new horror. Starring edged his way through, and with his followers regained the ship.

As luck would have it, the wind suddenly changed, and the partly wrecked city was spared, but it was some time before the terrible darknesscaubsided.

At this Starring had said;
"The apa apalling character and the results of the disester, and the complicat lons following, which has visited good parts of Calverinia is now being fully confirmed by all details of the calcuity, as they came to hand, and which I have witnessed, therefore this will pass into all history as the most entire and torrible and dos to tructive in record. The forest fires no now raging, the conditions atill existing all over Calverinia, are not unknown, and thousands of refugeer may have found safty in tother cities and towns, although they may now be suffering great sorrow and privation. No accounts of the cruption of explosions by any intelligent and reliable eye witnesses on our landside has an not over been recieved, and howhen such a story is available it may materially modify the first impressions and give light to the real effects. Yet it is sure that the inhabitants of Abbieann had had no warning of the awful doom that threatened them, therefore at best all that can be hoped for is that the nown may have been exaggerated. Calverinia however is entitled and is rectaving the substantial exhibition of sympathy which is reaching us from all quarters of the world. If Pandora or Calverinie had been like visited Calverini a would be far worse off than she is now. Indeed the terrible calamity which has visited Calverinia has swept an unknown number of its inhabitants to a sudden and most horrible death, the population of bigger cities probably suffering more than any other city in proportion because they were naturally attracted to a residence in the fatal city of Abbicann, Adeleheid, and so on, while the survivors making an gradual exedus from the de astated region elsewhere, whether they are many or few, have been utterly ruined as to their worldy belog belongings. But let us hope in years to come the lavish had of nature will soon again cover the waste places with the luxurant growth, but many years will elaspe however before Calverinia will witness the return og the of the prop prosperous and contented conditions so lately existing.. One week after starrings arival to the disaster zone, he recleved a disputch from some where confirming the reports that the population of Abbieann had been desteoyed. He himself when he had arived in wickey Lai Langin found the state of affairs worse than was given to him in the reports forwarded by the news. The country around Wickey Lansin was apparently devastated in the same manner to that of Abbieann. He belie ved all 11 living things within that region had been destroyed.

About seven thousand had been killed in wickey Lansin. The managers and owners of estates with all their familes had been killed. One thousand bodies had been buried, and 10,000 persons were sent to hope hospitals elsewhere. Probably only nine thousand of this number may not recover. The details are for him too harrowing to imaginae. The number of total dead will nover exactly be known. All neighbr neighboring towns not cut off by fires were giving what annitance possible, and that account for the number of refugees from other places coming to wickey Lasin. Every now and then coasting vessels were seen going up and down the river with water and provisions, doctors and medical supplies. The extent therefore of the awful and amusual calamity is now being fully realized, and every effort Starring knew full well what he observed was being made to grappe with it.

All the best farming districts in this neighborhoods have been fully and totally downstated, and all the cattle, horses, and farm aminals of every kind are dead.

All along the east of the margin of the flood and explosion disaster the fires have continued for weeks, and still continues, but at a further southern section is now apparently understing, the fires going northward like a raging storm. The forest fire devastating could be observed for thes. Yet far west no fires are burning and rollef was sent as far as possible from there.

Chapter 36

A TERRIFIC CAMMONADING MOISE HEARD FOR FIFTEEN HUNDRED OR MORE MILES. EVEN HEIDI JUNGTION SHOWENED WITH DEBRIS THROWN BY ONE OF THE EXPLOSIONS. STARRING OBSERVED THAT FOR WERES, THE FORGEAFIRES CONTINUES TO DARKEN THE SXY WITH CLOUDS OF SLOKE. A SPLETIOD AND MOST APPARAILING PHENOMENON. INCESSANT ROAR OF AWFUL THUNDER.

TERROR PARAILIZES THE HEPLESS INHABITANTS.

The southern section by the east is devasta ted from Reclair, to Wickey Lansin.On the southeastward side, matters are worse. The refugees number thousands, and only sicteen sixteen hundred are under relief. The ship now left Wickey Lansin with the purpose to steam on tward St Ann, and Starring requested to the captian that the h ship would lay a course almost due northwest, after leaving Wickey Lansin, and go through the passage of the Heidi Stream and head for the open water way of the Arronburg Runs. The entire journey of one hundred miles to Abbieann he hoped might be made in a day or two. The ship the captian told him would be pushed for all he she is worth providing he can push her) and he expected she would go the speed of fourteen knots, very good speed for her considering her fould conditions put upon her when she was in the explosion area, if not mentioned before the Ships name is June.

What Worriod tarring most of all was that the forest fires were s trying to follow his course, and to make it worse the winds were southern and a little east, and the smoke of the greater fires were borne away further to the westward. Starring knew that this had somewhat relieved the working parties in some of the ruined cities, and they were having a good chance of making a more careful examaination of the ruine if possible. Being fored to stop at Josephine unction Starring made a trip also through this ruined city of fourty thousand inhabiants inhabitants, and through the ad jacent villiages, with a new searching party organized by him from his followers, this time being accompanied by the two boy and girl scouts, Here there were many examples of the curious effects of the fire blasts of the explosions which swept over the towns and cities, bodies being burned beyond recognition but elothing of the most.

flimey material being little or not damaged at all...;;;...,. The body of the Mayor of the town was found near the villiage of ic-Holls a surburb of josephine junction, and the scenes around here were worse than any playe place Starring had visited yet .. In the latter place the victims were mostly occured with, debris and other wreckage hurled up by the explosion and which then fell. Near Mic-Holls Starring was told where over five thousand bodiew that had been terribly distended and in an advanced state of decomposition. These bodies were counted in the streets of the little villiage, and on the adjacenr land, and many bodies looked as if they had even been hurled there by the explosion as they were terribly mangled,, and nearly all the dead in the city were lying with tye their faces of the ground, and all were found badly charred. The body of a woman, men and three little girls and six boys. were found in a near by stream, to which they had been thrown by the explosion as evidence showed. A large heap of bodies badly torn and mangled, and even dismembered of either heads, arms or legs, oe absolutely disembowled, or whole front portions of bodies torn away or in a worse state state were found in one spot. They were apprently near the explosion when it occured and the blast had destroyed them. Another residence close by but sha sheltered partly by a hill on the Josephine junction side.... escaped almost untouched. The windows and blinds inside and ould were gone, but inside the furniture, papers, books, clothing, and flooring were unscathed, though plan plastering from walls and ceiling was badly cracked of e only living thing of any kind that starring observed in this desolated district was a little kitten thin as a skenel e skeleton. This little animal stalked after Starring meowing piteously. Starring wont on foot to gt nn. On the road he passed a wagon with wheels broken off, and in the seat was a dead man, and lying in front of the wato wagon was a dead horse.

turi further on he came upon the body of a man lying at the foot of a broken Status of the Sacred Heart, he apparently having been killed while he was at prayer. He believed the whole district passed through a literal baptism of fire, the results here being just as terrible as those in other ruined cities he had visited if not worse.

There appeared not a single human being alive in this region, and he had recoived word that five thousand four hundred bodies had been recovered, and he believed that many hundreds still lay buried under the ruins which were so tangled that it seemed ine impossible for the bodies to be recovered. Starring heard that it was estimately that about 12,000 had perished in this town. This included many foriegners which meant the almost annihilation of the race of forings visitore. The destruction in this location was unusual, and starring and his followers were surprised. He heard that from Francis Atlanta the flushes of the explosions were visible during ty the fatal night of June the Foist? And now the forest fire abbut smoke was visible from east of St Vincent by day as far as Francis Atlanta, and the value of the flames by night at Calverine still further awa. As the steamer the Jane continued on to get closer to the main heart of the city of Joseph ine Junction, it attempted to force its way down past the town, but run into the heart of a florce confligration was raging to cross the stream. For three hours and a half the ship was entirely helpless in a cloud of smoke and fames from burning trees, then which they end sho oncountered further down near Wicicy Wickey Landin. When the main town of Josephine Junction where many survivoed the disaster was reached at day break Starring found the survivors panic stricken. The streets were covered many refect deep with debris from fallon bull buildings. Josephine Junction is seventeen miles from one of the "Emplosion Craters", which blow into the city debris of all kinds. From another place norty north of there Starring learned the distress was great, and that a call had beneat for priests to administer to the dying. Up the sisies of the north stretch of the Viviam Hills east of the city forest fires were burning in hundreds of formations, which uniting and seperating, formed at times a nework network, from which there was no possible escape, for any living thing caught within its grasp.

By the awful explosion ariver that had existed near the scene was dried up. Starringcould see that many searching parties had been out. He lost hope however when before reaching this city the steamer was forced to run through five or six miles of stoke that was so dense that all on board were almost sufficiated, and the ship for more than an hour or two had to e be left to its own guiadiance. The forest fire though not so near as before was a still to a threatening as to tr terrifiyn the survivors, and to the left smoke and flame continued to rush on within easy sight the flames at times reaching far up into the sky. Starring had been warned that for many days the forest fire had labored forward, to envelope the explosion region and erase all class sooner or later. Smoke arose all over the territory in immense clouds, and the rumbling of many explosions made by dynimiters in their efforts to stop the Red Plague redoubled in ambers and force, and before the concussions the ground at times trambled as if in the throes of a terrible agony. At night in intense darkness as Starring had observed the flames would sear the summit of a high hill making it look like a volcani volcano in eruption and giving to the whole scene a weird and terrible appearance. All during the tip trip so far the splendid yet terrible phenom enon continued, giving all those on board the river craft a view never to be forgotten but hardly any change for refugees to make their escape. All on board the ship seemed hypnotized. As he watched the display of flames Starring heard this excited story from another explosion witness;

"It was about midnight sir, when the whole country side suddenly opened sending great clouds of earth de bris over cities and viowns. Death was everywhere, and in its most terrible forms. It seemed as if flashes of fire and clouds of it came down from the sky, killing many who had escaped into the streats. For this great tragedy the settings were wonderful. The country side before the concussions literally rocked with devastating effects in its agony. From the nearest explosions majestic columns of smoke apparently inky black, reached skyward, and the scene was for that moment as if craters from the surface of the ground was vi vomiting incandescent matter that gave forth prismatic lights as it or the fiery cloud rolled over the land, sending great waves of fire over the cities and towns, and such thunder, as had never been hold by man cracked and rolled through the heavens. From the earth came the most tremendous detonations ever heard on record. These joined with the secondary thunder all for those fifteen minutes merging in a: in incessant roar that added to the panic of the fleeing people who had any chance of ewe escaping.

All this of course lasted fifteen minutes and the clouds the color of sackcloth rose to an awful height, mushrooming at the tops, spreading at in denses clouds that descended and spread far and wide to bring night at vallete morning. For hours the atmosphere had been so laden with powder gases that life was made almost impossible. It is believed that many of those who escaped from their falling houses were suffocated by this gas before they were touched by the fiery cloud.

Many expected that the entire country would be destroyed, and all morning the darkness was beyond description, save when everything was made light as broad day by the flah flashes of flames from the forest fires.

For fifteen minutes by the concussion of the explosions the earth quaded in quaked incessently and most violently, the very mountains shook and caused terrific landslides, and so terrible were the thunders, that it has seemed to the terrifical that the universe was being rent to pieces.

At first as Starring well knew from all the first reports, the disaster was cuid to be from volcanic eruptions. The next morning when there was a respite in the so called eruptions, those of survivors who were more stout hearteed ventured out but were trapped in the fires resulting. As he inspected the scenes Starring saw with his own eyes that even all aross of farming lands were totally destroyed, plac many places being buried under banks of what had been called volcanic matter, lava lava stones, and so forth. From a height he observed all plantations and farms as far as the edge of distant burning forests being devantede. Some places nearest the edge of the flood zone were under water. The better class of Calverinian farmers had made this portion of the land their country, now beyond this district the whole countey was a smoking smouldering ruin. Ashes where forests of trees had stood was everywhere, no place being less than six or five feet of red hot smouldering ashes, and a some placesthe very grow d was red hot for a considerable depth.. Every farmer

All kind of vegetation had entirely disappeared, for no matter how far the eye reached not a spring of green was to be seen, and further off the horizon was walled up in the smoke of the forest fires. All live stock belonging to these unfortunate farmers had died, all houses had disappeared, and small creeks and rivers were dry because of being evaporated by the fierce heat of the forest fires......

A guide pointed at to him where everywhere north of Josephine junction hudebeen had been found dead bodi es, some half buried, or others showing they had been stricken down by stones and hurs rocks. The guide said , c decomposition had been almost immedinte because of the a f awful heat. Many soldiers had come to do the h burying, and foe prisoners had been pressed into the work as rapidly as possible at the point of the bayonet, but the conditions are such that pestilence can not be avoided. Violent Lensin starring heard was safe, but violet Paul had sudder suffered terribly first from the explosion and then fire and flood, but he was told that that district so far was unapproachable. In the hospitals of Violent Lunsin there were about 11,897 s ufferers from Violet Paul who were being taken care of, but with little chance than any of them would ever recover. He heard that also throughout that district a famine is raging or threatening. And mless supplies were quickly recieved, all will starved. while the forest fire has passed this district without threatening any of these places the air is still filled with fog and smoke, and the heat was increasing, creating an intense thirst and causing such suffering as only those who experienced it could hallava.

Starringdesiring to learn the cause or what the debris contained that was hurled into the streets of Josephine Junction by the explosions continued the work among what the ruins, but it was not quite so satisfactory. The soldiers were about and had to be forced to act, even though hour by hour a danger of pestilence increased. He came to a place where dead were still eing b ried in trenchos or burned in heaps, the pyres being fed with gaseline and tar. To get rid of the dead bodies the great fires that had broken out among the ruins were kept going by the soldiers, which ha at night lighted up the entire neighborhood, at which being seen at Violent Lansin led to the belief the forest fires had spread west of them. While There for the few days Starring and his followers aided the soldiers in their work. He came across streets on the outskirts of the town where debris thrown into them by the near by explosion were in places six feet deep. Still even now everywhere within his sight were dead bodies, decomposing, and giving off a stench that made many of the workers faint. One soldier said that although thousands have been burned or hastily buried, budies still remain to be crematered. They were also hard to handle as many of the bodies even as Starring observed were carbonized and swollen, and many bodies are found here that never belonged to the city. Some were still encrusted withnmud. The nature vof the debris hurled about by the explosion showed no signs whatever of having come from volcenic ereption, as they consisted of debris, from the ground, pebbles, clay, mud sund, limestone, and gravel of all sorts.

Armed soldiers were also watching out for val vandals, with orders given to shoot down any sneaking landelinian that many enter the ruins or who is seen robbing the wreck of the town or a dead body, but no such a vandal has appeared. One disaster alone in many others past so far where from any location known it is believed not a single robbery occured. The _landelinians no doubt were afraid to come from the awful nature of the disuster itself. Some idea of the terrile heat by the forest fire in speeding close by this town but not touching it may be had when we can say that the iron frame works of an immes immense bridge crossing Heidiß Heidi's crock was melted as though they passed through a iron foundary or furnace, and the creek a hundred feet across was boiled or evaporated entirely away, and the sandy bottom turned like white hot lave for a time. As Starring observed from a high rise of hills above the town the forest fires elsewhere were still in destructive fury. Stranger too a terrific cannonading of something he believed he could hear a hundred miles away somewhere. And the reports could be seen followed by immense clouds of white smoke rising miles in the air. Imm nse balls of colored fire also resecupward, and the whole neighborhood was one mass of traveling flame. Starring believed the fire s': struck some rangers explosive shed and blew everything up. It was impossible to reach Abbiesnn as he observed by any straight northwesterly route by land or river because of these fires, and he said there was no means of estimating the destruction added by this fire to probab to probable life, and entirely to property.

Learning that Violent Leasin was still safe, though the sky over the town was dark as of a storm from the smoke, he decided to make the trip by that rout if the captian of the Mary Jane would submit. The hills in that direction were invisible because of the fogs of dense amoke black, gray and white... Also it was reported from Calverine that group quantities of half bound trees was floating down the river through the city, that is the Calverine River. and that it seemed strange to the inh inhabit mink for even half borned houses came down. Sturribf folt Starring felt sure the forest fires would continue untill a rain came, and unless it does many hundreds of miles of countryside would soon be covered with smouldering ashes which are many feet doop. He asked the caption if Violent Lansin could to approach approached. As the caption if Violent Lansin could be approached. The the caption if Violent Lansin could be approached. explosions could be heard continuously. As the Captian knew that troops and some river war ships have been sent there, to search what rains are there, and bury the doad, he decided to try the trip. It was however a longer way round to Abbienn.

when they came within sight of one of the explosion craters easily seen from the bout which looked ke large and deep crevices of circular shape. These craters appeared to have no water. The signal station at Francis Atlanta reported that a new and large forest fire was seen there in the evening of august the First in the direction of St Helen, and that the latter place was in positi.

Starring was getting used to such reports and as he continued with others in examining the ruins the search parties discovered safes and molten precious metals in stores and burned dwellings in the town. No one who was not able to show a pass from the vilitary Covernment, or from the Emperor, of the Vivian Cirls was permitted to penetrate into even the suburbs of any of the ruined cities and towns, and to prevent uny one without passes from going in a cordon of soldiers had been placed around the towns. whenever he entered for his investigation, starring increased the cordon of soldiers by his own, and giving orders to admit no one without first being consulted by him whether he had a pass or not. The biggest Cathederal of Violent Lansin was all down, with with the exception of one tower, and of six theatres only one wall was standing. A big convent which contained five hundred school children, two hundred girls preparing for being nums,, and 137 nums to include, alone was not injured, but the college adjoining adjoining, where 345, men scolars and fourty priests and professors had been was missing. Yet there was no evidence of much loss of life here, for though many buildings were badly ruined, the majority of the city stood, with many houses only amiss of window glass or frames, and roofs partly orn off torn off.

officials had declared that for this city, who escaped the disaster, and the insular officials had declared that for this city all danger from the horrible forest fires in thi the disas distance was passed, and a cordon of armed soldiers at the advice of Starring, added by policemen was placed around the town further out than the inner suburbs to prevent timid recopie from leaving, or to prevent so called vandals from entering. The Mayor told Starring that when the explosions occured he was riding on a suburban car back to Violent Lamein from Violet Paul. The car he rode was derailed by the concussion, the roof blew out, by the shock, the glass in the windows were s sucked out, and the car stood on the roof of a building after the concussion was over. He said he never desires to ride a jumping car again.

The lievor continued; The destruction at Abbleann sir is appulling beyond words, for , was there myself two weeks after the flood had subsided. The streets of the northern section of the city not touched by the flood because of the high elevation are two feet deep in rubbish thrown by the explosions, which cover the wreckage which I know covers thousands upon thousands of bodies, scorched black and shiny as if they had been plunged into boiling pitch. No one yet had tuken them out as the region is yet dangerous to approach. Namy of the dead were never touched by the explosion fire, and many of the houses destroyed show no signs of burning but of being wrecked as if an earthquake of terrible violence occurred.

In the northwestern portion of the surviving section of the city the town hall and portions of the extended elevated structures for trains are still standing, and two skyscrapers, while at the north end known as Biethot North End the most massive stonework and bricketfuc structures are culcined. Here the force of the blast was closest an d more stronger. The Big Church tower built by the Abbiemnian government twenty years ago of cyclopean, reciun and spanish mason work combined, is by a miracle in that ill fated city the only building building standing wholly intact. The very golden six foot crucifix on top exposed to the fullest force of the blast, is not even harmed except from discolartion from the smoke. A huge stantue in the front entrance made of iron and brass not facing the explosion is found twenty feet away from the tower beheaded, and without arms, and so disfigured that we do not know what it was supposed to be. There are yet no soldiers guarding the property as the region is said to be in the possion possession of the Glandelinians. When I was there, the stench throughout that section was terribly offensev offensive. And the streets are still obstructed by huge piles of debris and dead bodies, and it doks like when St Pierre had been destroyed but on a most immense scale. No one is there to attempt the work of cleaning the streets and thoroughfares, and if it is done it will be necessary to employ large numbers of men for many months, and maybe force many prisoners to help.

A part of montheastern Abbieann called Ingeredle is partly preserved, and Port fun, and Henvens may are yet undust, but the inhabitants have left, having crossed the river and fled the disaster zone entirely

BY TERRIFIC HEAT. PHYSICAL CHAPTER HADE BY THE EXPLOSIONS!

It was now three weeks since Starring had left general concentinian Arronburgs cumps, and for all the time of his trips, all hills, and valleys, and plains would seems to literally follow him from b hind, vomiting clouds of densest smoke. giving forth she ts of flame, and as he boked on the dark side of things in those days he sure dreaded the coming of nomo other great cutastrophe. For many people of towns eastward which had not bee in the sweep of floods, and only slightly affected by the concussion of the explosions, the smoke of forest fires seemed produced so constantly and normally that it was permissiable for even those who were inclined to lock on the durk side not to dread a sudden and more horrible catastrophe. Even ar at Evangeline St clare,, where the terrific fires attracted, as they continued on much attention, any anxiety which may have existed, gradually died down, when on September 5th, a terrific sea of fire, overwheemed the north side of the city, and for ten days the men inhabitants all of them, battled like med to stop the awful conflagration, and worse to say unknown to starring, Concentinian Arronburge whole army had been forced to retreat, as fighting against the conflagration did no good. Even his whole army could not stop it. At Evangeline St Clare twenty five persons were killed fighting the blazes, and the river northnof Evangeline St Claire, mysteric al mysteriously swollen to a muddy torrent noisily overflowed, and its waters was terribly scalding hot. On September the 7th while there was still deliberations going on at Evangeline St claire, and while the fight still a waged desperately against the flames, and were days and nights had been passed in torrible unxiety and anguish and ignornace as to whether this new advance of the forest fire was the precursor of or end of the fire disaster, was within ten minutes the annihilator of three quarters quarters of Evangeline St Clare city, and three others. But to go back to the horrors of Abbieann. Many other s interviewed by starring, stated that the upper portion of the city not touched by flood had been razed by strange clouds of fire thrown down upon it by the explosion, which crumbled everything in its path. In the lower portion of the city there is no or where it stood a vast lake or water that refuses to arain out. And to the stupifaction of many who are familiar with the spot, a big Clock in the tower of a remaining portion of the Citys main Cathedral strangely r m remained intact, as if to show the precise moment of the disaster, and

On the other hand, the other section of the Cathedral was shaken down, or burned and only the alter and the walls behind and the doom remained standing.

Some fragments of the pews were thrown a thousand yards. Bodies found within the ruins of buildings and whose strange attitudes were preceptible, were lying as they were killed, with bowels protruding, as though forced out by the tension of the heat of exploding powier clouds, and with their bodies partly or wholly carbonized.

Starring had when leaving violent Landin drafted some scientists, who he forced to come with him from the city to help him trace the cause of the disaster, for he now began to realized that the damage done to Abbiscann and the whole country side would be known to be considerably greater than was at first estimated. The present ameasiness of all the inhavitants and refugees that glarring met with on his long trip was continually increased by the continuous ravaging progress of the forest firss. Before leaving Violent Landin starring had brought on board the ship large stones, a canfull of the dust, and other fragments of debris thrown on be the streets and having a volcumic scientist abourd he had them examined. There he secured this a hot or cloud of hot something passed over from the east, and owing to this great heat is was impossible to approach one of the explosion craters.

Starring while in Violent Lonsin, and while going north to the countryside had made surprising and wondorful discoveries, in regarding the physical changes of the lundscape there resulting from the explosions. Several fissures had been observed near the craters. An estate of some ones had disappeared, and had been replaced by an inlet of the rivers. Another estate belonging to bottle Rengers on formerly flat ground and upon which there had been a small town, had been completely buried under a lunded de. The hills to the north by this time was wearing a cap of smoke clouds, which is being lumined every new and then by flashes of something red. Every one was wishing for saveral heavy raincowers, which would wash out some of these stupendous fires, and save the vordure of the rest of the forests.

Oring to the fires, and the other divisters many farms have been wiped out, and destitution prevailed among all the laboring classes who survied survived,, who must without homes, without clothing, food and the batter fresh water to drink.

All throughout the region when the floods had been slowly abating starring learned that for weeks and weeks, bodies have been Historian in flood swept houses in life like attitudes, presenting grewnome apactacles, and that the known doad was growing and growing that it was becoming immeasureable. He heard that nearly two hundred thousand were found that belonged to Mildred greenbying along alone. Bodies hade en Bolies had been discovered in houses of violent Landin itself, mostly which were fe decomposing and he in order to guard against disease, it was necessary for the authorities to burn these dwellings. And Starring had observed that owing to the many diffi diffice diffe ties difficulties in the way of those who should have the matter in hand, hundreds of bodies cannot be itered or reached. No see has been able yet to approach within nine miles of one of the explosion craters in this neighborhood, because of the intense heat, and judging from what can be seen at a great distance, a lake of water near the city has disappoured. The numerous fissures in the ground extending to a great distance from one of these craters show no doubt the mighty force of the explosion, but sometimes this scene was enshrouded by a dense volume of smoke that would pass over like a cloud from the distant fires, and as far as eye could reach it seemed as if be the whole country side was covered by a peculiar mist, pecuse of such lack of sunshine for no many weaks, and for such intense heat, created by the fires, preading so much nose and disconfort was increasing...

Starring did not know what to any when other information brought him the fact,., that starvation was raging in good many parts of Calverinia, and the horrible effects of the dinaster, those before, and the rosults, and the otench of so mm many decaying bodies is driving out so many people that it seemed as if a general exodus of southern and Contral Calverinia was under way, jutilated bodies when found were tied up with rops ropss, and dragged to trenches and buried, or even coremated in the trenches... He knew the many local governments were still feeding and doing what they can to shelter as many refugees as possible, and even now subscriptions for the relief of the sufferers were still being raised in all portions of the unaffected areas, and throughout abbiennia, but that did not seem to help him, or his purpose my. He knew now that throughout all districts affected by any of these dinasters the dol desolation was most appalling and for hundreds of miles bedies found were being burned upon great press upon which oils was poured, but in spite of all this, it seemed that though weeks and weeks passed the places recovered from the flood, could not be cleared of the dead. The more dead were found, and put out of the way the more were discovered. He takes to be bodies seemed to have come from Abbienan.

Physicians in the city of Violent Landin who made examination said to gtarring that in most cases death was due to either being buried under wreckage, or to asphyxiation, and that the fires came later. It is believed by Starring and all of his follower followers agreed with him that the explosions were also of some sort of destroyers that three off some exceedingly heavy and noxious and pelous posionous gases, something whin either to wfire damp or to the posion gases used in the world war, which settling upon every region close to the blasts rendered all the inhabitants to death. This theory also was accepted by many of the survivors who were taken from the ruins, alive or from ships in the harbor of this city, as they said their first experience was either one of faintness or that they could not get any air to breathe....

Starring was indeed dumfounded, because now it was September, and quite a long time since the awful june disaster, and yet suffering to an immonse and terrifying degree continued throughout all the devastated districts of Calverinia. Food was being recieved but aid came alow, because of destroyed communications, and the majority of refugees who could flock to the bigger cities were able to recieve more aid than elsewhere, or those who could not come, and they horrified the people of the cities with the harrowing stories that had to tell. The biggest flock of refugees flocked to Cal verine, Sacramento, Eanbon, and Also Pandora, Mica hollester, and other places and Starring had recieved word from both Calverine and Pandora by wireless that all those who arived as refugees said that the dumb unimals sufferered worst than the people. The authorities believed that by the disasters before the clandellniams some how or other might have given some nort of warnings of at least the storms of fire which they had been storing up to hurl upon the forests, that the refugees though they heard the warnings of row not refused to heed them, and therefore remained, and the danger which had ang confronted them brought destitution to many thousands, but no warning was given of the approaching explosion disaster.

Starring knew that animals of all kinds can usually suspect a disaster long before it comes, for as survivors told Starring, live stock throughout the country became sneasy, and at times were almost uncontrollable. Callt Cattle lowed in the night, horses acreamed hens and chickens showed great uncusiness, there was signs of panic among all kinds of birds in the sky, and dogs howeled and sought the company of their, masters, and gave overy evidence of fear. Cats even though usually fearenme of dogs nought their company and dogs harmed them not, but lowed even for their sympathy. Wild animals of all kinds disappeared from the vinicty of all forest fire horrors, and even the make, which at ordinary times are found in great numbers crawled away, the much needed prosence of floregistements greatures was a thing of the past, and all birds ceased singing, and left the tream of the forests, no that no birds were seen. They all consed either disacter, somed to know what the socretly disguised landeliniums were doing, and therefore a great fear seemed u to be upon the whole land, and though at times it was shared by the human inhabitants, they alone apparently neglected to protect themselves, or were not propared... There was another thing that was more autorishing to starring, and that was of the reports he had frequently recleved of the delicately suspended magnitude need to at all count lines throughout the world, in all the goodstic survey observatories being disturbed by the ernormous explosions, at the time the catastrophe at Abbieums was reported to have occured. The delicate supparatus int installed at all of these observatories are so arranged that they register automatically by photographic means the very minutest variations in the direction and intensity of the earth surths magnetic force.

Eron it can be a noteworthy story that all seismological observatories throughout the world also reported a seismic disturbance all over during the time of the awal;

No magnetic effects due to volcanic eruptions of the most violent kind on Calverinia had over been recognized at such magnetic observatories, and therefore gturring believed the explosions he wiched to investigate were rath rrather queer. In calverinia before this disaster, pre purely mechannical vibrations from natural earthquakes or by the other explosion disasters have been often registered by the delicately poised magnetic needles. The Lake Selicia Explosion disaster for instance was recorded not only by seismographe at various places, but also in Abbisannia and foriegn countries and magnetic observatories, but this explosion concussion merely caused a mechanical vibration og the magnetic needles about their mean position of rest and lasted for about a few matter minutes, whereas the explosion disaster of June the First was a distinct magnetic effect, pulling the needles asife aside from their usual direction and lasting two days.

The Mary Jame soon reached the city of Violst Paul. where this city had stood he saw that day a molten hecacomb of burning buildings and walls, which proclaimes the horrible story of the fate of the people of this city also in a awful stench that was made manefost in spir spite of the smoke laden air, while the ship was yet twenty miles away from it. He found it possible however to penetrate the outskirts of this city from the southwest, but in no other direction. A hill looked like an exupting volcano to the west of the city, and further off to the northeast and east all wasrolling walls of clouds smoke and flame, where the houses were more thickly built the wall of fire that struck had consumed everything but the stone walls, and the wave of fire that pured up the sides of the cloudtion reaching to the city when Starring reached the place, and he overheard that the concussion of the explosions though further from here had overthrown most of the buildings, and that just recently the forest fires struck, and IO₂000 men fighting desperately with every meanw means at hands, and all the citys fire departments could not save the city.

Therefore no one was able to rescue the injured pinioned in the wreckage or get at the corpses and that the smoking smouldering ruins was hiding the bodies of the thousands the fallen buildings had engulfed in an indescriably horrible doom. There was no need here of funeral pyres, for scenes beggaring descriptions was done by the conflagration, and bravery also beggaring description was enacted by the survivors who had strove either to make some disposition of the dead or save the city from the conflagration. wen now after the conflagration, wherever there ix is a spot that is easily reached in the face of the terrific heat, little groups of men were a seen engaged in dragging together the horribly charred bodies of the vitims victims which were piled together. There was no need of reburning them, they were already burned to a crips crisp. Ano above and by youd the presence of the present horror there was or is in the minds of those who have taken up the work of destroying the horribly burned corpses, a still greater horror. A plage was stalking in the wake of the conflagration.

After an hours interview Starring left the Mayor of the city who by a miracle survived. He was recking with the funes of smouldering wreckage and bodies, his clothing was in rags, and his face showed the horror of the work he had been engaged in the was directing the work in person. He explained to Starring that it needed but labor of salvaging the city had been inspired by the common desire to frustrate the conflagration.

"I do not believe we any longer can find it a most disagreeable duty that we do altogether from motives of humanity and chairty" he said to starring. "It u is a duty to the living. The many thousands of unbirued dead, almost impossible to reach on account of the heat of the smouldering ruins must be disposed off, or 1 tell you air the whole State and the con country in general will be ravaged by a tremendous plague and blotted from the world entirely. We have not the materal material for the work and no one can face the heat. There is not a bit of wood that could be obtained indeed it would take a whole forcat of wood and tinver, and a luke of mortar and a sea of bricks to rebuild our city, and the forest fires are wiping out our means for that. A lake of aspault tar would be needed to recover our streets. There are countless of corpose in overy direction sir under these smouldering ruins, and though of course they may have been cromated beyond recovery and the conflagration has caved us from the work of disposing of them yet aleas we are noon provided with menca to means to aid in the rebuilding of the city, we will be hepoless for wours. I expense of course we are not the only sufferer as many other cities suffered too.

It has no even been at all possible to approach even into the near interior of the city for the heat,,, is fierce, and the calvaring has not even started. Of course riches we are seeking tot trying to find means to restore as city as far as it is possible. It is almost impossible to do anything at all for the despairing energy of the men who have lost family and fortune in the catastrophe have all gone off to the army to revenue their leas on the enemy. I am here to see the boy of my own wife and children who met their own deaths. And I have no means of telling just how many died in the overwhelming of the city, but there so far are only a thousand men surviv ors, and sixty thousand women and children servivors out of a population of over one hundred and fifty th usan thousand. Thousands others surely have been caught at night in their beds and died under the rains of their buildings, and po pinioned there while other thousands finally died in the deadly storm of fire and confligrations that struck the city, impro imprisoning many who had tried to sale selvage their last hopes. and the work here by these soldiers is carried on in the face of such a death an never was met by any person before. The clouds of smoke from the firen hangs over the sky day in and day out nover allowing us a fringe of sunshine. And even sir while the awful work of the goldiers are going on here, we are fortunate enough to report that no far no Glandelinian ghould have at freed their way into our city, and no one has yet robbed the homes of the dead that may be entered. Of course nevertheless we are careful and have posted gu r guards, and the soldiers have orders to shoot any porsons acting suspiciously but none have been seen so far.

In trying to salvage what can be saved desperate chances have been taken by these soldiers who fight their way the through still hot ashes and shouldering ruins to get into the houses to save from the ruins what they can. I hear that throughout all the seried disaster zones famine menances the people all over the southern part of the state, and as far as possible a general exodus of the people are commencing. At present those who are leaving for the north have only a little food supply, but it must be restored in a few days or they won't even be able to continue their flight. I will air also tell you of my experience. It was early in the morning when it occured or at least a little after midnight. I had been in the southern outskirts of the city in my own home, watching the glow of the nearest forest fire, and the air was so hot and stifling that I did not sleep. There was a thick cloud over the sky that that but that that being from the forest fire was not at all musual. I went back several times into my bed room and tried to sleep, and that I was not ill by any fever produced by such heat, or did not suffer a heat prostration Im could not understand. I believe however my being mable to sleep is the reacon why I am alive to

The last time made my trips back and forth, walked down the steps and into the streets, when suddenly there was a sight which prever thought provide behold. The horizon sky in the west seemed to suddenly flare into flame, there was a most terrifif terrific eruption, and it was as though all the thuder that ever round. and all the caron in this war, and in the world in that one space had been set off at once, added by the esimultaneousl explosion of all the power powder factories and munition companies together. In lay flat on my face insuently knocked down by the sudden shaking of the carth by the explosion, whether you believed it or not, wooden houses either played at leap frog, or acted like popcorn in the hot shaker, and big buildings crashed down in clouding ruins with a terrible roar. I could not have lain there an instant when r recovered my senses. There was a rouring sound as though all the houses were either being torn to pieces or falling to the ground. It was perfectly black all about me, and in raced for a sewer cover my county safty from falling buildings, and as I reached the bottoml only elx foot below me there was a blant of wind coi coming that was as hot as a flame. I might as well have died and been in hell. The heat drove me mad. I could not stay there, and I lifted myself out. A strong wind was blowing lke a hurricane, a gale so hot that, could not breathe and clouds of dust and smoke hid the neurost buildings like the densest fog. It was now darker now than ever, the air was full of mortar dust and the smell of powder and some strango cas, and almost went blind, and felt dopy. I reched into what place I . found not injured, dipped my handkerchief in the water which - let into a basin and tied it over my face and then went out.

The roaring of more falling buildings was fearful, but not as loud as compared to the thunder that come now near now distant that came from fresh eruptions every few minutes. I was compelled to make my way on my hands and knees, to the back wall of my home not daring to expose myself to that accreting hot wine finally I took the wet was off my mouth and saw that a part of the wall had been thrown down, and had fallen into the river, the building being on the adge of the atreum. Strange to me the front part of the building was moving along with other houses. I thought was mad, and seeing strange fantactic things. As a bright glow added to the groun, I then sould see about me for some distance. There was not a being in sight and the upper sections of high buildings rained was still every now and then crushing down. A dreadful fire was a flashing from many of the houses, that seemed to be covered with some strange plantic substance that loked like clay and mud or wet sand. The heat made me frantic, and I throw myself down over the broken wall into where, had hoped the vater had been.

I fell on a pile of stones and lockily did not break my legs. I tried to crawl along the river beach and fell into what beked like a sand pile. It strangely enough was burning hot, and n a nearly burned me before I relled myself off. I then found a place under a large rock where there was some water. I stayed there all the runt of the night watching the fidal wave of forest fires in the distance, and wondered

Charles Shirt and the second second second

Another man who said he saw thesepposed eruption from the highest part of a hill, and who escaped death after being almost thrown over a cliff, tells something of the story of the explosion in lucia intervals. The man had been insume at times from his sufferings. He was a ranger on guara on the hill top on the midnight hour of the cataclysm of the explosive horror......

He said to gtarring;

If was pacing my beat, when was numberly startled by an awful thundering rour that rent the air and sky, and made all the trees within my view quiver. The veryhill itself shivered as though she were in a convassion. Of course sir no one cannot describe how the thundering crash sounded, neither I myself, for the noise leit me senselses for several moments, then stood up, there was for several seconds a great upright shaft of flames that such have to my notion reached for many miles, and could be seen as if a thousand volcances were belching forth flery towests of white hot lava. And I could see leaping from two sides of the shaft of fire a great roll of something heavy and black. I almost simultaneously looked tward the city und asw it disappear in a cloud of dust. The hill was only a few miles from the scene, and I could see the poseople who had not yet gone to bed for fear of the distant fires running about.

Thousands had suddenly run out of the houser at the first awill rour, and most of them kni knelt in the streets. It seemed only an instant more before everything hid from view in a cloud of white dust. Violet Paul city, with all its houses, all the people praying a and running about in the streets, all everything seemed to have been swallowed up into the bowels of the earth unia a great eruption and cloud of dust. An ernormous cloud shot over head twurd the hill at the name instant that the city disappeared from view, and the shaft of flame and fiery materials whatever they were began to fall out of the sky. There was an awful hissing sound as the cruption collapsed to the ground. And then at it was all over. I do not remember anything more of the

No one yet has been able to effect a landing on the landcape shore north, of the city, and all who have the courage to say it have given themselves to the idea that the entire population of the cities and torms within the explosion area has been obliterated, as was that of Abbleann. The few refuçoso on board the Mary Jane said that there is not a green thing lini living in any part of Calverinias disaster zone. So far as the shore of the land on both sides of the river can be soon from the Mary Jane this can be true of other parts of the country, and the lashes left after the passage of the forest fires have made a barre and barren and horrible wante of what was a week ago on close of the garden epots of the Calverinian world.

As the boat prepared to resume the trip, there came to the captian from Port Hansen that the written descriptions of the ruins of Abbicann wrought by h the explosion fell far short of the reality reality.

Starring had observed also with his own eyes the most remarka le and to ograpi topographical changes wrought by the effects of the great explosions. th The ship passed within view of a wide crevasse. Stopping at one place a sounding of the river was attempted near within sight of a cre crater end a remarkable change in the river bed off the northern section of the city was noted.. In some places the leaden wire sank fully thirty fathoms deeper in the river than anything known for river depths before finding bottom. This was a peculiar phenomenom..... This easily explained why under ground cable communications had also been cut off in some sections y by the explosions. Another witness to an exexplosion said the air was cut and slashed with strunge eletric discharges after the blast, and that a strunge ball of fire and fiery clouds lighted up the country for miles. As the boat passed by the houses of the ruined city, starring observed that th cw the work was preceeding as slowly as the Mayor had said, and under circumstances of the most greatest difficulty. He had long before expected that landelinian vandals being attracted by the hope of loot would invade the ruins and he was surprised that this was one diguster with the exception. Of course as the Mayor said troops ad had been placed on guard, with orders to deal with the vad v? valda vandals as nefits their shameless crimes but not a vandal appeared. Twenty neven women, and four men and gixteen children had been brought to the ship with the hope of being refugeed but there hardly was room for them. Starring knrw knew that work in the ruins of this city was dangerous, for crumbling walls were a serious mesuace to working parties and therefore he had no intention to explore. He had unged the Mayor that for suftys sake what remains of the city should be leveled with dynamite. Even he had observed when hodies were found their identification had been difficult or impossible, and inhabitants of surviving towns near the city had been forced to quite their homes on account of the odors from the dead and the gases emanations fr m the distant forest fires. And public services of all kinds were sadly impeded by the heavy task that had fallen upon the authorities in distributing in the southern part of the country around liolet paul the refuses from the northern part.

Scientists that finally were coming to the explosion area believed that the cruptions were not at all volcenic activity, and that a general expectation of another and more severe explosion was out of the question. Yet during each explosion earthquake concussions and followed each of one in quick succession, and were sufficiently severe to do great and immensurable dumage, filled the whole state with f fear, and now if it had been possible to obtain transportation it can be safe to say that the whole of Calverinia would make been depopulated within two weeks.

To Starrings vision the whole countryside seemed to have been changed in its shape... whole sides of high hills seemed to a have disappeared, the top of one hill with its forests have also disappeared, and from a distance another mountain mountain looks as though a mightysteem rooler roller had been pressed upon it, crushing down its apex.

As far as the boat continued to run over the entire county country as far as eye could reach spreads a peculiar mist or fog-the -hog, which was injurious to the eyes and which seemed to contain noxious gases that caused m very much distress.

Some of the buildings built by the farmers cill stand, and yet in every one there,, are bedies, and Sturring also observed that standing about in the open wer many bedies of unimals, blisterning in the terrible hiest heat.

And therefore the result is that a effluwa spreads of v over the country which is very nauseating, and which threatens a postilence that will further decimate the States population, and therefore Starring urged that such precautions as are possible-should be taken to ward off fevers, but just now the most that can be done indeed in very little.

There were not mough man found to have buria; parties as so many are in the anny, and therefore soldiers dragg the bodies out with ropes and chains to trenches to trenches or ditches for fivernment, and so even creaming the bodies are too close to the heat zone they cannot be approached, and untill the heat of the forest fires die down they must remain to ask to add to the st ench that is now almost unbeurable.

Since the beginning of the disaster starvation at many places too was or is a condition that actuall, existed throughout parts of the horrorsone, and as Starring heard over thirty thousand refugees, are lightly fed at Pandora and also sheltered by the Government near the cities of St George and pichael, but millions are in need of food. Supplies are still very slowly coming in, not even fast enough to meet the demands one third of the way. Hany boats to work relief had even to be built and it was reported that relief ships that are hastening to other points, cannot even find traces of the so called cities that were to be surviving after the flood..

Everything was being complicated week after weeks Even the water famine is causing more distress than lack of food. Many of the former supplies of water have disuppeared either because of the draining by the flood or by the heat of fires.

Rivers that were running bank full before the explosions, and before the forest fires are dried up or evaporated away by the heat... Even lakes have evaporated, and only in the location of the flood zone is there any water to be had and it is filthy.

The biggor rivers are muddy and gray and not fit for drinking nurposes. East of violet Paul city a stream of some size can be seen flowing tward the Middlester Run down which the Mary Jane is sailing but no one has approached close enough to tell whether it is fresh or impregnated with filth, as much of the remaining rem streams are... Starringbwrote this in one of his reports to the

"We have just arived at Violet Paul city on September the first early in the morning, and had at once made arrangements for landing my men with the purpose to investigate the explosion rules. The surviving members of the population and the Mayor expressed keen appreciation of our mission, but we could not go far. We saw hundreds of refugees leaving the city, all of them without anything except the clothing worn by them, and many carrying their coats on their heads to ward of the amothering heat of the ruins. They were dazed, and did not know what to do to care for themselves. The Mayor said the situation is unusual, as nothing could be done to save the city. I and all with me were struck with the apparent apathy of the surviving inhabitants of the ruined city. And their calmess while speaking of the catastrophe was unusually remarkable. We were took told, the explosion near this place, wreckeden good portion of the city, and a confligration finished the work. Yet it is impossible to ga give any kind of a description of the condition we found existing in this city and the country about. The country for many miles in the east is covered with amouldering debris left by the fires in the forests. and the stench that comes from the bodies in the city is so strong that it is very offensive ten miles from the city. Our party of investigators landed at the easier part of wielet Paul w but we were only able to penetrate about one hundred yards. All of us for I time became ill. We had disinfectionts but they did not make any impression on the stench.

Hear as the forest fires were still raging, and Scientists who made a studybof of it say the heat is three hundred degrees a half mile from the fire. The bodies in the city itself were incincerated, and the stone walls of the buildings were melted and crumbled...... I tried to 50 through the city, yesterday on horseback i i with the purpose of visiting afterwards over fifty miles of the stricken territory, not to get in some of its terrible scenes of devastation, but to try and find acoun to one of the cratery caused by the so called exaction and investigate. As I passed through the small parties of the city I came across a place where I believe I observed over three thousand bodies. Outside the city in the safer zone thousands were in improvined hospitals, and, came across many refugeen flocking into the camp as every one because of the fary and rata ravages of the forest fires are panic stricken. And the burned lving cattle wander in agony on the roads. Water in almost impossible except by the river, and it seems as if hundreds of miles of country in the east in this location will soon be covered with burning embers of our once be catiful forests.

The entire northeastern section of the country beyond the city in covered with a dept depth of smouldering ashes and embers and trees, and the mim minimum of the dead is put at fifteen thousand, and the highest at twenty thousand. It may be sixty thousand. The destiture in other sections are everywhere suffering and the weither weather is dry and very hot. The disaster radically differs from that of other places in the greater area and all the raval districts affected. wickey Lanein which is twenty miles from the explosion area has been as badly demagasd as violet Paul, but Violent Paul is not so seriously hundicapped having escaped the conflagration.

Among the incidents noted is that of the matron of an op orphen asylum and her husband, and own children, and all her little charges that is the orphans, and twonty nume and two priests killed at once. On the road to the Big irl Knool or Yullow Brick Road I saw many bodies and much smouldering rubbish. Mundreds of country towns were buried by the debris thrown up by the explosions. There may be hundreds of bodies under each. We saw horrible scenes in the camps and refugee hospitals, where the many injured were dying on the ground, the number of nurses being very small, when , entered Wickey Lansin first, sixty thousand refugees were waiting for river boats to take them to Pandora and other places. Thirty thousand have come into River town. gven in these cities many people had perished, the survivors suffering from the terrific heat, and in wat of food and water. The Government has the greatest of all difficulties in relieving and saving so many people scattered over such larges large territories when they cannot be reached, and now number od of people to be fed and cared for are said to be reduced by starvation and plugue. I will endeavor to get to Abbieann when things are more favorable. Will have to remain in the vinicty of Violet Paul for a week.

Fortunately the city and many others places are not infested with glandelinian pillagers, but nevertheless the aurthorities are on their guard, and will mete out severe measures if vandals do appear. We were asked to explore the ruins of violet Paul for valuable books and papers, but the heat is so terrific we cannot penetrate more than a hundred yards. A forlegne Officer, an englishman, secured the Sacred Vessels of the ruins of a church, and has been tay on to Pandora, where he had the Sacramentals placed under proper care. There were hundreds of bodies found and interned interned esterday, making a total of 12345 buried so far.

Yet the work of internment is presenting the most greatest difficulties. no funeral services can be held. Even some Italian sailors and men and children were saved who we th were thought to have perished at the time of the explosion.

The nest morning hoping it would be cooler I travled over the desolated eastern portion of the citys outskirts, foolishly taking with me the two girlscouts and one of the boys, and an wand they were bruin sick at the eights witnessed. Still the smoke of the forest fires obscures the landscapes, and when wind blows even showers of hot ashes and flaming embers continued to sweep upon us at intervals. On the lower levels of the road , oncountered many floring from their homes and the forest, fires Then in company with the Mayor I spent much time in encouraging and pacifying the country people!, who are now in a state of terrible panic. That of the police that survived and the soldery who came also lent active service, and if the forest fires subside there will be no more disorder and quiet will soon be restored. I saw at one of the came hospitals a an old man who told me he was driving to Abbieann at the early midnight hour of the great catastrophe and got caught in the very edge of the cyclone of gas and flume and debris that came from the explosions or eruptions. So close was I to the burning sufficiating cloud of the explosion, that my horse was killed by it, and I was badly burned. Another man told me that noticing a violent oc oscilliation of the needle of the barometer, he harried with his family to calverine four hours before the digaster. I am sending this cable message to Pandora, and will soon push on tward Abbleann. There are plenty of imusual scenes of the explosion and flood violence, and great danger in the upper reaches but so complete has been the destriction of life that I full to percious any signs of recovery for any one. After leaving the safest part of the city, I entered the real no zone of the explosion effect.

gverything here was covered with thick layers of debris, unlike the stuff seen elsewhere. Judging from what I and my followers saw here, I should imagine that great streams of mid wreckare and water, and still burning powder fell tward Violet aul and water and and gravel and other debrie nearer to the crater, and tward the north. I wished to reached one of the craters, but the heat of forest fires drove me back. At noon I reached bittle greek several miles from violet Paul. Work among the rains of St Violet Paul and other villiages near by has ceased, and the burial parties have been forced to flee to each o the heat from the fire ...

Many refugee-chai longed to return to their homes,, believing that the forest fires might turn another way but they are now again in full flight, and the distress is increased. Search had also been made by a party from the River crews for the body of the governor of pengall State who with all the members of his family p rsi perished in the debris, but the search has now been abandoned, and the searchers have returned to giver Knell. They report that the heat of the fires is unboarable, and it is now believed that the body of the governer cumnot be recovered. When I came to the city the conditions did not seem dangerous, and , had intended making a tour of inspection of the crater, but owing to the fierce heat of the fires the trip was not a success.

When our ship arived boats were lowered, and , and all of my officals and the child scouts started for the shore. Before a landing was made, the foreset fire hit some explosives somewhere which went off with terrific noise. The crash was not in the direction of the city, and no demage was done, but the investigators fled precipitately, back to our ship, leaving me alone with the girls on the shore.

It was at this time that the the workers abandoned their labors among the ruins and took refuge in flight.

While on the bout we took soundings of the river, and it was discovered that the bed of the river had been changed by the strange upheavals, that have strangely accompanied the explosions. In some places the bed of the river had dropped beyond the reach of the deepest plummet which s rprised us greatly. And yet in some places rocks and land have been forced to the surface that do not appear on any chartt, and which jav have never been noted before.

As I watched the shore move as the ship passed on, there was panic everywhere. I met women and children struggling tward unfore unforested hills, and all were so baily frightened they seemed dazed, even almost afraid to look behind them. As I passed beyond the ruined city I m met many of these refugees and they were too frightened to speak. There is danger everywhere of pestilence, and great epidme epidemic os disuses are raging elsewhere. It has been estimated that there were four hundred and fifty explosions within the minutes between Elel Eleven thirty and twelve oclock be of before the big ones came. and the extent of the devastation cannot now

According to witnesses no mud or other explosion debris feu fell upon the country districts, which were however fe frauly besprinkled with the dry dust hurled into the air by the explosions. It is probably the explosions gave a good demonstrat ion of a force o of which the world before knew nothing. It is believed that the singing g' flame was the stil' burning powder, traveling with strange cyc. cyclon ic force and rapidty. Outside of the immediate heat zone the dame damage was not so great. A great iron locomotive engine standing in the path of the shooting flame from the explosion was affected in a most singular menns manner. One side was melted while the other side was scarcely to ached by the intense heat. Dust fell everywhere and most harrifying details of the condition o of the country where dead cattle and heman bodies lay for days are told. Although the numbers of dead in this city due to the endiagnter is estimated judging from the missing inhabitants at twenty thousand up to now only fifteen thousand bodies have been rirecovered and buried. The undiscovered bodies probably are still under the debris.

I discovered in the ruins of a building a hundred and eighty seven bodies, and not one of them could be recognized. In other "wine bodies were found in similar condition. and other terrible discoveries have been made. Hany injured persons are suffering from fractured skulls caused by the wreckage of buildings falling on them. "Although attended with smaller loss of life the destruction of villiages is sever.

Officials in the vinicity are busy relieving the sufferers and making camps for the injured and the hopele homeless. The main problem now facing the government is how to provide permanently for the people who lost all they possessed as they cannot be reached.

The area covered by the forest fires in this neighborhood comprises an unknown number of miles. The fact that the loss of life is so severe is of the suddeness of the disaster."

When the ship finally was to continue on, in the investigators were to have weird and interesting a experiences. And it was only through what seemed pri providental accident that the steamers engines were saved from serious injury as the result of the owiftness of the ships movements. Starring also brought up the information that the visitation brought upon calverinia was looked upon by the survivors as that done by nat re and not the glundelinians this time. He heard several of the residents of a town that survived telling one another that they believed the dee ruction of so many cities and towns was a terrific convulsion of nature and of volcanic activity from the ground, but Starring believed different.

As the ship continued on he noticed a peculiar haze o covering the landscape and the river in the distance. The air seemed more heavy and oppressive, and the weather conditions were not at all unlike those which proceed the great Mic-Whirthian Seas Typhoons or hage circular sea tornadoes but knowing it was not the season for them to come along the shore or enter my parts of the country, Starring rek remarked that there must be a heavy storm approaching and that at last the forest fires will be soon but out. 'any of the sailors, who were not only men of river ships but who have been very experienced seamen laughed at these prognogligations, and informed Starring and his friends, that there would be no such a thing as a storm for a month and inslated that according to all indications, a dead calm was in sight. Yet indeed so unusually peculiar were these weather conditions that gtarring and his followers valked talked of nothing else during the day. That early evening in the direction of the straight southeast in the direction of the southern section of the Marie Osborne forests there was a very black sky, an unusual thing indeed at that season of the year, and yet starring was hopeing that a storm was brewing, which would souse the fires., though this cloud was not in the direction which storm come from in the great Calverinian countries.

As the evening wore on those on watch noticed what appeared b to be great flickerings of red lights in the dird direction of the Marie Osborne porests, and it also seemed as if the ordinary conditions were becoming reversed, and even the so called ships prophets were unable to offer explanations..... Occassionally over the pounding of the engines and the rush of water, starring and all on board the ship, thought they could hear long deep rours not unlike the ending of a deep peal of thunder. Sometimes they heard the rumble and the roar, but at the time they were not certain as to sa exactly what it was or see even whether they really heard it, or

Every now and then there would suddenly come great glares, and flashes of light flickering up and down, changing to a dull red glow from the dark bank bank tward the Marie Osborne region. Sometimes the glow and even the flushes and flickers of light seemed to spread over a great area, while others seemed to sour skyward, sheet and tongue shaped. And all night this continued, and it was not untill day came that it ceased. The dark bank however that covered the sky did not fade away with the breaking of day, and later that morning the whole section of the sky in that direction seemed darker and more troubled.

At about seven oclock giarring was sitting on one of the hatches, with Angeline riches and Jennie Turmer, and discussing the peculiar weather conditions and phenomena with the officers of the ship. A few minutes later the lookout called out that they were runing into a big fog bank dead shead. Fog banks for a landscape at such a time of the year were unheard of, and gtarring wondered what could a fog bank being doing here at this time of the year, and also he surmised that forest fires would prevent the fog. He winked at Jennie and whispered-

"It's smoke." . Before they knew it however, they were in- into the fog, which indeed proved to be a big dense bank of smoke, and it spread over them from all sides and seemed to move slowly from the sust. Ventilators were quickly brought to their places, and even the hatches were battened down. The strangely coming heat and fog becoming suffocat ing, and all on board had all they could do to keep from chocking at times. what the fog was most of those on board at first could not conjecture, or rather they did not have much time to try to investigate what it was, for they had to get their ship in shape to withstand they hardly knew what. At first they though that they might have entered the zone of some volcanic eruption, and then they decided that if the captions figures were right, they wouldn't be nearenough to the farthest volcano to have such volcanic vapors blown down upon them, there was more the small of burning wood in the air, and as they had just passed violet Paul they knew the captians figures were right.

Just as the fog conditions were at its height, one of the emineers was mearly sufficiated by it, and it was some time before he could be revived. And just about this th time t it became so dark that they found it necessary to start up the eletric lights, and it was not ntill they had not clear of the smoke fog that they turned the current of current off. In the mountime they had burned from eight oclock in the morning, untill after five in the afternoon. Thard five oclock they were somewhat clear of the fog, but at seven oclock that night they run into a second ank bank of it, though not as bad as the first. That following night there was more of the same distant fiery phenomena tward the same direction but a little nearer, but it was not untill they halted near a large shelving in the shore of the river, where they saw one of the wrecked ships that they knew the fog was smoke of forest fires.

Sturring seeing the wrecked ship covered with debrie and the so called explosion dust, took to a small boat and rowed to the craft, boarding it, and looked over the finer debris to see if it was so called lava or not. He found the dust itself was superior to granite and other stone mixed and superior even to emery dust. He found it it cut deeper and quicker, and only about half as much was required to do thecwork.

He made up his mind to keep what he saw, to investigate it and so he gathered it up. The decks of this ship showed the effects of the fiery exact erution through which it had passed. All about the decks fine dust could be seen working out of cracks and crevices, where the brooms of the men had not reached in their efforts to sweep it up into a back of to hold for inventibation. In places the pain was blistered, and in the leftier priions of this ship, the pain t which was collectived as if if it might have been partly scorched off, and then covered over with some kind of browning wet mand and mad. Innthe lifeboats and wlasw.ere, were mounds of gravel and debria and dust. Sturing had a large jar filled with the debris.

Starring visited no of the officers of the wrecked ship who described the storm of shooting fire, through which the ship passed in a seconds time as being lke like a severe snowstorm of sparks with the thermometer at 110 degrees. The most harrowing picture Starring observed was that of the caption of the ship. He scarcely looked like a man at all he was burned and scarred and injured so bedly lie sat with his area supported on pillows, and he said to gtarring jokingly that there was not enough flesh left on one of his arms to feet a cut with.

One of the officers on this ship who was a native of Calverine, said he left Abbieum for the purpose of visiting his wife and daughter, and his story indicated that his departure from Abbieann was just on time to escape possible destruction. "There is a volcano not far from calverine" he said But they said it is almost practically extinct. If these disenters have anything to do with volcanic activity us is said then it is unusual."

"Could you see anything of the terrible outburst near abbicann from calverine?" Starring asked him."

"you h answered" Only did see the hedious burst of red flume from forest fires which would leap for into the black clouds lke swiden bursts of fluming lava shooting up into the air as if from a mighty furcane furnace. Then the explosion came the shock was felt even in alvorine, I was thrown out of bed, and there was a mighty wrenching and shaking of the earth, with a noise that sounded to me as if all the powers of the iniverse were struggling under your feet. I have recieved word that suf fie sufficient supplies were on hand to meet the emergency, but even though public supecriptions have continued even now it is hard to reach all the reople, because with all the great diseater before, this big one complicates all. For the present no further say lies can even be sent to any spot by our state and city governments and it was that the State Governors advised that all people that can should leave the disaster zone and come north where they can be taken care of. The imperor has called upon the army and many officers in all localities to express their views upon the sufficiency of the supplies available, and when their rep i replies are recieved he will take immediate action."

The excitement throughout every place St arring had gone to was still most intence. He had come upon many refugees, destitute, starving and frightened by the appalling disasters at Abbicann and grave and similarly serious damage in more northern northern and southern sections of the land. He hoped most strongly that good rains would come to come the forest fire conditions as they were hindering his efforts. One good thing Starring had ardent hopes for in bringing about good results.

Ever since the big disasters had occured, throughout, other portions of the country in all the big cities, at the close of High Hasses every day funeral psulmd were chanted every day for months and prayers for the dead were said in memory for the purpose of memory of those who perished in the greatest disasters, and special and frequent movemen and littenies were offered to the cause to be known. Every Mass or at Every Mann and every Evening gervice and every Novena the Congregations were record breaking, and good collections for the aid of all of Calverinian suffers were continually taken up. At a special service held in the Church of the Holy Hame, city of Pandora, the citys Cardenal and all others coming there pronounced absolution on the whole State of Calverinia. The commomorative services for the disaster dead , was held at Notre Dame, Cathede cathedral, Angelinia Agathie City, this service being a high religious and Pational, Imperial function in behalf of the stricken State, General and appropriate services for the calverinian victims were g held in all the churches throughout Abbicannia, and collections for the sufferers were taken

Starring had finnally learned of the fate of the ship from which the dust had been gathered up. It was the only ship that had escaped the terrible explosion at Abbieunn, and which had been on the river west of the city. Starring observed that the state of the ship was enough to show that those on board must have undergone the most awful experience, when he boarded the ship Starring had observed that its decks was covered with a mass of dust laying inches deep on the decks some other matter had fallen in a red hot state all over the steamer, setting fire to everything it struck that could bear, and when it fell on the men on board it berned off limbs and and large pieces of flesh. The caption finally told starring the whole storybof lis experience.

"I was standing by the railing of the ship talking to a woman passenger of the versel who had just come on board, when heard a terrible c noise as the firing of a legion of rest hage gins at once, and then saw what appeared to be an ernormous black cloud covered with a terrific flash of fire underneath, and like a wall with patches of fire in it, approaching the river from the north. With it came an immense shouf of fire accompanied by a most load and terrible roar. I shouted to the crew" but for shelters, but before they could do so the st marr was in ediately caughe ceaught by some modden heavy pressure and tossed over on her side almost being turned over entirely. Frebus darkness enshroused on all suidenly, and then all about the ship was flashes of fire, and comething like volume of red hot mafter showered down while the air was thick with strange of more and determed amoke. The Attivas a The River was a confused of rouring sames of rouring varieties of a nuiden. I feeling a re my ship had stoamed up at my orders, and instantly realizing the necessity of encape rushed to the engine room annunciator, and algorable below to the engineer to start the engine full apped speed. The unxious memora increased by we burne and agong of mind, and by the sight of the city going into clouds of dust with a terrible rour were relieved by the vibration of the unginess and the reply from below. The terrible rush of hot air which had swept over the ship and nearly captized her, parted the cable, and the vessel was adrift.

Then came other grant erations and concussions further away, and when the engines started it was found that the otering gour! a had become disabled in some manner and could not be worked. For more than two hours the ships engines were worked, bucking and going shead, with the hope of bring her head tward the river and away from the falling smoke and dust covered s city.

Ince she got dangerously near and almost between two ships all aftre. Some of those aboard were jumping into the boiling water of the river, some fell dying to the deck. All this time the strange wrackage was falling, and the water was rising as if there was the dangers of a flood. gambs and dust and falling wrackage filled the air and strange fumes like that of powder spread about. After three hours effort the steering year moved a little, and enabled me to head her out for the river, and with considerable diffu did difficulty y managed to steer her a little distance from the wharf of the city.

As the air cleared the scene aboard the ship became all the more ghastly. The ship steamed on through thick clouds of smoke, and the acresms from the the injured became more plainer. Some rushed frantically about with their clothing on fine and large pieces of flesh burned from their arms, others in their agony Lay writhing in the debris. It took us three hours more to get into more clearer air. Then an investigation of h the loss on board, showed that besides me, who as you see we fright frightfully injured, only one engineer and six sailors were able to do duty. Fire was still burning about the ship, and the rigging was in flames. I decided to rouch Poverty Now fourty five miles fistant. This We succeeded in doing by the next next morning. And in the time occupied on this terrible voyage the experience of the survivors was still worse than the former experience. I and my few men fighting the fire, exhausted and burned, struggled and worked, trying to do something to assist the dying shipmates and passengers. Those working below strove to I keep up the steam. I suffered the greatest angony agony, but succeeded in v navagiating my vessel saftly to the city of Poverty Row, with one hundred and eighteen dead bodies lying on the deck and human limbs scattered about. One of the surviving sailors stood by constantly wining my injured face and eyes .. "

Starring believed from this that the performance of the captian of this ship was indeed most wonderful, and the more so when he saw his pitiful condition. He did not understund how he kept up, yet when the steamer at that time had arrived at Poverty Row at which Starring was now and medical assistance was obtained, this brave man asked the doctors to attend to the others first, and refused to be treated untill

Sturring knws knows that since the outbreak of the war, every battle, avery earthquake shock from explosions, every war disaster so far, maneacres, and every horror known brings out a most curious phase of human nature. Many of those who had soon their houses destroyed or their nearest relatives killed, despite all perils have returned to the possible scenes of devastation as possible. But in this case it was not so. They hardly couldn't even leave the scene of devastation. They were cut off from escape and almost entirely from sufficient aid. It was so after the great Frientown horror, it was so after the lake Selicia and the Arronburgs Run flood diseaters, it was so after the floods swept Central calverinia, and in more recent weeks, the Aboteam disaster, the big floods, and other parts of the catastrophe confirm the old experience.

This disaster has indeed destroyed much more property than Starring ever imagined it would and an immeasureable number of lives, and restored a whole intion of people homeless, and he was forced to see a people forced to near in homes wrecked beyond recovery in sight of the telegraph pole from which the fatal live wire dangled or the flood in which so many drowned. He before could not concleve such a terrible catastrophe as that which so early in presented by overwholmed not only a big city but a whole country side, simply blotting out Bengal 1 gate as a land of fair homes and extinguishing its great agriculture and be inneas, and destroying half of southern Calverinia with flood, raising the old question again how the gover nment of Abblemnia can deal with such fearful events.

Think of the sulden ferocity of this power, whole country side being blown up as if it had all erufted with a nightler force than any volcano known, and hurling down upon effice as a towns masses of wrokage. Thus pertained Abblemn and Adeleheid entirely, and cany other towns, by explosion, and then to as by fleed. And not one withed revenue had even in these cities. Abblems was apostal in goodness of the posple. For people as a decent as those of any a sintly place, and it needed no must all vindicities judges at force haven as a set.

STARRING HEARS OF HOW THE ABBLEAUN EXPLOSION DISASTER MOVED MOUNTIANS FROM CONCUSSION.

THE FLOOD LAKE OVER APPLEAUN HAY STAY FOREYER......

Then said starring to sadeliffe ...,, while was told and remains that the gone through calls to my remembrance that which was told me of a thing that happ med to a number of forest rangers and even their leader loring the time a good part of general Arrenburgs army was fighting the forest fires near Trientown when a little girl called Ja nole was lost, and in danger from it. The name of the head ranger was pank Weaverton, he was a very good man, and go were his followers, and before he came out he heard that the fire was heading for riontown. The amount mas and thing was this however,, we and his rangers about about two hondred of them had entered a part of the foe forest , that stretches down from proudway greek, now known as Deadmane lane, so called because of the horrid results of the conflagration that swept there. And the Ranger and his followers, and come to this point with the hors of breaching against the fires. and save prientown Now the there had happened at that time, to come down the lane from the north bend of Broadway greek, three sections of the forest fire, moving forward gith great speed, now most of the men were stricken with terror, as the fire so suddenly came up so close to them, and though their leader bid them stand and work like mas, some of them looked as white as a shoet, and had noither power to fight or to fly.

Then said their leader-"Retreat to the lane fools ,read retreat to the lane." but but they making no haste to do it, for they were too confused to retreat for even their safty safty, their leader run as to them, eris crying out "To the lane, to the lane." Just at that moment a tree burning through fell, and a branch of it like a great clumb struck him on the head, and the blow felled him flat to the ground, where he lay bleeding. All this while his herror stricken members atood by not knowing what to do while the conflagration roured closer, but at last they hearing that the flames were coming acrosse the crock, and fearing leat they should be trapped, they belook themselves to their heals, two of them carrying their leader.

Another for force of rungers and man citizens of the docad city who also were striving to stop the conflagration came up and naved them, but their leader had been severely wounded, for not only his head was lacerated but his left arm was broken and his right leg crushed and his hip bone dislocated. This was the story.

"But did they not succeed in stopping the fire from hitting Irientown?"
"No No, the place was direct in its pa h path, but nevertheless his successor tried to hold against the progress of the fire elsewhere, but as 1 was told the rangers was much afflicted b, the loss o loss of ground, for the fire drove them before it. The part of the forest which the fire did not burn was the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch of the fire did not burn was the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch on the Big pind, it did not cross the stretch on the result of the trees still left, but scarce enough to tell that it was once a beautiful little ravine, may if it was not misinformed, they were forced to fight even to save their own lives. Dut struggle and do what they could, they had to retreat hantly for many miles untill they got to the Mic-Hollester River where it was too wide for even the wind to curry fluming embers acr across."

"But is it not a wonder the fire did not strike the town of certificate which stands some distance off from Irientown, by which way the fire could have crossed the big Mic-Hollester River."

"Tis a wonder, but the Big Bend prevented that, though the flames failed not through any effort of the fire rangers, for they being dismayed at the fire coming so suddenly upon them, had neither power nor skill to save the latter town, so was more by the intervention of our Blesned Lord than by their endeavor that the fire failed to cross Broadway Creek at the Big Bend. If it had even Evangeline St Claire would have been burned_Don'tbyou see that is what saved that big city tou_Because the fire failed to cross at Big Bend."

"But it must needs be a comfort to them nevertheless that the fire did not cross at the Bend, or they too would never have escaped."

"It might have been a great comfort to them, had they used the opportunity as they should, but they be that told me the story, suid "that they did not take much advantage of it, and that because of the dismay that they had in being so suddenly surprised by the fire hurricane, indeed they forgot what they were doing half of the time, indeed they forgot everything also but retreat and sufty all the way to the big river, and besides, when at any time it came into their minus, then would frush thoughts of their loss and failure come again upon them, and those thoughts would smallow up all."

"Alas poor Rungers, this could not be but a big greaf to them."

"Borief. Ay grief indeed, would it not a been so to any of us, had we been so that taken unawares as they, to be routed, and have our leader fatally wounded too, and that in so terrible a place as they were too for a time even cut off from escape so that they had to fight their way through the fire to safty. Tie a wonder his friend did not die with grief. I was told that his suce successor, acurr scattered almost all the rost of the way from town to town with nothing but deleful and bitter complaints. Telling also to all that evertook him, or that he overtook finthe way as he went, where his craws and the leader was surprised by the "Red Plugue", and how, who they were that were routed, and what ground they lost in the big fight, how the loader was f t fatally wounded, and he too and many others with him naraly escaped with his life..."

"put" continued Radeliffe"tic a wonder the necessities did not cause them to go to the ravine for refuge as commanded, that they might have relieved themselves of such experience."

"you my boy don't understand my saying a moment ago, they were cut f off from the ravine by the fire. In 11 that country the fire was eweeping, besides had they gotten into the ravine they might have been so suffocuted by heat and smoke of h the conflagration all around, ad that we d that would have been worst to them thus the retreat they were forced to make, and of their desperate fight through a narrow part of the flames."

'Why couldn'tithe; reach the Ravine. We succeeded in reaching one when the fire came up not but yesterda, morning, and that for a mess of foolishness that we were forced to do so, and if they could not do so why were we able to reach ours."!

"We did succeed in getting into a ravine, and so did all of our followers, and so by doing excluded the welves from the main fury of the conflagration. But you must put a difference between them rangers and as. Our escape from the flames was 'yrical, but the came of the rangers and their unfortunate ranger leader were not so. That Ravine was large, and our refuge, but that little lane for the rangers might not have been so sufe. Besides I could when in the tree top see the course the conflagration was taking, the rangers could see no further than a mile, for the smoke so were surprised. And for them though it was their lot to have the misfortume was by their not being watcheful n enough in the first place kept from securing a good place of refuse when the flames came up, and made to see that watchfulness pays. You read not each things happening in novel stories of fires, no not so much as even a little, therefore no marvel if only where the fire comes up unawares, and so quickly that no number of men can resist against it successfully. if they get cut so suddenly, for it is such as it is with the ass, who cannot be turned away before the dunger is too close. When their mide are set upon fighting against the oncoming fire when too close for eafty they will risk the danger, whatever the coot and rue their folly. But these rungers were of other kinds, their minds were on the fire only, therefore for what end could they have to come too

Their efforts was upon things more of speedy flight than of even thinking of the in lance, therefore to what end should they that were in such immediate danger think of going first into the raving or lane when they saw their leader felled by the tran, even had there been any chance of getting to the ravine on time, to save the selves themselves admid amid the inferno. Will a man heed other things when he sees his leader injured? Or can you persuade them to desert him. Though fear less ones can for any good purpose, do what they can to combat a fire of this kind, and hold their ground outright to boot, yet they have faith, maybe even saving faith but what can they do at the loss of a leader. Here therefore Radcliffe may be thy

"I acknowledge it suid Radcliffe. "But General, these three arms of the fire, I um persauded in my heart, were not us severe us the main body of the conflagration , and yet if the leader was not injured would the rangers have run, else think you as they lid, at the mere noise of the flames coming up the readway. Ighy did they not pluck up a greater heart .. ? They might I believe have stood one brust with the fire, and have yeilded only when there had been no other remendy but to make

u hasty retreut.... """""

That they were not bad fires being three branches of the main body, many have cuid, but the rangers did not find it so in the time of their triall trial. Of course I believe the branches were mere trifles or they being gurprised by the fire would not have escaped with their lives it being said they fought their way through it to the river. . As for a great brave heart, that they lost at the destruction of of the forests within their view, the injury of their 1 ader leader, and 7 percieve by thee my boy had you been the men concerned, thou art but for a rush brush, and then to yould, to retract. And verily since this is the height of thy opinion, now that the fires at are at a distance from us, should they appeared to us as suidenly without a warning, the conflagration might too have pus putus all also to second thoughts. But consider again, they may have been strutches ahead of the ain main big conflagration, which may have passed off to the right of groudway Breek and the fact that the men folk of the city of grientown came to their aid themselves saved them from perichad periching the flames that almost everteek them.

I waself with many rungers have been engaged often in fighting forest fires, even as thenecu unfortunate rangers were, and found it a most terrible thing... I was with a Ranger known as grank Appleby, and his mon were in a long line of buttle fighting ground fires, blasting and cutting down trees, and tracking and doing all other kind of work against the advance of the forest fire. The flames of the main conflagration almost set you as anexpectedly, and the leader gave out a warning and we all retreated to better quarters, jet I would as the sa,ing is, have given my life for a penny, but that as our Blessed Lord would have it, we were then clothed in abestone. Ay and though weavere so harmessed, we found it hard work to fight our way through that seetl seething wid amoking informe, no man can tell what in that combat attended us, but he or they who had beer in the battle themselves. That experience was when after the battle of adorning, the forest fire came up and so fiercal that the whole of gamnons army had to fight its way out it was so suldenly taken unawares."

"Well but you see the men of the ranger who was killed ran you see .. when they

aid but suppose h that the fire was about to overwhelm thom."

"True they had fled, then the fluxes had so suddenly appeared, and no marvel, for the fire if the blazes horror, but , trow you will put some difference bw between the ranger, and the flames, all of the fire was not heading for Broadway greek, nor could it cross at the gap near Big mend, nor could the rangers when tried do such fouts of war against forost fires that soom righ 1 impossible. It is meet to think that even the rangers I worked with could handle the work against the surging flames as they did, or that there should be numbers enough to put up a good fight vagainst the conflagrations, one partions of the head fires are strong and big, some have great fury and opoed, some have little fury but turn out to be big smoking ground and brush fires, and therefore they retreated nevertheless." "I wish it had rained for their sakes."

"Yes then there would be some hope, but without the help of rain all the forest range rangers have their hands full, for I must tell you, that though every one of the forest rangers in the country are excellent in their work, and has and can so long as they keep the fires at bay, do well enough in checking them or turning their cur course, yet if they get within their own domains, it shall go hard with may number of the rangers. And when a man is down jou know, what can be do?

The ever sees a great fight waged against an advancing fire natricane, shall easily give good demonstration of what | say. Yea once I heard that many rangers shockers almost caught in bad ground during the work declare that the, even descaired of life. How did the big conflagration travel up so far, despite all the efforts of the sturdy men. Yeu townsfolk and others are forced to bestir themselves, when their towns and villiages were in danger, and yet that notwithstandig, they were worsted and could of not wave their homes. Hansons whole army at Cedernine Creek after the buttle tried what it could do, but though some do say he is on one of the best of the christian generals, the fires routed his armics so, that the effects of his experience made him at last" afraid of a corry girl". Yet besides, the great general is at their help, he was and is never at of hearing, and if at any time they were put to the worst, he sent other troops to help them Think of a monsterous urmy like his fighting a forest fire to no avail it was said of general Hanson "The swords of the enemy that are laid against him carnot hold, the masket, the cunnon nor any weapon, he esteemed the fury of buttle as a lark, the worst chapee charge of the foe cannot make his army fly, he laughs at the roar of cannon, but his army could not hold against this worst enemy the fire.

Yet when a fire strikes his army, , , or takes it by surprise what can he do in this case?? This true if his armies could at a turn, have enough artillery to blow down all the trees inthe path of the flames,, and had artiller, men in enough to mun them, and courage to face the horrid" Red plague" of the forest, he and his staff generals might do notable things. Yet all the rangers are not and should, not be afraid of the forest fire as the grasshopper, even though the fury of the great fires are terrible, and wipe out a whole valley in half a days time, they should also rejoice in their tarlent, and go out with willingness to meet the conflagration right, to mock at feur, and not be afrighted, neither turn buck from the work, even though the firevitself destroy and swallow the forest with fierce ness and rage,, neither should they believe that it is the end of the world like many terrified iduits believe, and though should be able to detect signs of the forest fire fur off, the thunder of the 1 flumes, and the shoutings of the winds,

But for such as we adventuerers are, let us never desirevto meet without extreme necessity an enemy, nor vaunt as if we could do better when we hear ad other others that they have been foiled nor be ticked at the thoughts of our own munhood for such come mostly by the worst when tried. Witness general Hanson of whom _ had I had made of some mention before, he would swagger, my he would, he would as his mind prompted him to say, do better, and stand more for his armies, but who so foiled and run off with his army by these suiden approaches of fires as he.

When therefore when we near that such fires comes through good parts of the country, two things is best for us to do, first to go out with a body guard, and be harnussed to fight such conflagrations if caught, and to be sure to take a good supply of medicine with us, for it was for what of that also that Hansons army though it laid lastily at the fires could not stand. Indeed if that be wanting we could do nothing against the fire at all. Therefore he that had skill said; "Above all for all rangers when going out to b do battle against fires, take alo all the necessary materials, wherewith you shall be able to fight it to some advantue advantage if not all. Tis good also that we desire of our own friends, that we must depend up a upon god to follow us on our advantature advanture. This made general general maneone army rejoice when in this Calverinian "Valley of the shadow of Dau'h", and his leaders were for rather dying where they were, than go one step without their main leader. On commune all, if our pleased herd will but go along with us in this adventure, what need we be afraid of the thousands of fees that with set themselves against us, or even of the largers of the forest fires? but without him, we would never make any success. If or my part have been in the fight against the forest fires many times, and though though the help of our Blessed Lord. I am us you see allve, yet I cannot boust us being a here. Clad shall I be and you also if we meet with no more such brunts with forest fires though I fear we are not yet beyond any danger whatever by no means, nowever since the enemy and the fire has not yet devoured me, or the rest of us I hope God will also deliver us all from the other dangers, and aid us successfully in our adventure."

where the effects of the explosions at Abbisann had been known off, and I would not be afraid to say that it seemed to be as if the mountains literally a walkd walked, that from the concussion landeldes eddied like great waterfalls, that creveses occured or opened that swallowed houses, and trains, and farms, and villiages were swept away under a rising and falling now of loose earth and so "That is an unusual story" said Starring, and if the will make the Abbieum explosion, concassion, ad flood scenes one of the most appalling catastrophes in all history. But are you sure you are not talking through your hat or merely dedicating that?"

"Well general" you may scoff but it is true, it is not a fable by no means. The tremendous shaking up by the explantons have done this, even though most of the story had now began to spread beyond the points of proken communications. Beam Because of the extent of the diamater, and of so much communications ruined it is the most poorly broadcasted calamity that has ever occurred thouse who bring the news have travial far, and therefore the datalls of the disaster has never come over the wirse but by man on boats and by travelers and couriers, and from written statements of rescuers, ratiof parties and the survivors themselves. The population that did survivo were too staned, and too busy in relief work to give any description of the dancing mountains, variesing valleys, the cracks of the many miles of ground, the great floods and so on."

"You may agoof general, but ; swear it is true, and if you collave not we can go any time you say to see. I was with the party that visited the disaster scarse and we have brought back for our government one of the first accounts of the real horrors of the devantated country which other couriers and newschad not brought, and the strange things that happened when the explosions made the earth in the region of Abbisann turn itself into a strange contortionist. The urea of destruction by the concussion, two handred to six hundred, by 1000 miles in extent, not counting the flood, contained twenty large cities, besides many villiages and towns and a score of railways that run through. It is in the heart of the Bengal Country, where by the shock and concussion of the explosions the loose earth cascedes sown the sides or hills into valleys and buried every object in its prabh path."

"No at that section there was no flood of: Tales may be just as strungs as the horrors of Martingue Island, or of the couma Roman times of Pompeii and so forth which could be recounted of this dovastated area. As three fourths of the added dead from the shides are Calvorinians, the Abbieannians claim that the shocks w re were caused by volcanic eruptions underground. Some o gomehow the landslinian aurthorities have claimed the same so stoutly that it does soom very sus jpicious suspicious. Not far from this scene is the region where so many hundreds of miles of country is split into fiscures like shautered glass glass by the concussion, and by the river a whole country and forest sumk by the vibration and covered by a lake."

"I see the point " said Starring."One thing more I can say. Abbieann is buried also by water, and mud, never to be recovered of what had not been swept down the country by the water, and one of the most dramatic episodes of the disaster also is the destruction of the total of the population of the city, whose fate was sealed by the wreckage of buildings by the concuscion becabefore the flood descended upon the place, while the majority of the population lay dead and the ruins."

"Tes" Said Angeline Richee. "And by some miracle I and other girl friends each accessaged from the horrid place before the flood came, but we did witness how many of the population were buried in the ruins, and were necessarily "Some of the sayings may be or quite likely to seem vary exaggorated" said Starring somewhat doubtefully. But "But putting all joking uside I will have to bolieve it, because things have occured from the effects of both explosions and floods which you golonol could not exaggorate in saying you saw, for you saw nothing compared to the real thing and know it. The government as general Vivian told me has records of what many investigators observed and I'll tell you some, and maybe it'll be your turn to think of scoffing. In the district north of Bengal Gounty a party of investigators were surprised ti find a whole mountain topped by a town and forest had from the draudfal force and earthquake shock caused by the explosions elide into a valley. A little beyond they were more surprised to find that a road, bordered by a long line of trees, and a road side term had absolutely ridden the creat of a gigantic alide for two miles and a half without the slightest damage to the trees and the villiage, even the birds neets in the branches of the town had escaped The astonished people of the town looked out of the windows in the morning to find that a good part of the high hill had moved the town off its its former site with the road and line of trees stopping its lines of march within a few feet of a yawning abyse. In another villiage the only people found a alive, were a few women and children. They were only saved from death by the fact that their relatives displayed a most strange lack of filial pe piety, by sending them to live in a house on the outsi into of the villiage, which was buried deep by an avalanch. The death of the rost of the population was taken as evidence by survivors in the neighborhood that God had pulshed the rarelatives for its lack of respect.

In the city of mengal, where the shock was felt severely, wrecking of huild ings however were not so savare, but the most appalling sight was what is now known as the Valley of the Doud, where a hundred great slides crashed into a valley, six teem miles long, killing every living thing in the location, and carrying six tons towns across the valley on the creet of the unusual avaluach, which caught whether village in the crosscurrent of two other slides, whirled into a gigantic vertex, and catapulted the three towns to the slope of unother hill, demilishing every building to a total loss and killing all the inhabitants.

One of the districts that suffored the most was the abloland to the north of Bengal County known as the Paradize Country, which our lied the best fruits and farming crops of the whole state. The soil is an unveilding alls all alkali which cracked in the most uppalling manner, eince there was no hardened kind of ground to mitigate the force of the explosion shock and concussion. In one town with a normal population of nearly a thousand the investigators found not a single survivor. The loss of nearly three handred thousand lives and the total destruction of hundreds of cities and towns by the shock calls for reconstruction work on a most staggering scale. Seventy thousand plandelinium prisoners under strong guard have been forced to work in releasing the dammed streams, and to try I and gradually release the waters still covering Abbleunn, and thus prevent further disusterous overflows and other floods. Their work and that of volunteer citiess of surviving towns, and of superintendents, is said to scener or later near successful completion, which should be a romance of adventure in itself."

Fortunarely there is no problem of orphans as children in the devastated districts were so much in demand that they were promptly adopted by the survivors. Of this most remarkable s reseries of explosion shock disturbances which occurred throughout the whole of culverinia since the war began, the most strange and most phenomenal was undoubtedly the great Abbieum horror of that fatal morning, the date of which I forgot.

Owning to the anusual characer character of the conditions of the hillsides , funtactic effects were produced upon the surface of the earth wal which they said gives the observor the feeling that he is on some strunge planet still in the forming stage. In realty no earthquake occurred which played such haves, and never such haves occurred as that at Abbieunn and its region. The series of great explosion explosions around or near Abbieumn who or which according to winesses this time played havon such as never was witnessed for reality, or never recorded in truth historical facts with the face of the earth, and the habitations of men. Tikely ncearthquake no earthquake in any annals of science over could have changed the physical ger geographical conditions of any last as did in this story happen to the physical geography of the affected region of the Calverinian lands to the extent of the Abbisann cataclysm. The region never had been of any earthquake disturbance since it became inhabated, and therefore only two immense shocks like earthquakes were ever recorded that in a little degree may have equaled to some extenr the recent calumity in destructiveness. One of the disasters was at Luke Selicia, and Wickey Lansin But the Abbieum horror affected most severely un area northwest of Abbieann, and two hundred miles to the east, of the city. The area met effected by the disaster -- what one can call the area of supreme destruction, where no build ing of any and was left in a habitable condition is between the Mic-Hollester and Aronburgs Run Rivers, three hundred and se enty miles long, and two hundred miles inwide. The region comprises two distinct types of geological formation at least on the surface which adds adds great varity and interest to the unusual occurance. The southern half of the region stretching from the northern bank of the Mic-gollester gun tward Abbieann is with the exception of the mountain ranges and densely forested regions cutting it from east to west not far from its northern edge, a part of the groat farming and forest region, which stretches from Central Calverinia almost to Culverine City.

It is in the hill countries that the strange and immense slides occured, burying or carrying away villiages, covering level furmed f valleyed floors with a debris of rooks and trose, damming up stream beds, and turning wide valleys into lakes, and accomplishing those hardly believable freaks which no one could accout for.

The vibration was only slightly transmitted to the mountains. It will be a long time however before the remotences of the district in which these disasters occured can be of any unusul interest. Although the past disasters are to be all history the Abbleum disaster is still nows. What actually happened in this part of Calverinis ice only now through the reports of the relief investigation expeditions of which friends of dne are members being made known in any comprehensive way, even in a Calverinias capital and other cities.

As it happened also the concussions of the great explosions, selected for destruction in the agriculturally rich farming countries, and thickly settled regions of the whole affected area, and the most populous portion of the State, and to the south, many of the best Calverinian cities which were leveled. Although the immensity of the population is not more than one half of the region of the southern parts of Calver Galverinia, the loss of life from the landslides, collarged country homes, destruction of villiages and towns, together with the deaths from exposure to all kinds of weather, was according to some official figures about tree hundred and fiffty five thousand, and according to the astimate of the investigators more again than twice this number.

One of the Members of the cemini, took by horseback and auto the royal condway through the region of Pepro Evans to Rengal county, crossing the Michael Rengal county, crossing the Michael Rengal county, and proceeding directly to north St Andrew the great trade mart of the western half of the goung. "Where was the first spot of an damage discovered?"

The first damage discovered, was found to be what was left after the passage of the flood, not far from where abbleoun still (or what is left of her) lies under the waters, and among the tablemands of the forested Mic-Mollester Run where a temporary awang was formed, not far beyond the border between culverinia and Angeline vine state. In culverine city, and also runcis Atlanta some damage wad was said to be done to houses by the shock of the concussion, but there was no losses loss of life, except some caused by the ensuaing floods later."

"A disactor like that should make a good work for a "istorian" eaid the Guide. "In the vinicity of Calverine and grancis Atlanta, many towns collassed causing great loss of life and property among the pensants, and cattle herees and herds, stabled in barns were buried ative or swept away by the flood."

"That is true" caid Starring. "Passing the site of Abbieann, the investigators found themselves in the belt of complete destruction were many cities as well and big towns, country towns and villiages and the like,, suffered heavy loss of life,, and all buildings were leveled. At Poverty Row, and alverine Hills, where a long highest forkes, one railroad going north to calverine, and the Mic-Hollester Rum Forest Region along the same river, and the other southwest to pruncie Atal Atlanta, we obtained our first pictures of one of the ruined cities, shaken by the shocks of the explosion but not touched by the flood. The investigators taking the road that leads more sraight for Calverine soon ascended one of the bigger of the "famious "Calverine Hills. With the elevations here eviden as of the explosion shocks grew somewhat less, to become much more abundant g again when some of the foothills were reached.

Two of the hardest shock hit cities, wic-Hollester Grossrouds, and wimi Timi were passed by the investigators, and then they visited the districts where the sides of mountains cascaded into the valleys and elsewhere. Following the Mic-Hollester and central Calverine mallway, they ascended a small valley of deep grade directly some distance west of Mimi Timi. guddenly the road for more than ten miles dropped out i' of sight. It looked us if some giant machine had cut it down, or chopped it with millions of axos, leaving. Iong stratches of old trees of every kind with which the road is lined partly aprocted like sentinels stricken at their psts posts, upon the edge of the one hundred foot gully which occupied the posts position of the realifroad.

The roadside immones waters! supply of a near by city had no the investigators were told by survivors di-appeared down the same face. Making their way over the rent terraces to a large lake suddenly coming into view, a lake suid to have been formed by the valley being dammed up by a four sectional slide from the hills on each bank of the stream, the in vestigators secured what are perhaps the most unusual pictures of the scene and forwarded to the Abbieumnian g government. They also saw surviving natives carrying their water from this lake a mile to the north in the center of the valley. The long valleys in this section join one another like links in a chain.

The investigator rode to the summit of the divide which as he said seperated this from the next link, and he was amazed by the strange pureruma of a valley filled with clouds of many tremendous avalanches of landelides which had come out of the hills on either side. This valley had become the climax of climax of tremendous desolation. Not a single portion of the valley floor remained uncovered hat a single portion of the valley floor remained uncovered, and all valleys towns lay buried beneath the debrie, and not one person auxivised in the ruin.

It seemed the only survivors of unother valley were caved as if by a mirace miracle, a small population of a small villiage, which town instead of being baried was caught upon the back of one of the slides, carried two miles down the valley to where it was diverted by two streams of earth coming from other directions, and as the resultant of the two forces, was pushed mother nile or two up a small draw.

The people of this town like all others in this strange slids none were absolutely maxwares of the nature of the great disanter which had evertaken them untill the following morning. The survivors declared they heard a tremendous near noise or a series of loud themering crushes, and full the shocks which were accordary and immensurably severe, ending with a sickening swing to the cortiwest, and a most violent jerk back to the east by south, lasting two or three accords. They made all ordinary efforts the cave themselves even though the town seemed to move so strangely. Then not untill day dawned and they crawled out to fight the neighbiring villages towns and cities oblitanted, fare lands carried away or buried, streams blocked and hills of earth towaring aveabove their compounds, did they apprehend that semething ansatual had happened to the country.

It was in this valley of the dead that the most carious freaks of the concussion shocks occured. It would they say take four months maybe longer o to resustablish communications over these breakages, to robuild telegraph lines, and pack down trails on which horses would not sink to their belies and carts and wagons to their habs. The valley of desolation opened in its sustern end into a wider valley where the destruction was more severa.

At the junction of the valleys stands Heldons junction a town of twenty thousand people in which all were Alled in the collages of buildings, and other people in villiages were saved by the miraclous stoppage of two bodies of earth shaken loose from the mother hill and left hanging above the villiage lacking only another half seconds shock to send them tuj tumbling do down.

Another series of arlanches having flowed from the higher mountains on the opposite side of the valley across the valley floor and the stream bed is said to be piled up in a young mountain near enough to the villings to look like a lava floe. Their route through this larger valley led them past four lakes formed through the blocking of the stream by five ernormous slides, some of the sco, scooped out places left by these clides were six miles in width at the mouth, extending back into the hills for a mile and a half and furnishing enough dirt to cover a thousand farms. Some were as regular as if they had been made by a series of gigantic trowels while others were as ragged as if they had been ripped at of the hills by the teath of some collass!

In each case the earth which cascadeddownward bore the sure appearance of having shaken loose clod from clode and grain from grain, and then cascaded like water forming vortices, swirls, and all the convultions into which a great torrent might shape itself. If and grain and all kinds of crops were mingled, and mixed with the ourth for miles and miles, for miles and miles, showing how the dir h dirt had worked in its strungs descent on the opeosite side of this slide a thrashing floor call carrying all the stacks and orchards of all kinds had come down intact.

Hundreds of herds of cattle and other farm enimals had been so caught in thr so caught in the clide that either their limbs or heads protruded, and steeples of some town churches showed above the ground.

Two other slides causing the loweest of these blockades coming from the sides or of the valley buried a large town of 10,000 persons converted a shapely high ground butts into a ranged mound, and created ten miles of lake out of large rich valley farms.

The local aurthorities realizing the further danger od of destructive washcuts if these blockades were not opened before the late summer terrents, had before he the arival of outside relie made such pitably insufficient efforts as were at their commands twurd the release of the dummed up waters. And their efforts upon recommendation of the expedition were also incorporated in the work of the relief sucleities. Conditions in a score of other valleys in the Abbieunn neignneighborhood are similiar to those of the three valleys described. There is probably no other area, however where withihin a hundred miles one may count two hundred immense landslides. A hundred milrs further east, near number city a blad slide occured, and sixty miles north other bad slides occured one of which was said to be responsible for the greater number of towns being buried. In is in this incident which gives the Culverinians cause to rate the explosion shocks as a punishment for the Abbieannian Covernment, as they claim the government was too overconfident anddid not believe the glandeliniums could do unything. At some places for from hills north of Abbieumn could have been seen the hardest shaken section of all. Here the ground is of brittle clay level of gravel-alkali grass county country which was too at solid to slide but which cracked like a porcelain dish his hit with an immones weight rowns without any exception gave way, not one brick remaining upon another. Even city walls collasped, And nine tenth of all the people of this district were in morning mourning then the investigators unived. In one villiage of six hundred and sighty inhabatants all were entembed, but half were dug at all to cut dug out alive by rescuere. In another town all of the residents perished guch is still I tolicve the acenes of desolution which met the eyes of many inventigators who go through that region."

"It may be strange but nevertheless" said the Guide" no one ever dreamed that the localities of Abbieum would be torn and racked by a concussion stronger than cassed by Matures forces, and that during one of the greatest explosions of all record, floods would come that would form lakes covering scores of miles of country in one single day to stay perhaps forever unless drained, """"

"Yes but it supposed said starring. "At the first 1 blusts, people of other towns and villiages tried to floe to the hills, but the rocking earth made them real ad stugger so they could not encape from the path of the one onrushing flood. No s one ever knows how many were drowned in this terrible disaster. As I was told by many who were sitnesses of the disaster, of flood and explosion, that the shock was like a most violent earthquide but of course of made shorter duration, a but the very awful noise resembling load but distant thunder came some moments first following as it seemed by complete naturation of the atmosphere with strunge smoky sulphurous vapor c vapor, causing the durkness to continue nomewhat late in the early morning. The screams of the inhabatants of towns near by, who were either awakened by the shocks, or caught in falling buildings, the cries of all kinds of birds, and animals and beauts of every species, the falling troom, the tremendous boom and flam of the eruptions of explosions, and the rearing of the two big rivers the current of which was retrogade for a few seconds, formed a scene truly most horrifying horrifying for fifteen seconds the explosions ands shocks continued, at which time some were more violent than the others and with the same accompainments.

The shocks probably they say continued fifteen minutes, being many shocks and eruptions of explosions in that time following like a rolling thunder on the ground but all soomed to be equally as violent always accompanied by the same awful phenomena, and where floods did not touch the flush of explosions were suid to have started forest firen.

All this time the earth was in continual agitation but the main explosion and shock came at the last, and the concussion seamed to make the Mic-Hollester River and other streams recode from its bunks, burst levess and start floods, that the waters evidently gathered up like a mountain carring with it to the flood tide all kinds of river bouts and ships, or stranding man; others, hardly giving the crews passengers and sailors time to even save themselves.

nout wrecks were numbered by thousands. The concussions seemed to make the rivers rise high and expande as it were at the same time, overflowing banks, burst ing the dikes and levess, and then the floods rushing on tore with such violence that it took with it whole forests of trees of every size which were in its path. who trees were broken off with such regularity in all is instances that persons who had witness witnessed the fact could say that it looked the work of man. The f lood was literally covered with the wrock of boute ships, houses trees, and debris from whole towns swept away. Yet they say the main flood that swet Abbieunn and other big cities away did not come from the rivers.

The surface of the earth in the vinicity of the explosions was said to be covered covered to various depths by sand and earth that issued from fissures that were made in great numbers all o ver the country by the shocks and force of the terrific explosions, ome of these closed up immediately, but the country elsewhere was split terribly by the shocks. It is impossible to say what the depth of the flood was, but we have reason to believe that over the site of Abbieann it is still very deep. The highest part of the town was settled down at least thirty feet but not more than two miles below town there does not appear to be any kind of alteration on the bank bank of the main river. Back from the Mic-Hollester Run and other rivers! large pads, lakes and swamps which covered a large part of the country were nearly driddried up. The beds of some of them are elevated seventeen fest above the former anks banks, and lately it has been discovered that a strange lake had been formed on the opposite side of theMic-Hollester River, wowards of two hundred miles long, ad fromy and from ten to twenty miles wide, of a depth of fifty to six hundred feet. Therefore we do n know that an explosion of such force may have produced the shocks which caused ten times are dumage, than it was even said to have done.

The lake of water over the site of abbieann was not the only lake formed., for large areas in eastern Calverinia, and northwestern Angeline vine State were partly submerged for weeks, and a number of amull lakes remained also elsewhere. This consuccion earthquake caused by the explosion will be known as the "Abbieann Explosion earthquak2" and the shocks of the terrifice explosions caused strange to say a settling and rising of the lund over a large territory, and partly demolished the cities of Mic-Hollester, Lucillie Ricksen, Clorianna, and a hundred others.

Although most of the region a affected by the shocks of the explosions was a wilderness, which had lived many armies to hide from one another during secret expeditions and during those dreadful four weeks of horrors, the deviatated regions were visited by Henry pargar, the well Noted demini leader, and many of the christian generals with the expedition of river mining and other engineers. In middle Angeline Vine gtate lived the governor of Angelinia Agathia, and others, be besiden the Mayor of other cities who Fitnessed some of the disaster Ynich ended so tragically at Abbieum and many other big cities. All of these great men left great accounts of what had huppened.

James Cingerore, of Professional may and hild Lave liberator fame, living or working his own time near Abbio. n at the time caw groat blocks of sandstones loomened loosened from a high cliff, two thousand feet above the river crush down the mountain sides by aid of the moonlight.

An ernormous area throughout Calverinia was affected by the concussion and explosion shock. Far up in the northern wooded country of northwestern Calverinia the population reported that strange earth tremers occured, to the southwest. In other sections as well, the people were terrified by the same quakes, while to the southeast, on the Archburgs and Norma Rin Run Rivers, there was much fear manng the population of cities and towns there there, .. At Angelinia Agathia, five hundred miles awa, , at Dorothy Sale, six hundred miles away, at Pandors seven hundred miles away, and even at grancis Atlanta, and belonged vivian Wickey, at a distance of 2,200 miles slight tremons were felt ...

"I wonder what really occured in the Abbieumn region?" asked gade liffe. "Many doubt it was really explosions, but claim it to be real earthquakes."

"That is hard so they claim, but evidence seems against glandelinia." said Starring. "The real profound in story of the situation is, where did the big flood come from, what really happened to Abbieann, and other places never recovered or brought to light afterwards! There were no hard rocks in any of those regions, all the country was covered by re rich territories, rich ground, beautiful forests, and under the surface of rich loan and chays, there was layer of loose sand and clay down to a depth of over three thougand feet. From the shocks of the explosions so they gaw the great forest trees me moved with branches iterlocked like fields of grain before a terrific gale. Their trunks having no suppleness of youth, fell prostrate, or reclined at grotesque ungles to the earth.

"I don't sae how explosions could produce a y rhythmicmotion of the earth.." "Well | don't see either, but it is said they did, and they claim the rhythmic motion of the earth woo well shown by the long parallel lines of all kinds of trees growing on the low creets of the many rolls in the Abbieumn flood region . The City of winkle laid out by the Angelinians on the banks of the Mic-gollester River was near the center of the earth shocks, and it too fared very badly,, for here the bliffs settled, the river banks caved in and ast of the town was absorbed into the big river. M'n Many who went therefound the place a complete wreck, sunk about thirty feet below its level, and entirely deserted, its its inhabitants with those of the adjac t adjacent country who had fled there for refuge, were encamoed encumped in its neighborhood. They represented their cries as truely very distressing. The whole region could be called the Sodom of Calverinia for every city and town in the main disaster area had been destroyed. The inhabatants of most . of the explosion area however were more fortunate than of the flood region, in that they found eafty innthe in the hills and forests."

THEN sung Pontost Radeliffe ...:

Poor Calverinia, Has been among the furious foe .. Was tom with disusters, pemember this whosever believes, There will be for _landelinia mourning by and by."

So they all went on. As the woods grew thicker they continued on more cautiously, till they came to a sort of glen, where they saw a big bog of quicks and in their way, and seemed withal to extend far beyonf the way and direction which they should, go, and here they knew not which way to go, for the bog was too wide to be passable by turf or sacks or flank planks, therefore here they stood still to consider. consider. And as they were trying to plan of how to even get around the quicks and, Starring said " I believe a way can be found around this quagmire. Why should we stund here like geese ".

"Ridcliffe unswered:

"The bog goes to a great extent, is a mile or so wide, and how d we know of which way to take to go around?"

"Follow me" said Starring. "Lot's try it anyhow."

So they followed him along the edge of the sea of mud, but the further they continued the more wider it beams, and by which edge sometimes almost turned directly in their way, and even turned them entirely out of the way in which they desired to go, so that in a little little time they were far from their course, yet they followed him on. Then suddenly he stopped.

We are sure barricaded "he said. "We might us well be in a net which we can be so entangled that we could not know what to do, Might as well go back, I'm also sure I see myself in an error. Did not one of the mangers bid us beware of a certain

"Yes, and he also ave us a note of directions about the way, for our more surfinding thorsof, but that we have forgotten to to read. But we must try and et out of the path of this quag. We might find a place where we can cross the bog in spite

Just at this noment they espied another but lone forest ranger coming tward them onnhorouback. given he came up to them he halted his horse and asked;

"Miere are you from, and what are you doing here!"

"Starring answered;

"We are a scouting force going tward general Manleys lines to learn of some imports important information, but we find we cannot dross this treacherous quag."

"I understand who you are" said he. "It is a dangerous qued indeed miles deep so they saw. There is no way to cross it unless you bridge it for in either direction it extends for miles and unless you wish to go way out of your way you'll have to go around. Follow me and I'll show you how to get a across. Then I may set you in vour way again."

Eo he first led them back to the place which they had left to try and get around the peat bog. Then he usked them , suing;

"Miere did you rest last night?"

"With a Ranger lookout at his station upon the hills beyond."

"Did not that Ranger give you a note of dire c tion as to how to cross this

"But die did you" said he" when you were at a stand plack out and read your note to see what should be do!"

"No" said starring.

"Thy !"

"I forgot." "Forgot ?"

"Yen. "

"Did not the Ranger bid you beware of coming tward the bog in the first place.?"

"How?

"He did not mention mention anything of a bog. We did not even imagine, that this bog was even here."

Then the ranger led them through a portion of the wood which no one else had even thu thought of, and this done he bid them go on their way, and to take good heed of the other directions of the Ranger Outlook. So they thanked him for all he his kindness, and went softly along the right of way, all of them singing;

> "Come as along all you who seek ad venture: Bee how foolish ones fare who go against asto anture, They are catched in the most dangerous zones,, Cause good council they do not listen too, Tis true we rescue those,

Now after they had continued on a long time through a perfect wilderness, they percieved afur off one coming along on horseback and alone, and he was racing at high speed to meet them. Radeliffe suid to gtarring;;

Yonder is a man that does not look much like a Ranger to me, and he is coming to meet us. Be sure he is not a disguised for. I do not like his looks."

"I see him said " Said Starring, I don't like his looks either, therefore let us all take heed to ourselves now, lest he should prove to be a glandelinian spy in disguise. If we discover he is we'll seize him."

The mun drew, neurer and nreer neurer, and at last came up to them and halted. his horse. As he halted his horse he suluted and asked them;

"There are you going! and are you a scouting party, or men and children out for a stroll in these woods?"

"We do not tell any one whom we doo do not know, where we are going." ans. wered grarring. "But we are seeking adventure. That we can say."

Then the man fell into a very great laughter.

"That the heck is funny about that?" demanded gtarring. "That is the meaning of your laughter. Tell me or I'll command my men-----

"I " said the mun cunnot help laughing, for I laugh to see what ignorant, rush rush and foolish persons you are to take upon yourselves so dangerous and tedious a journey through woods, which you do not know, where hidden dangers 1 .rks, where where are sweeping in all directions, and yet you are not likely to have an thing but digaster for your travels."

"Why mun" said Starring, surprised"Do you think we shall fail on our adventure? That dangers are there to face!

"There are many more dangers to face than any one can tthink of. "..."

"Why man dod you think we shall all perish?"

"Porish-Hardly so. But you also might not succeed in your venture either for what ever be its per purpose."

"Not succeed? Do you think we shall fail?"

"Full. !There is no such thing as success in anything for one who goes through these woods. "

"But there is with the help of God."

"when , was once q spy and scout, I went through all parts of the country, I heard of a lots of disasters going on throughout this state and others,, and from that hearing went out to see, and for months not long ago I had been in the Abbieann flood and explosion disaster region, seeking a way through to Angelinia Agathia for all that time, but found no more of it than I did the first day I set out. The region in many places are still impassable, and sir, where there are no floods our way to the city is cut off by the big forest fires."

"You " said Frodrick Nunce," we all have heard, and believe there has been such a disaster occured though we have not yet eeen any of it."

"Well sir had I not shen at home, diabelieved of any such thi dissectors, I had not come out this far to seek my way through, but finding no way through, (and yet I should had there been a way through to be found, for I have traveled - much further than, ou, and fought my way through fires twenty times, ; am coming this way now, seeking some opening, and cwill seek to got through, if I have to defy hell to do so. I am on my way to general Vivians lines. The whole country is barricaded off from the world by these disasters.

"Then said Ned Perkins to Fred"is it true what this man eays?"

"Probably he is a friend, said Fred Take heed resember what it had cost us so often already for our not harkening to friends who we meet. He too is a forest lunger. That no danger in those woods. Did we not see from high tree tops and hills that the very country of Calverinia is all aflame. Also are we not going out to reach Munleys lines. Did we not see from a high hill a portion of munleys army. Let us go on 1 a lest some part of the forest fire overtake us again. You should have tought me the leason which will tell you "Couse to vie with such untimely perils, and keep our eyes and ours open. " "I see

"I see" said nance, "I only put the question to you, not that I doubted the truth of his statement myself, but to prove to thee, that there are many dangers to us all if not from fires, then from hidden enemicound he the like. Therefore let us hope to go o non."

Sturring himself had ordered the troop to go forward, bidding adeau to the lone man, and he waving a war, ing hand at them rede slowly awa. They now continued on untill the, came to a large open in the woods a large open country. The weather by the this time had grown somewhat warmer again, and the condition of the air naturally was enough to make any one drowey. Starring and some others had grown very dull and heavy of sleep, and the guide himself said-

"This warm air makes a person very drowsy, that I can scarcely hold my eyes open, let us all lie down here and take one good map before we proceed."

"Not by any means, said Sturring." If we sleep here and the fire again overtakes us, we'll never wake up again."

"But" said Radeliffe"Sleep is sweet to those who labor and are tired, and if we do take but one little nap we'll be so refreshed e we can go on our journey with better speed and pep... """"""

"Do you not remember some time ago, andnot so long eithers said starring, at me distant time when a little girl known h as Jannie had bro been brought to meral Concentinian Arronburgs lines, and how h when his sentries did not awwatch tch as they should, his whole camp and army was surprised and routed out of the Mio-Hollester woods by a sudden onset of the "Red Plague."! From that experience we curselves should learn that we should beware of sleeping, therefore let us not sleep as did those sentries, but let us watch and be careful."

"We acknowledge ourselves in a fault, and had I been here alone " said Radcliffe I would have probably been asleep, and chanced the danger of death. I see it is true that the wise men suid "Two are better thun one-litherto your company had been my

"Now then" said Walter Starring" to prevent drowsiness in this wa warm place, let us all fall into good discourse."

"With all our hearts." suid Radeliffe.....

"Where shall we begin?" asked Walter.

"Anyplace you desire. But you begin if you please. Tell us something of your experies experience of when the army under general Arrenburg was hit by the fire without

"How do you wish it to be told?"

"Well" said Angeline Richee herself, "I will ask you a question now came you to be in his camps that fatul night, near the Irientown Disaster?" "Do you mean, how came I at first to be i within his camp?"

"Yes that is my " meaning."

"I brought him a disputch."

"And how came you to think at first of so doing the scouting work for him as you

"Do you also mean how came I at first to look after the welfare of the christian

"that things were they?"

"I told you I could not tell. "But" usked Angeline ichee" hwhat was the cause of your carrying of it thus to the first workings of success in any of your undertakings. "?"

"Well" declared starring, " the chudes were---"I was at first somewhat ignorant of the true state of affairs produced by these disasters, as , only had then newspaper details only;-I never thought that by awakening for such news. For it seems that the enemy began the war first with disasters."2 I was therefore mad, for even though Abbigunnia is no birth place of mine, I once being a Foriegner, yet Abbigunnia is very sweet to me, and , was louthe to see all this happen in calverints and her sister states. 3.. I could not tell how to part with my old companions, when I had to go out on the adventures, their presence and actions were so good and desirable to me, but they couldn't come with me.4.. Yet the hours in which full convictions were upon me concerning my duties to find out the originators of these disasters cause me such troublesome and heart affrighting hours and days, that I could not bear, not so much as the remembrance of these upon my heart."

"Well, then it seems, to get rid of your troublesome fears and thoughts you'd go out on this adventure for wlolet, and her sisters !. ! ! ... '

"Yes verily, but nevertheless it would come into my mind again, and then , felt just as bad, may worse, than I was before."

"Why , demanded Radeliffer what was it that brought all these disaster horrors to mind ugain?"

"Muny things, us;

I If , dee did but be a victim of one of these disasters myself or see friends of mine perish. If , did but meet my father and o mother in the streets and see the floods come rushing upon or ; or;

2. If I have felt the effects of reading the news of the disasters, or read of them in magazines books and the like,; or

3...If from the effects of excitement my head did begin to ache; or

4,, If I were told that some of my dearest relatives were flood victims, how , would feel, whether they perish;;;or

5How , would feel if , heard the bells or the tups sound for the many dead flood victima: or

6... If , was a dying victim of me of the terrible explosions, or:

7...If I heard that hundreds of thousands met sudden death what would be the effect woon me or:

8-,-but a especially, when thought of my parent s and myself, that if alandelinia did all these horrid things, flood disasters, forest fire and explosion horror, world record breaking museucres of little children, what would Our plessed Lord say when he brought clandelinia to judgement and all the victime of the war horrors testified against the glandelinians.."

"and could you at anytime with ease start off on this adventure when you first begun, when by any of these awful news the horrors of the war came upon you?"

"No, not lutterly, for at first Violet and her sisters refused to sent me. They said they feared it was a most cangerous task of all. And then if I did but think of going back on my s solf, it would be double torment for me.

And what did you do then?"

""I thought I must endeavor to do what, can to get permission to go on the mission, for else if we do not find out the cause, thought ,, , am sure the Abbieumnium Cause will be of no avail."

"And did your endeavor to obtain the permission?"

"Yes, and at once betook me to the adventure, and many other things I also did too much here to relute."

"And did you think yourself well on the way then. !"

"Yes, for a while, but at last, found my old fushioned troubles coming tumbling upon me again, and that over the neck of all my other experiences. verywhere I went, forest fires interfered with m, purpose."

"How came that about, since you first started out!"

"There were several things brought it upon me, supecially when I milowed myself to be surprised by the advancive of the conflagrations. From whence afterwards I began to reason with mysolf thus,"If the glandelinians will by disasters reasce culverinia like a filthy rag, if by the deeds, no man of landelinia can be at all justified for recleving quarter by our own soldiers, and if when glandelinia has done all, she is yet unprofituble, then tis but fully to think of letting things go just because of a little dangers. I further thought thus, If Clandelinia contonues continues to run wild with her disasters, what will be the thought of the whole world which is shocked already by these catastrophics. By the works of wicked glandelinia no man of her armies are worthy of quarter. when Glandelinia has done all these things, she will even be unprofitable in the war-If she loses the war Abbieannis and the whole world can sue her, and cast all her best officials into prison untill she pays the damages and the fines."

"Well, and how did you apply this to yourself?"

"Thy said Starring, I thought those with myself, Glandelinia has by her sinful war ran all the way into Gods great Record Book, and that by more reforming will not in no means pay off that score, therefore she most think still under all her prs present wicked movements, that she can not be freed from that damanation, that she had brought upon horself in danger by all her formor war horrors and trangress ions untill she pays the last farthings. """

"A very good application, but pray go on."

"There was another thin, that had troubled me, even since my lateer d later discoveries, and that was if I looked into the bost of what the Abbieannian Government could and does do now. I still see disaster, new disaster threatening despite the best the Abbieunnians could and do accomplish........... So that I um now forced to conclude, that notwithstanding the former efforts on the part of the very Abbieunnium government, Clandelinia has been able to q accomplish enough horrid crimes in one month to send the whole blandelinian nation to hell, though her former life might have been faultless."

"And what did you do then general????""

"Dot1 could not do a thing, of or think of do Indoing anything, and therefore before before setting out on my mission I broke my roubles to Yiolet, and her sisters , for thmy and , am well acquainted, and they told me that unless, they I, or some one else, no mutter who it be could obtain the o information leading to the full and direct apprehension of the glandelinian generals or aurthorities responsible for the disasters, neither Abbisannia, nor all the concentration of the world itself, could save Abbicannia from a defeat, and the fulli devastion of the Southern ctates und so forth "

"And did you feel sure Violet, and her sisters spoke the truth?"

"Had they told me so when I first believed all the news to be exaggerations I might have called them a fools pack, but now since , heard so much about it from books, elegrams, and so forth, I have been forced to be of their own opinion."

"But did youthink, when at first they suggested thatbyou should try your luck at the expedition, that there was any hopes of obtaining such kind of information, or that such men who were responsible for the disasters would be found, of whom it might be justly suid; That they are fully responsible more than even the wicked, and cruel glandelinian government. "?

"I must confess" said Starring, that these words at first sounded strangely, but after a little more talk and company with them, I had full conviction of it. "And d d you ask them if they were goingto try it also, and how they might succeed?" "No. I did not hink of it at the time. Yet they always suspected hat the that the responsible ones must be the Munleys, and said "iolet-" You must be justified in your judgement first though even by spying on either one as best as possible. for rush judgement on no condition pays. "I asked them further "How does it seem possible that the enemy could be fully responsible, if no one can bring any evidence against him. ! And they told me "Munley is the mightiest of generals operating the Western Drama of the war, and did what he did in all things known of him already since he first became chief commander, to whom his doings, and the wicken w ckedness of them, should be placed only on him."

"And what did you do or say then?"

"I at first made my objections against my believings of the true ature of thr of the true nature of the disasters, for that I thought, no one was willing to do anything to save the ptions cause nations cause."

"And what did one or my o may of the Vivian Girls say to you then?" "They advised me to try it myself then. Then I said "It is presumption for any one to try such a dangerous game." but they said no nor they desired me to go on the adventure f ofor their sakes at least. Then wielet gave me a book that was written by some one who went through one of the flood disasters, to encourage me all the more to go, and she said concerning that, book, Thut every thing of its detail, and title thereof stood firmer of truth in the disaster them may one else who could have written my other books. Then I asked her"What must I do when I succeeded in reaching general Munleys lines, and they told me I must do all _ can to find out those guilty of the disasters. Then I asked her further, how I could obtain any means to do so, and she told me to go and , will find some way to accomplish it, but she said to accomplish it I must go and always entrate the upon my knees continually stif with all my heart and soul, Our pleased Lord to reveal the secrets to me for the good of the cause. Then asked her further "How must I make my petition to Him?" and she said, go as we advise but I said that I knew not what to say when I

when I tried to do sp., and she bid me b say to this effect, "God have metry upon our good and hely country, and help me to learn who the responsibile parties were, for y see that if it is not found out, and the disasters continue, the country itself might as well be a latterly be cast away. Lord I have heard that Thou art a Merciful God, ad has orderned that Thy gon Jesus Grist, should be the Savier of the world, and more over that Thou art willing to bestow upon any good ass a blessing, theref therefore dearest Josus y so my God take this opportunity, and magnify Thy Grace in the saving of our nely nation from such ruin, through Jesus Christ. Amen."

"And did you do as you were bidden, ????"

""yes, over and over again....."

"And you have not succeeded in any part of the mission yet?"

"Not us jot. I have not reached Manleys army yet."

"bhat do you intend to do now?"

"what?" said gtarring. "Thy I cannot say what I'm going to do. #"

"I hope you have not left off praying!".

"No. "

"And what is the rousen you did pt??????"

"I believe" said starring, that that was true which had been told me to wit, that without any one being successful in the important mission like mine, all the world could not save Abbicannia from defeat, ad therefore I thought I with my own efforts could succeed, I am do something that would be as record breaking news for the world, as the flood and other disasters have been. And if I was captured, and i die the death of a spy I can but die at the throne of God. And withal this came into my mind" If it takes time to succeed in anything, by to succeed just the same, because somer or later success will soon come, and then it will come tenfold, so I continued praying, untill Our Blessed Lord caused me to recieve some help and direction from general Concentinium Arronburg."

"and has any of the disasters, especially like that of abbie ann revealed to you."
"I did not see my of the disasters with my beauty eyes,, but y have read a good deal of them, and thus it was one night I had a drown and it was thus;;

"I was waking along the bas banks of the mighty porms liver, and was very end. I think much sadder than may time of my whole life, and this sudness was through a fix fresh sight of the greathness and horror and vileness of the recent big disaster that swept Abbieum off the map, and as I was then locking for orbining but the end of all for Calverinia and her dister states, and a probable defeat of our cause, and the overlasting impression of it on the whole world, suddenly as I thought I saw the apparitions of many of the slain children killed by the enemy in massacres looking down pon me from neavon, and one of them saying;

"Believe on the Lord Jesus christ, and have faith in thy undertaking, and Abbieannias Holy cause will be victorious. You will will, for we ourselves slain by the wicked ones will help you also. "Put I replied"Eut the undertaking I am asked to accomplish is very great and fficult and difficult, and can - succeed?" and that I observed from that saying saying "Ho that trusts in Our alessed Lord will never fail, that His aid is sufficient for thes, and that and that he hat comes to wim in seeking for aid, shall never be disuploifed disappointed, and gev he that Believes in yim shall nover fail. "Then the water came to my eyes, and , asked further" at children dear may my mission be a saving for the cause if I win?" And I heard them say, "And those that believe shall be accepted. "And from all which , gathered that I must look to him for help, and to be thankful for H9s His intercession. And now my heart was full of joy, mine eyes full of teurs and my affections running over with love to the name, people and ways of Our Blessed Lord. He is always on the side of the righteous causes to every one that believes , He died for the sins of all, and rose again for our redemption, He loves us all and wahses us from our sins in His own blood, and therefore these who have no faith in wim do not understand. "

"This might have been a revelation of the di dead children to your coming success, but tell me particularly what effect this had upon your spirit."

"Well" suid Sturring. It made me see that all of Glandelinia is in a state of condennation, it also made me see that Our Blessed Lord is really on our side. It made me greatly ashamed of my small faith, and confounded me with the sense od of my oun ignorance, for there had never came a thought to me of such hope for success. It made me love my life of adventures for His Sake, made me love a holy life and long to do something great and brave for the honor and glory of the name of our Blessed Lord Yea, I thought that had I now a million gallons of blood in my body, I could spill it for his sake and for my countrys sake."

As they continued on Radcliife looked back, and saw the girls whom whom they had accidentally looked left some distunce behind coming after and talking among

"Look " said he to turring. "How far we have left jut our girl friends behind."
"Yes, I see Let's stop untill they rejoin their company."

"gut I am surprised that they did not know that we were FAR ANEAD OF THEM, other wise they would have kept page with us hitherto."

"That's true" said Starring "But I believe they were so busy in their own converge voonversation that they did not notice us going far aheadd."

"That I think is possible, but however lot us tarry for them."." So they did."

"Then said Starring.""Come on girls. Why do you stay so behind?"
"We did not know you were going so fust." said Angeline Ric es, (both g rls locking surprised. "Where were you going. Were in you in a hurry."

"No" said Radeliffe But come now Lot's have a vise convergation low stands it in your opinion about the situation between Calverinia and her sister states now?" "Yes, 2 faid Jennic Turmer" "Also when others are in conversation we take it a dutiful pleasure in "riding t; carselvs ourselvess even more a great deal in company or than in company values we are permitted to remain, it is not right to be too close to listen in on other peoples conversation alless allowed to join in."

"But what is your opinion to my question????"

"I hope well, for I should be elways full of good opinions, that come into my mind to comfort me when , ride along during an adventure."

"that good opinions! Pray tell us. "

"Why think of what could be done to avert future disasters for the good of our country. "Said Jonnie Turmor.

"Yes, so do the Clandelinians and all their leaders think of doing all they can to continue the disasters despite all our efforts..."

"Ext $_1$ think if your mission is successful, we can succeed in preventing it." "So do many who are never likely to make success in any kind of undertaking, or who are likely to come to the fee lines, the best of the spires desire success and had not successful."

"But I think with the aid of God and the Intercession of His Blassed Mother we will see you successful."

What makes you think that?"

"My because , think of help from God and heaven."

"So do the Clandeliniane hope to frustrate as even with the help of the wicked devils and dammed souls...."

"But I think of the aid from Heaven and desire it."

So did many christian spies, but they never reached the enemy lines, the best of us so fur had desired, and had nothing for our paims paims."

"Put we all think of some hopes of success, and left all for the sake of our Countrys Call."

"That I do not doubt of course, but you know going through stirring and dangerous adventures is some somewhat a hard matter, you a much harder matter than many are even aware of But why or by what, are you persauded, that we who have left all for God and our countrys cause will succeed in the long run."

"My heart and faith in God tells me sc."

"Yes, " declared Starring" but the wise man said, "They that trust their own heart are fools."

"This is spoken of evil hearts, but I hope mine is a good one."

"But how can any me prove we'll be successful, when our mission is just started."
"My continued prayers for success comforts me, in the hopes of pe plenty of mid from heaven."

"That may be true, but how can any ones heart minister comfort to him in the hopes of that thing called success, for which they have yet no grounds for to hope when such an adventure is just in its infancy."

"But I and Violet, and her sisters, and the other girl scout leaders have agreed together, and therefore my hope is well grounded."

"Who else said that you and the Vivian Girl Princesses usreed together?" "They have told me so."

"Ask me if , be an unsuccessful spy-Violet, and her sisters told these so. Except the words of Violet, and her sisters beareth witness in this matter, other testimony is of no value."

"But is it not a good mind that can bring forth good thoughts and plans. And is not that a good hardy and brave life, the that is according to the commercation of the nution?"

"Yes that is a good and mind that brings forth good thoughts and plans, and that is a good brave life that is according to the commoration of others, but it is one thing indeed to try and have these, and unother thing to find you do not accomplish anything after all."

"Pray, what makes you think on the counting of good and reliable thoughts and plans, and a life according to the commercation of others somethimes sometimes does not bring success?"

"There may be good thoughts and plans of divers kinds, some respecting the making of plans, some of knowing the ins and outs of all parts of the country, and many other things and so on."

"What be good thoughts respecting the making of plans."

"guch as agree to the making of plans that will bring success in any kind of undertaking."

"when do our thoughts agree with the knowledge of the ins and outs of all parts of the country."?

"When we are so well educated that we can go through any part of the country no matter how strange it might be without geting getting lost. To explain it more fully, Violet, and also her sisters have said of personal opies in a nu natural condition. "there is none in the christian lines yet personally professional, not even the members of the cemini, there is none that do the work so perfectly as you and your girl companions have done it. They said also that every imagination you have worked to success when planned, that your intentions were also a success and evil in consequence to the enemy, and that continually, the reason why even your shadow or a trace of your horse is a terror to the glandelinians, which you know. And again "Your deprodutions upon the enomy never was a failure. Now then, when I think of this having sense thereof, then our thoughts are good and successful ones, because we can do it with a hearty good will. If you and your two friends did not come with us I do not think we would have gone as fur as we have."

"I will never believe that I am so much of a girl scout as all that." "Therefore you never know yournelf no others therefore know you K Jennie-But let mme go on. As a person makes a plan, and passes a judgement upon the outcome of the plan, so he also passes a judgement upon the result of the plan and what it will accomplish, and when our thought scof our successes, and the nature of our adventures agree with the judgement, which the works of the plans give to both, then are both good, because agreeing thereto "

"Make out your meaning." said Angeline Bishes herself.
"Whit everythins we try to accomplish, is usually from the fact that also mans was ways are the best ways, not too good, not too bad but perverse. They naturally are out on a good othering adventure, and yet they have not known it. New when a spy thinks he can be successful and yet is not professional, I say when he does sensibly and with heart hemiliation thus think, then maybe later he may have good thoughts according to his plans, because after his experience his thoughts no now agree, with the passing judgement of the plans."

That are the good thoughts concerning the passig passing judgement of the

"Even as , have said concerning ourselves, when our thoughts of our adventures do agree with what the words are said of it, and that is, when we think of its success through the help of God of when _ cannot now discourse at large. But to s en speak of Him with reference to His help for us, then too we have the right thoughts for the success of our adventures, especially when we believe He knows our necessities better than we do ourselves, and can see danger staring as in the face when and where we can see none carselves, when we know He knows our innermost thoughts, and that our hearts with all their dopths are always operanto His eyes, also when we think that all our efforts are only through His help, and that for the good of country and for our souls and walfare as well He cannot abide to see as at stand before Him and His people in any confidence, even of all our best performances if through failing we had failed through lack of faith in Him and his Aid, """

"Do you think that any one would be such a fool as to try a adventurous miss ion as to even then think God would fail him, when he would even then not come to Come to aid him in the best of his renformances!"

"Why what makes you think in this mission such a means would be a failure!" "Thy to be short, we must always believe in His aid whether he gives us help or not."

"Well you may be right on that, for it is foolish to try anothing without His help when you see your need of Him. Those who never see my original or actual infirmities of impending danger in adventures, and yet has such an opinion of him self and what he has to do, and yet has no faith in god, plainly renders it to be for himself a person that never did see a necoemity of Christs personal aid, whon a remons adventure is jut justified. If a person is like that how can he say he balleves in brist?"

"They do not believe well enough for all that?"

"How do you believe?"

"I believe that Christ died for all of us, and that all those who do gis will in the face of all difficulties and troubles, shall be rewarded, through his gracious acceptance of their obedience to Hig Law, but just the same they must have faith in Him otherwise how can be be fully justified. To deserve help they must have fuith. Those that believe with only a fantastical faith, might as well believe in a false faith, because it can take all jutelfication from the personal righteousness of that person, and applies t it to the one who believes not. Therefore we who have the right faith, puts us upon flying for refuge unto christ for ald in our dire needs, by which we can hope for better hope of success."

"no you think Abbisunnia will be such a fool as to let all these disasters go without punishing glandel in in 70r that the world itself would allow our Cause to be defeated by such a foul fee after she has created such wicked performances." asked Radeliffo, of Jennie.

"Why how doe you think in this matter?"

"Why to be short I believe Abbieunnia such demand satisfaction."

"How do you think Abbicannia should demand satisfaction, when she has not been able to see only one third of the disaster because of all communications being cut off. Nade liff you neither see the original or actual situations of the affair, but has an opinion of it yourself, and what the enemy has done, without being a p witness to it, which plainly renders you to be one that never did see one of the disasters, or a necessity of the nation to demand a redress dor for it, tobjustify the whole affair before our pleased Lord. When all is cut off, by floods fire, and so forth, how then do you say" Abbleannia can be avenged."

"I believe well enough for all that , that Abbieannia can find a way. "Said gtarring.

"How do you believe that?" asked padeliffs himself while the girls looked at him in surprise.

"Ibelieve that Abbieannia can find a way, by pontoons, by forcing the foe el prisoners to rebuild all the railroads injured by the disasters, and that for all she does and may do Abbieunnia because of the holiness of her cause may be fully justified before god, from the " sin of revenge", through the causes of what Glandelinia has done in conta contrary to the obedience of the Law for givilized warfare, and so shall she be justified."

"Lot me give an answer to that" said Angeline Richee. "Thea Starring believes with a fantuatical faith, that Abbieunnia can sond in vast armies despite all communications being cut off, but this faith is beyond hope so far as the situation goes, and if it is accomplished it is a tremendous miracle.

You believe even almost to presumption, because it takes a unusal miracle to justify such a prediction, because it takes a lot of work, lots of material and so forth to either move across the floods by pontoons and boats or by going through other devastated places, and this applies even to only a small summount, and can all prisoners be forced to work and not count themselves as being made 1 sluves too.

That prediction of yours, makes not so much as a hope for such a thing to occur untill everything is restored almost whole, and therefore such a prediction cannot be justified. ..othing short of a miracle can even stop glandelinia from making these disasters. Therefore all these hopes is only decaitful to you and would ulso be to us, even such as will leave the whole of Abbiemnia to face of such a problem but nevertheloss clandelinia too shall and will face wrath and fury in the day of god Almighty, for true justifying P punishment of a wicked person in dire danger, and all those who will fly for refuge to christ for safty, I say it can be so, and by it such a believe be prosented as dangerous for your and our safty, and acquit from condemnation."

"What" said Angeline ichee," would you have us trust to the fact that Abbiemnia cunnot do anything in the face of difficulties! This conclet would place all of us in the gravest danger, and tolerate all of us to live as playes of glandelinia, for what matter how great the disasters may have defeed the country and rained all our railroads, if we and our government can see a may way to acc accomplish things through all those difficulties, when we believe it can be so!"

"Yes" said sennies for dangerous is the situation throughout the whole of the State of Calverinia, and us her name is, so art the whole world fearing, even all the past disasters, those still going on , and the fury of the war itself demonstrate what say. Territle is the citaation everywhere, and as dangerous is the situation of the war itself, through the ensuing results of it, from the heavy disasters thus coming and goin going. Yea many of as are injunignorunt of the true effects of all those calculities, which has devestated nearly the whole of Calverinia till this day Ignorant most of us are of what the disasters really did to their fullest octimate, and as their results are, so art their consequence to the final ignorant we are also of what justifying rightequeness is for Abbieannia to sook redress, and as ignorant are we, how to secure means to see that time come, to see alandelinia face the heavy wrath of God."

"Ask her, if she has ever seen any of the disasters?" asked one of the

"That are you seeking such an adventure too. I do believe that what you und all the rest of you may say about my boing a witness of that disaster is but the fruit of distracted brains. Thy man, I can furnish proofs of that any time you wish and nothing is so hid from as concerning such disasters, that they cannitbe cannot be known, and therefore everything I may must be true."

"Yes" said Angeline pichee. "That is the very fact, even if it is not mine own statement but yours, jet I loubt not, for it is as good a fact as anothing for I too was there with you?"

"Give me leave to put in a word" said Sturring to the soldier "You ought not so lightly or so slightly speak of this matter, for this will bodily affirm" even as the two girl scouts have done, than no one can give any discription of such a disaster as they have done but that they were there to be partikers of, yea, and fortunate eurylyone too, by which Heaven helped to be, therefore their statement must be wrought by the exceeding greatness of the disaster, of the floods mighty power, the workings of which disasters, I percieve my poor man you are ignorant of How many have flod to the bord Jeu Jesus during such a calamity and hoped by His righteousness, which is the righteousness of God, for He himself is God, hoped to be delivered from such a horror."

They went on now for some distance, and then said tarring to the colonel "It pitles me mch for the results of this awful war so far, especially in poor culverinia. If I do not succeed in my mission, it will certainly will go ill with our cause at last."

"Well-said Nunce"There are abundance in our Christian armies, ho who would strive to do the same thing knowing that the whole of Culverinia has been placed in this condition by the enemy, whole armies of themD(and that of the Gemini too) and if there be so many in our arms s armies, how many think you must there be in the glandelinian armies would would also try to learn if any one was out looking for the inc information you are searching for!"

"Indeed as violet, and her eisters saidd; The Gemini have tried and not yet made any, success . Nog that our conversation with the girls is done for a time, what do you think of the situation. And what do you think of the Gemini leaders. Have they at any time think you convictors of dreadful consequences because of these disasters, and so consequently feare that the situation is dangerous in galverine?"

"May it is better for you to answer that question yourself sir, for you are some --what older than , am.

"Then I can say sometimes as I believe, they may, but being naturally wise may also underOthest and that such convictions may tend to their good, and therefore they would and do make desperate efforts to succeed in thi their own missions, and do so at any risk."

"I do believe as you say" said mance that fears of something impending tends much to our good, and to make us all do the right thing for our cause, even at their beginning, to continue on unadventure or an undertaking untill it is a good auccons.

"Without all doubt that is pracible" said Starring, if it be the right kind of kind of a mission. The fear of anything they say is the based inning of wisdom." "How will you describe the right kind of fearf????!"asked Ned Perkins himself.

"True or right four of impending dangers to the countrys cause is discovered by four things.

"I .. By the disasters already c occured.

"By the rise of the four itself of more. It is also caused by the saving conviction for future disasters and i their consequences.

2. By the strength of the foe, and his ability to do anything worse than even the disasters of the past. This four drives even the best of christian spies to las lay fast hold of Pitetional prayers, and begging of christ for the salvation of the st stricken nation ad her and her states.

3. The nature and power and phrewdness of the Glandelinian generals, and all the Retainers, Staff and body guards under them. Their knowledge of country and

4.... The fear begettoth and continues in the soul a great fear of what may come in the near future, ad making them afraid to not be watchful enough, or cause the enemy to gain the upper hand." "That was well suid" declared Radeliffe himself. "We all believe general you have said the truth. Are we now far from being in the path of the firen now. "? "No, I do not think so" said starring, but I would know if it came near. Put let us return to our matter flow many spies know that such unusual convictions that tend to but them in four of disasters if they are not successful in their mission are for their good, for therefore they seek to do what they are sent out for ad do 1 not let all hell stop them."

"How do they sock under such difficulties!"

"They think that those fears are wrought by God for the good of the nation and their own, and thinking so they give in to their feurs, for feur that to not to succeed would meanfor their cause a complete and awful overthrow. They also think that those feurs tend to the spoiling of everything else, and therefore they hardentheir hearts to fear of anything else but failure. They presume they ought not to four any danger whatever, or any difficulty, ad and t and therefore in spite of them, become confident of success with God's help. They see also that these fours tend to take away from them their fours of danger, and therefore they strive with all their might to accomplish their mission....."

"Well I know something of this myself" suid Fredrick Hunce, " for before , knew mygelf it was so with me.

"Let's full upon another profitable question?" said Angeline Riches.

"With all my heart" said Fredrick Hance," but you shall begin" "Bell" then " said she, " did you not know about a few years ago, one by the name of Gringigore in the christian camps, shaho is a powerful member of the Gemini anda great spy?"

"Know him? yes he always works with pargar, or schloeder."

"You are right" said starring. "He works always with pargur, or schloeder. Well that mun was awakened to a sense of great peril once. I believe then he had some sight of the peril his country was in, and of the consequences that was due thereto, that is the reason he never stops e an even to this day in his efforts a find out what the enemy is u to."

"I am of your opinion to, said Radcllife," for I spied on the enemy about two miles from him, and he would often times come to me, and that with many tears to see so many child slaves in the Clandelinian camp and no one to help them. Tri truly pitied them, and was never without hope for them, but I one day suggested suggested that he could easily free them on or during his ex ed expeditions if he would pose us a place traider or owner and so on during the time and se them and use them as his confederates, and when the time came to leave he coll could oasily take them with him."

"Und he told me once" said Sturring, that he was resolved t resolved to go on in his mission, but not the time or kind we do, then all of a sudden he hit upon a sort of plun, and then as even all say and even Glandelinians testify he became to the enemy extremely dungerous gome say he is more dreaded than even

"He told me once" said angeline michee, that he was resolved to find out the most important arrosses of the enemy under any conditions, and even as you are so determinedto do also, but one day he went into general manleys lines as I have heard heard, with plenty of money, (where he got it no one knowe () but it was glundelinia money, and with it he bought from one of the generals a whole column of child slaves which he apparently worked to their fullest, while in secret they secured for him plenty of good own which he desired to know, and then one day semetime after a little child clave known as Jannie was sold to him, he Houppeared from the glandelinia cump fr with the whole lot."

"Now since we are talking about him" said gtarring, let us inquire a little into the reason of the swiden sisappearance from the camp of gingigere and the little child slaven."

"It may be very profitable, but do you begin " said Fredrick hance.

"Woll, then continued turning, there " there are in my judgement for reasons of

First... Then he had the children with him quite a time, and he had been quite successful in his expedition, the conscience of his purpose was thus awakened, and having all he wished to know, he desired to leave, but for what they had done for him he desired to ske take them with him also, wherefore he left the camp with thm them all. This I day being but for his countrys cause by virtur virtus. only not because of lave alone but of the sense and fears of the results if the ruin by the enomy continue, his four for the perils he may face chills and cools, so that his desire to give up his expeditions cools also. So then it comes to pass, then shon when their fear is gone, they renume their course again.

Second Another reason is, they have or he had clavish fears over what the onemy had done because of the disactors, that overmastered him. I speak now of the fears that he had of the results of the many disasters caused by the esmy which he had heard of So then though he was hot for his countrys cause, he was still hot more hotter, when the flumes of an earthly hell is all about them, then when he heard of more greater clumm; calamities occuring he betook himseld to second th. ughts, namely that it is good to be wise, and not to shirk the duties or run the huzard of looing all for the cake of a little four, or at least of bringing himself into unavoidable and unecessaries of troubles on a charge of cowardice , and so he fell in to all his worth, and for the glandelinians became the greater greatest danger there is.

Third.... The shume that attends cowardice lies also as a block in their way-lie became more during, and crafty, and all the enemy door is low and contemptable, therefore when they have committed the hellish doeds of disasters, he went forth to larn who were responsible and why, and how they did it.

Fourth The horrors of the disasters was enough to meditate terror to him, to be very gravious, he must have seen much of the minery caused by some of the disasters, and might have been one of those who even experienced one of the great disasters. Though perhaps the eight of cone disaster at first might have appalled him, the others might have increased his appreh naion, and learning of how many have retreated from forest fires, how many are homeless because of all the disusters, he even then shumned the thoughts of fear of a foe in this matter, therefore when ever he had an opportunity he went to work with a will, and choosed such ways as would give him better success."

"You are pretty near the business" said Starring, for the bottom of al is law all is, that he became a great spy. And therefore to the enemy he is like the felon that stands defiant before the judge, but he does not quake and tremble, he does not repent at all of what he has done, for the bottom of all is, t the four of what may come to Abbieunnia if these disasters in Calverinia continue, not any detestation of his designs missions, as is evident, because let this man loose on his work, and to the Olundelinians he will be a dire dunger, and so a dangerous soy still, whoreas if he was a timid man his mind would be changed otherwise. "Now" said Hance, "I have shown to you the reason of his going frequently to apy on the enemy, do you show me the munner thereof.....

"I will do so most willingly" said Starring.

I. When he seard heard of the disasters, he drew of all his very thoughts, all that he might from the remembrance of such things as a good clandel inia, soldier, and he'd rather face death and judgement thun fail in his purpose. 2... Then he custs off by degrees, all other purposes, us mere scouting,, writing plans,, sutching enemy movements, and the like, but eases the fee camp for such

3....Then he pretends to mingle in with the company of glandelinianiumofficers to secure better information, and gets it or knows the reason why.

4... After that he grows cold to poril, and does anything. 5, then he begins to pick holes as we say in the coats of some of the highest foe generals, and that cloverly, that he might have a seeming color to threw their cause behind their bucks. Expectally for the sake of some infirmity he might have

6... Then to obtain the more desire! information, and that is of the responsible ones who caused the disasters, he pretends to adhers to, and to associate himself with these cural, loose and wanton Clandelinian officers.

7.... Then he protends to give way to carnal and wanton discourses in openeos, and fortunate indeed would be the glundelinium generals if they could see his real purpose, but the, don't, and he more boldly does his work. 8... After this, he begins to play with the Elandelinian officers more openly. 2... Then being fortified, he trupps thom and shoes them who he is Thus being launched into the galf of his own passion, they to save their lives alow themselves to be his priceners and tell some things, and aloss they are not rush they do revoil all, or period at his own hands in their own efforts to decieve so dangerous

By this time Sturring and all his followers had entered what appeared to be a very large clearing in the forest, a clearing miles wide, and many miles long, where for a change the air was very sweet and pleasant,, a large pathway lying directly through it, and here they desired to remain for a while and rest themselves, for rest they needed budly. And being some distance off new from the forest fires, they even heard here continually the signing singing of birds, and sus beautiful flowers growing, and heard other sounds that showed that at least there was life in this part of the forest. But here the sun though it did shine yet did not shine very bright, for the thick emoke have was heavy still in the sky, but it seemed they were far beyond the " forested Valley of the Shadow of Deuth,, and also out of reach of any wing of the fire, neither colld could they from this place so much as soo the nearest wan of the frightful Red Plug-se-Here they hoped to be within sight of any part of general Manleys camps, of which they were housing for, but as they continued on they were again joined by some of the forest rungers, for because of the situation all forest rangers were continually on patrol, because any part of the forest was menanced. Here plenty of crops wild crops but edible were growing, even corn for in this clearing they met with abundance of what they had sought for in all their travels. Here they heard voices of all kinds of singing birds, and as they rested for a space in this clearing, they felt they had more rejoicing then anywhere also they had been, to which they hoped to be bound, and drawing nearer to the best part of the clearing they had a sudden view of a camp of some kind at some distance away.

It was formed of the christian style, and they wondered what it could have been-.They lay down for quite a while, and then being strengthened and rested, they decided to continue on their way, and came yet nearer and nearer, where there orchards, vinoyards, and gardens, and a for houses, and the appearance of a large long highway Now as they came up to these unusual places, beheld some men appeared and asked the party to hult, and domanded whom they were;

"Starring answered;

"We are from general Concentinian Arrenburge lines. We are making a long dt detour to have an easy change to spy onManleys army. Whose vineyards and gardens are

One of the men then answered They are ours, and are planted here for our delight and also for the so ace of solace of travelers."

The men then allowed them to enter into the vineyards, and bid them to refresh themselves with the dainties. He also showed them a new and better route through the forest, and here they tarried and slept. Now through the exciting times they continually had some of them began talking more vin more in their their eleesep sleep at this time than ever they did in all their journey. When the next morning approached and they awoke, they addressed themselves to go up to the distant camp.go as they went on, they were met by two sentries in uniform of the dark Calverinian gray (plandelinian Glandelinian). After recieving the answer to thr the challenge these sentries, asked Starring, whence he and all his followers came, and he told them, showed his pass. Then the sentries asked them where they had lodged the night before, what difficulties and dangers, and what comforts and pleasures they had met in the way, and they told them, and also of their mission.

Then the sentry said;;; "You may have two difficulties to meet with before you can enter the camp." Then Starring, asked the sontries to go along with them, but they told them they cannot leave their post. So they continued on being petmitted to puss, untill they came within eight of the camp. But between them and the camp was a river, there were no pontoons over it, and the river was very wide and very deep. At the sight of this river therefore, the adventurers were much stounded, and they begun to inquire, if the stream was bigger, and longer thun it seemed, whether it would guard the cump as hoped for in case a fire cumo up. They were told by the guards that it probably wound. Starring, however begun to doubt in his mind , and looked this way and then, but no way could be found, by which the river seemed narrow. They then ash asked the men if the waters were all of a depth. The sentry said;" Mo yet it would help in that case, for it might be shallow or dosper asaccording to its size and through where it runs.

Then they arged their horses into the water. A, and entering they all started across but as they passed on to the middle of the stream, Starring said to sed parkins who was riding alongside;

"Some timen I am groatly discouraged over the effects of both the Abbiemn and Angelinia Authia disasters, because the communication throughout all of our stutes are still cut cut off and no one can get into any intercourse with either ans imi angeliniu aguthiu, or Dorothy Gule. I believe the billows of the big flood just pust has gone over the city entirely. I wonder if that city with the Emperor and avery one has been wipud out."

For a few minutes there was silence as they continued on through the water and then Fredrick , once said;

"Be of good cheer my brother, I believe all will be good bye and by. That city can't cannot be wiped out."

"Yes, but it seems to me that the sorrows of Calverinia, have compassed the world itself in every direction, that a land that flowed with " milk and honey" is a thing of the past, that a great darkness and horror has fallen upon all our war torn states, that it is possible the population has almost lost its senses. But all seems lost and , acmetimes cannot help but doubt. All the words that ; have heard tends to discover that the population itself has horror of and, and hearty fears that all should perion in that state by the hand of such an enemy, that the national armies may nover win the war and drive the fee out, and that makes me full of the troublesome thoughts of all the disasters of the past even from the wars infancy,

, both since and before the Buttle of Evangel inia grania."
"Yes, such things sooms posible said Bance, "for Calverinia is like a drowning victim and por Abbieannia has much ado to i keep her sisters head above water yea, sometimes it seemed ohe had been gone quite down, and then ere ambile she would rice up again half dead. But he comforted General, for now, see the camp much closer, and a column of officers mounted on horses waiting to recieve vs un;"

but starring answered;

Tis poor Calverinia, worry about, but you have been hopeful since I knew you You must help me win my adventure.

"And so you shall have my help" said Fredrick Nanco.

"Ah Comd Commade" said starring, "If I was sure of success, Calverinia would be saved from future horror, and I must asked our Blessed Lord to help me, for bacause of being unprepared Glandelinia has brought poor Calverinia into the awf al snare, and has left hor desolute. "

"Then its all the better for the future" said Nance"Hy comrade you have forgotten the text where it is said of the wicked nations"They have all their own way in wars at the very start, but in the end their downfall is tenfold. At the beginning they are not troubled like the good nation, neither are they plagued with disusters like the Christian Countries they war with. These troubles, horrors, and distresses that Calverinia has gone through, are no sign that God has fora forsaken such a fuithful stae state but are sent to try the people, whether you will call to mind that which heretofore she has recieved of His goodness, and live pon Him in her distressess."

Starring was now in a muse for a while, to whom also Fredrick Nanco added these words;;;;;;

"Be of good cheer, as Jesus Christ maketh thee whole, so will we turn the tide of the war in favor ou of our side later."

They all presently found go grounf for their horses to stand upon, and so it followed that but the rest of the river was not very doep. Thus they finally got over, over. Now upon the bunk of the river, on the odder side, they suw a line of men in Calverinium uniforms who stood there waiting for them, and when they finally mounted to the shore the Captium of the men caluted them, saying,

"We have been sent forth to recieve you into the camp."

Then they went along tward the camp Now the camp stood upon a long high hill but the hill was of such gentle r grade that the horses went up that hill with ouse. The horses wit went up which with much agility and speed, talking again as they went, the venting, being more comforted, because they saftly got over the big river, and had such glorious companions to attend them......

STARRING HESSIEARS MORE ABOUT THE EXPLOSIONS MAT APPIEANN, AND ALSO THE MACHETIC DISTURBANCE CAUSED BY THE FORCE OF THE EXPLOSION. HE HEARS ALSO OF A GEMINIAN EXPEDITION TO THE ECEME OF THE EXPLOSIONS.

The Conversation they had with the soldiers in this camp-the-lamp was continually about the nature of the forested country, the progress of the past forest fire the war, n and disactors to cometh, and they answered that the horrors of the past disasters and the raging forest fires, and even the fary of the war itself was inexpressible. "There at Abbieann, from where we camped thirthy miles northwest of is the heart of the war disusters, the new so culled hellish region, the place on unknown but innumerable deaths, and the spirts of nations appalled, but which center of disasters the enomy will pay for dearly some time to come. You are going now, on your way as weclearned, to the Glundelinian camp under either one of the Manleys, wherein you shall try to obtain all information possible about the cause... and responsibility of the disasters, and of how they did it, and when you come there we know you shall have to disguise as Glundelinian chieftians, and your wak walk and talk shall have to be like the glandelinians, even all the days you shall be in the glandelinian camps. There you may not see again for a long while u such thing as you saw when in the christian lines, or when you were passing through here,,, to wit, good times, friendly persons, and so forth. You are going now to general Johnston Jacken imleye lines, or to his some or brothers, men that the world itself believes knows something about the disasters, if not responsible themselves, and who are now trying to Foop everything secret about it.

Starring asked his guide;

"put what do you suppose we could do to succeed in our mission? It is very difficcult you know."

"Why you might have to prevent to be pretend to be with them in all they are, you must recieve and obey all their orders as far as possible without going too far against the laws of your own country, and have patience for your difficulties you might meet with, you must reap what you have sown, then even the fruit of all your prayers, and tours and suffere satferings will be of some good. In Manleys camps you will have to wear uniforms and huts of Glandelinian generals, and restend to enjoy your serving them, for only in that measure will you see any opportunity to secure what you ever are after. There also to hide your identification ou man may have to servie the Higher Glandelinian generals continually, otherwise your mission will meet with much more difficulty, because of the peril of the undertaking. There you may be surprised with seeing the natures of a vast glandelinian army, and if you happento hear much wicked words you will have to stand it to hide your pit purpose, and only whonyou succeed may you have a chance to get back to the christian line lines and enjoy the company of your friends againsn again, and then you shall with y joy recieve avery one that followed on missions before of after you did I know when you succeed in this mission you may recieve a higher co mission than many, you shall be clothed with a glorious uniform, and go along with his Majesty imperor Vivian. When he shall come to meet you with sound of trumpet and buzles you shall be brought b forward to meet him, and when he recieves you he shall bestow upon you a fine commission of your own choice, ad when and when he shall pass sentence upon all Glandelinian disaster makers, you also shall have a voice in that judgement of the generals of His staff, because they devastated our states without reason to win their wicked war. Also when he s hall again rereturn to his own headquarters or palace, you shall go too with the Vivian Girl Princesees, and the whole royal court, with sound of bugles, salutes of musketry, and and cannons, and he ever his best friend and leader. """""

Now while, they were thus drawing tward the larger part of the a camp. behold, a large company of Concentinian Cavarly, rode forward to meet them, and the leader

thus adressed Starring; "Are these your followers, who have left the sufty of came and home and friends all for the sake of _ountry, and to learn important details of flood disasers disusters.

"Yes." unswered gtarring. "We have come thus far on our desired journey, and that we may have the chance of entering general Manleys lines and force some of the foe officers to confess the information I wish to know.

"Then said the officer of the cavarly.

"God bloss you and aid you in your mission."

Then there came forward to meet them along i with the cuvarly, a number of drummer boys, a band, all clothed in white, who with melodious noices, and loud, made even heavens " to echoe with their music, playing " All Abbleannia For ever March." Then the band master saluted starring and his followers, with ten thousand walcomes, and this they did with much shouting, rooling of drums, and volleys of musk-t and cannon salutes.....

This done the soldiers compassed them round on every side, some went before, some went behind and some on the right side, some on the left, continually sounding us they went (the band going before) with great mucls music of bands, and songe and melodious noises, in notes on high, so that the very sight was, to them that could behold it, as if a great vi victory had been colebrated and the war was ever... Thus therefore they rode unaumarched on together, and as they murched, ever and anon those bands, even with joyful sound, would by mixing their music with boks and looks and gentures, still signify to gtarring and his followers how welcome they were into their camps, and with what gladness they came forth to meet them. And now was this company of brave adventurors, as tween in a victorious colebrating camp, being swallowed p with the sight of Calverinian and other soldiers, and with hearing of the grand Abbicanian marches and songs.

Hore also they had a good view of the camp, and they thought they heard all the cannons and firearms of the soluters firing salutes to welcome them thereto, but above all the worm and joyful thoughts that they had about their own recention here. with we such company, and that for the hopes of a more successful portion of their mission therefore. Oh by what tongue or pen can their glorious joy by expressed. And thus they came as to the center of the came.

so when they had come p to that appeared to be the generals headquarters, tarr Starring at the blading of one of the officers discounted, and show their page to the e s ., sentry at the tent entrance, and being questioned starrings guide said;

"phase men and children are come from the christian camps, and have been on the way to say on manley and his generals for the sake to bring to un and the disasters that occured in the past. "And then Starring gave to the goard a certificate, which he had received in the beginning, and it was taken in to the chief officer within the tent, who when he had read, returned it to the guard and said;

"Mere are the famious christian spice?"

"They are waiting without the tent cir" the guard answered.

"Well allow them outrunce, and return then to him in command this paper." Now they were readily admitted, and the general arose to great them. The general recognized starring immediately and he gave him his hand go gla 1 glady dl gladly andensid;

"Well, well Starring is it you Glad to see you I have been waiting for this opportunity for a long long time.. "

Now as the tent contrance had been opened to let in the rest with starring, one man ouddenly appearing from no one knows where looking in after them lie had come up unecon by the party the river wide, but he had got over, and that without eminming or on horseback through the water, for it happened that there was near the place a boat which he occured, and in this boat he got over-lie came alone unseen in the camp having followed close to the party so us to be a part of it-when he had come up to the tent, he tried to look in, but the guar: guard being suspicious suddenly got in front of him saying;

"Whence come you sir, and what would you have Are you a member of the party!" "He answered yes."

"Well where is the Countersign . Give it, so that we might show it to the general?" lie thinking it was in paper fumbled in his poket and handed him a letter. "I want the counter eign" demanded the guard. "It's not written. You should know

This time the man answereed not a word. Then the guard called the nearest batch of soldiers, who took him prisoner, and led him into a tent to be held for inves tigation, It proved he was a shadower, a man following the party to learn their intention so the clandolinium generals could be on the look out. He was detected and caught i on time.

while here in this camp t starring learned from the chief officers who convened with him, that they themselves with the help of the Gemini, and others had all went on a special expedition to the region of Abbieann and other places of the great disaster to investigate the conditions after the great explosion especially the conditions following the explosion disuster itself of the Abbieunn regions. The distinguished Cominium no members who were the heads of the party are Coneral liendro argur, Whilliam Schloeder, and Dingigore, who had et studied the effects and causes o . of every disaster that had occured, and the ast terrible then and the most terrible known forest fires then devastating parts of Calverinia,

The expedition made in late August was the most important and best equipped commission over sent out to study actual disaster effects. Results of great scientific and practical consequence had been expected to come from their work, but on their return, and after they had reported the results of their observations to the Abbieunnium Government, they were coming to give Starring and his communions all the aid they needed us Dargur said Starring would not be able to accomplish it alone. This report, forming the best hopes of the governmental aurthorities will they said do a good deal of good good for the cause.

They told Starring the expedition had taken a bout down the Mic-Hollester pun River on August the 18th by special order of paperor Hanson Vivian, and advice of the Princesses, carrying supplies and ammunition which was to be used in case of necessity. After two weeks trip they arived in grancis Atlanta, several hours after the second greatest flood herror of northern Angelinia occured which exceeded all floods in the war on the christian side so far. The officer continued -"In continuing oir, or placing each a or competent expedition in the field so propertly promptly, the deminion ocienties are rendering the Country and her cause a great doul of good, and which also will be a lot of help to you. It is also from a scientific joint of view that the Er general action of the greatest explosion disaster in our country which had so terribly devastuted Bengal state and many others and disturbing the whole world in general, should also also be studied by specialists at the eurliest possible moment, for all of us b must get to the bottom of this, so that we can find cluse to who were roully responsible. Hever kn in the history of our own country has such a favorable opportunity occured for any investigation not of the causes of the disaster, for that is known, but of who are responsible, so that our cause and government can be made more safe in the near future, and also to be able to punish the guilty once in a way no one was ever punished before.

This terrible series of explesions near Abbicannia (worse in force in this story than even the ceration of Krakaton) took place thousands of alen from wiles from the northern most parts of Abbicannia and jet the vibration was slightly felt there

"I supposed said starring, that from the present activity of the nation from the effects of such an unusual disaster, and the unsaminess t general throughout the whole world in general, the eclentists of Abblownia also have a good opportunity for investigation. They they do not be cent to investigate also is a mystery to me. Our governments have full opportunity and airth'r aurthority to expend what money can be afforded for these scientific investigations in culverinian territory. That door it do the demini, and others, of good when the Scientists do not help? They are needed to investigate the disunters more than any one else. Are they afraid .? pone of the acientific branches of any state covernments, were ever sent or went on expeditions to the ocenee of any dispater thus happening, leaving as it seems the work to the Gemini, and the military alone. I prostest, and prost pros protest hotly too. If the Scientific companies won't help why should we do the work curselves. It is their work to investigate put the Gemini, and the military, and other investig ation societies recognizing the discremee of immediate investigation for the good of the countrys cause countrys cause, have been sent or went of their own accord to each region of this strange and herrid sur disturbance, at its ean cost,, three of the foremost aurthorities on disaster occurance, wen wolcania Scientists have been sent who know most on all volcanic action in the world, but what do they know about explosions of three and so forth set off by the enemy .?"

"Outill thogreat Abbieunn disaster" said the officer " occured, few had over thought that so vast a city would be a thing of the past in a few days. The do coming efsuch a disaster was never thought of, and the fact that it was for a city a gloricus gem in the world, a righteous city to boot, its coming destruction would nover have been believed. It was as we all know, inhabitated by the biggest population population , uscore of city, with two million apice could bound of. could boast of, and people from surrounding cities and towns, used all railroads to go to visite in that magnificent city, while foriegn tourists roumed through lits wide streets, and watched the unusually righteous and good little children at play or at their duties, a place where no meanness or scoldings was ever heard. Geographers, and so forth condescended to notice big Abbieann more than any city, in the country, it was the gummer home and headquarters of mperor Vivian, and also famous for a tremendous and unusual christian victor, early in the war.

The name of the city would have been far better than un anything else ever put on the map of calverinia or her sister states.

It was known to all calverinian and Abbieunnien Ruilroud managers and presidents n and engineers and so forth, for it too was a great ruilroud Center like Chicago in the other far away country, and it is marked on the maps as one of the most greatest properous cities in the world, and n n next to vivian Wickey in size. It was no doubt recorded, that before the disaster the locality had been once or more thun once, the seut of great circuses, and pasttimes, and so on .. In fact the city owened its existance to some good purpose and support of the nation, and had existed for nearly a century without a single disaster. It seemed as if the city bbleann might be regarregarded as a city that headed all the others in magnificence in calverinia. In this respect it would be like many other good cities and towns all over the globe inimpotance importance to the whole world in general, like famous pleasure resorts.

But us we all know Abbicann on the date of the first or second of june this year,. Terrible as all past explosion disaster, or even all volcanic emptions throughout the world a existance had been, these great explosions while caused a flood to wire out a good part of bbicarnia was soon to compell by the terrible t thunders of the disaster the whole world to pay attention to the most frightful and marveous and actoniching disaster ever known to happen or probably will ever huppen. The region of Abbieans and sengal County became the ocone of the outbreak of a twofold disaster so appulling that it will be dostined to be remembered throughout the existence of the world. " "But was there not even the alightest evidence that the enemy was going to make such a disuster,?" usked Angoline sichees her self.

"It is hard to say" said the general. I have heard however that in the spring of this year, there were symptone that the disaster was to come from the fact of other great explosion and flood disasters before this. Other notable warnings were given. From the perodic explosion disasters strungs secondary, earthquakes had teen felt at every given point, and deep far distant rumblings preceded from the explosions, showing that the onomy was in properation of something unusual, and that the foc was about to do something that would be a surprise to the world in general. There is nothing known then about the disaster than what we investigators have discovered which we can tell you later, for we are going to take you to the scene and let you investigate first. At first as I believe you know, though the preceeding disasters were of a serious nature, not no one know or even believed that any such horror would occur at Abbicann, which is about two hundred miles southeast of malverine. In fact the good people of Abbicum city, so far at being terrified at h what twas in progress elsewhere in calverida, or of the news of floods, and forest fires. and depredations of the enemy,, continued to live in apparent security, never dreaming that quite a long distance away abot dangerously near just the same secret enemy engineers were working at preparations to start a world fling disaster.

Many others , am ours would have been delighted to have been able to see the people of this good city before the horror came, but not I am eure to witness so terrible a spectacle.

As we all know the menths of this dread your continually advanced and passon, it first being April,, and to may and the veger vigor of the disasters of explosions, fires, horrors a of battles, and ruids steadily increased since the first disaster in the late part of 1912. The noises of each explosion disuster became more and more wehement, terrible forest fires started in southeastern Calverinia, and herrid floods carried all before them, and bloody massacres of ch children occured, which also broke all records for massacres, some of these explasions were presently heard for a hundred miles from their source, but still other explosions occured whose noises waxed loader and loader, w untill the great thunders of the explosions before the Abbieann disaster, now so rapidly occuring, astonuchi astonuched the whole nation, and there were other symptoms of the approaching worse catastrophes of this war. hich with each successive week of the months passing by, the forest fires in southeastern Calverinia as we all know continued to spread, hurling unusual quanities of dense smoke also far beyond the highest clouds in the sky.

The winds of fierce gules it is said could not carry this smoke away as rapidly as it was hurled upward by the seas of smouldering and blazing forest fires, and accordingly the atmosphere became heavily clouded with the suspended smoke. This is the cause of even now of the pall of musual darkness which hangs over a good portion of Culverinia, and a over the adjoining chores of the Culverinian and Mic-Whirthian seas. And even now such is the thickness and density of these atmospheric volumes of forest fire smoke, that for hundreds of miles around the scene of forest fire dangers the darkness of midnight still provails at midni midday and all over Calverinia the sun never shines. This is causing many plagues to break our, from lack of sunshine, and crops and other growth do not thrive without the sun, and some bablame the smoke for the luck of rain.

Then the awful tragedy of Heid! Junction and other places took place. Many thousands hundreds of thousands of the unfortunate inhabatants of that city, and other towns and villiages were destined never to behold the sun again. They were presently swept away to destruction in an invasion of that part of the country, by the tremendous flood of that time, which only was exceeded by the Abbieumn torrent which came later.

This shows that gradually but q quickly the development of the disuster energy procued produced by so vile a fee proceeded, and gradually the terror and apprehens ion and suspicion of the inhabatants of every city and town of all our southern Abbicunnian states rose to a climux. May had just about neared its last week before the manifestations of a disaster at Abbieunn should come. As the days of May passed by, disasters far and near of every kind as all of us know maxed more and more vehement and devastating, and the forest fires ran wild. By the end of ay the panic was wide spread, the christian armies frequen by fled before the forest fires, little dreaming that the supreme catastrophe of our side was at hand.

On the night of May 31th this awful year, the bluckness of the smoke clouds now much thicker than ever over the skies was only occassionally brightened by the lurid flashes of fire from the forest conflagration. Fearful was the fifteen minutes of horror midnight of June 1th . Even though the explosion thunders of the sudden blasts had been puon the point of attaining their complete development no one in the whole region thought of devustuting floods that would follow ... At the city of Calverine, more than two hundred miles distant, every one were routed out of their beds, as the houses trembled and shook with the unusual violence of the mysterious secondary shocks, and the windows rattled and broke and fell into the streets as if great explosions every where were going on in the streets, and still these shocks seemed to be only rehearsing for the supreme display. The shocks had by this time continued for about twelve minutes. By fifteen minutes after twelve, there was a sort of overture consisting of six secondary great shocks , which was succeeded by a frightful convulsion of the country for hundreds of miles. while crashed down many tall buildings in calverine, and scared the population out into the streets. In that finall afforts all records of all previous explosions even of volcanic explosions present and past on this whole earth were compleently completely broken, so great was the force of the explosion, that nearly six hundred miles of country were split into millions of cracks and fuss figures by the concussion and a large part of the fields and plains in the vinicity of Abbieann was scar scattered to the four winds of heaven. This caused an investigation of persons who to this day are trying to learn from some evidence that might be left of what the glundel inlune might have used used that caused this awful series of explosions. The most supreme effort cannot be said to detail it properly, but nevertheless this surrome effort of disasters disasters it was which produced, not only the mightiest noise that so fur us can be accortained has ever been heard on this earth, but also the most world breaking ruin of towns and cities ever known of by the concussion, and also a flood that broke all records for a combination of the worst floods of the pust the world has ever heard of.

Yet it indeed must have been the loadest noise over recorded, which could travel from the region of Abbicann to Calverine, and preserve its disasterous vehemence over so great a distance, but novertheless we Calverinians should and would form a very inadequate conception of the ener energy of this eruption of explosions, if we thought or dared to say that the sounds of the crushes were heard by those merely a little over two hundred miles off.

Indeed for compurison this would be little indeed, if it can be claimed on testimony which we have found it has been absolutely impossible to doubt, deny or exaggerate. Westward from the city of Calverino stretches the wide expanse of the great Culverine County, full of towns and woods. East lies the city of Evangeline St clare a distance of four hundred miles scuthoact, while Pandore city in Abbicunnia City or gtate mean is a distance of nearly five thousand miles. It i has been proved, general Sturring by thousands of hundreds of evic evidences, which cannot be doubted under any condition that the thunders of these great explosions, attracted the attention of all the people in Pundora, Abbieannia, who carefully noted the character of the sounds sounds, and the time of their occurance. They had heard them just five hours after the actual explosions, for this was the time the sound occupied on its

Probably general Starring, we can better realize the extres extraordinary and immedaureable vehemence of this tramendous series of noises if we imagine a similar event to take places in lol localities more known to most of us, thum are the fur

If any volcano in our wou w country were vicerious enough for only fifteen minutes to emit a sories of thunders like these explosions, how great would be the consternation of the world itself. Yet the report of these explosions were heard by properor Vivian at Angolinia Agathia, three thousand miles away, and by Emperor Hanson near Vivian Wickey, where he was conducting the besieging armies. It astonished those great Abbieannian rapporors and all the Abbieannians , The sound renetrated to the seclusion of the States governments of Abbiennia at Pandora. Those at far Jonnie From Town and Crowley heard it. It had extended to the nources of the Mic-Hollester Run, way up north-It was heard in Fastern Calverinia., and it had been heard by the governors of Angelinia State, and Angeline wine. It reached the ears of the inhabatants of Porothy Galo city further away yet no inhabatants in Abyesintile were beyond the range of sound, while crews on besieging warships around the sections of the seaward sides of Vivian Wickey also caught the mighty and unusual reverbration.Ot yet, to take another description, let us suppose that a similar earthshaking event took place in a central portion of the Europeian Mations. Let us say for example general, than an explosion occured at Mt Vesuvius. "uch a report might shake cities with bad effects on windows in nermany. At windsor the King of ingland would see the magnificent windows of the building crash out, and the Czar of all the Russas at Moscow would wonder why windows in his city streets would rattle as if artillery was beingudischarged in the strees streets and also hear a hundred strange booming sounds follow each other in rapid succession for fifteen minues minutes. The s gultan at Constantinople would see his houses go to ruin before the shock and lots of his people buried o under the wreckage. It would have been felt and heard by the Mohammedan pilgrims at Mecca with energy enough to scare them into fits into fits.Or lets say it happens in central United States. Bu supposing an explosion occured at a pleace called Mt Hood in what ever state you call it, an explosion as fierce as those near bbieunn. It would certunly certainly scare the inhabatants of that state far and wide, and give their cities and towns a dreadful shaking up. The cars of dwellers in neighboring states would recieve a considerable shocks, and they would see the window glass of their houses come tumbling down into the otreets in perfect showers, Not with intensity that would be semewhat less the sound would spread further around, indeed it could be . heard and felt all over the United states.

The terrible and sonorous waces could have rolled over and across the vert very Atlantic acean, they would have been heard and folt with great and telling effect on the shores of all the occurs, even outh america would not bee too far to the south,, nor the northpole too far to the fiorth...... If indeed general we could believe also that the sound traveled traveled from the site of the exlis explosions in alverinia to the northern coust of Abbicannia, and we can suftly declare that every ear in our Abbieanian states might have listened to the thunder of the awful explosions near Abbieann. The reverbrations were somewhat audible by the landelinians in their own states, therefore can we doubt that the greatest noise that has ever been recorded were produced by the explosions fifty miles northwest of Mbbleann. ??????

And general gturring, among the many other incidents connected wity with this this explosion, we can specially mention the wonderful system of dir divergent ripples that started in the atmosphere from the point at which the great explosions took place. We may call them ripples if anything else sir, from the resemblance which they can be made to confirm to the circular expanding ripoles or circles produced in a pool of water by a boy flinging a stone directly into the senter-But it can be more correct to say that these objects might have been a great series of undulations which started from the scene of the great explisions, and spread. forth in ever onlarging circles through the atmosphere. The unascell and initial impetus was so tremendous that these waves spread for many thousands of miles. .They diverged in fact, untill they put a mid mighty girdle round the whole world, on a great circle of which the explosion region near Abbieann was the pole ...

The atmospheric waves with the whole earth now well in their grasp, advanced into the opposite hemisphere. In their farther progress, they had from necessity been compelled to form gradually contracting circles untill at last they converged to a point in the control point of the greater seas at the very opposite point of the diameter of our earth, eighteen thousand ales from Abbieann.

Thus the waves completely embraced the earth. Every part of our atmosphere had been set into a tingle by the great explosion. In America the great waves affecting magnetic needles in all houdquarters passed over the houds of the people the air in the streets of every city trombled from the explosion impulse. The very oxygen supplying the lungs of the people responded also to the sum supreme convulsion which took place so far away. It is needne needless to object that this could not have taken place because we did not feel it. Self registering parometers all over the world have enabled these waves to be followed unmistakably all over the world, for it also caused a magnetic disturbance felt all over the sorld. It was reported that by both the air waves and other disturbance of the blasts that such powerful electro magnetic waves were shot forth by the explosions that the magnetic needles, were disturbed all over the world for many hours.

The superintend of the Abbie unnium Coust survey reported to the government that the magnetic needles at the Coust Survey magnetic observatories, at all places on the coast, inthe plengiglomeneum Islands, Catherine Isla, and also of the consts of foriegn flations were disturbed on the early morning of June Ith are at the time of the explosions fifty miles north of bblown. The needles are very delicately suspended and always register automatically by photographic means the mun minutest variation in the direction and intensi sintes intensity of the earths magnetic force. The magnetic disturbance began at the Concentinian City observatory at a time corresponding to about Twelve, twelve , and again at twelve fifteen, Abbicann's local time, and at the Imperial Observatory, at Twelve Fifteen, Calverine time. Reports from that region stated that the explosions occured a little before and after twelve in the morning.

A clock in the city of Culverine was stopped at Twolve oclock in the morning..... As I was told by the aurthiroties aurthorities of any governmental tates official the magnetic disturbance was thus almost instancounty recorded at the Angelinia agathia gurvey observatories. The needs had been disturbed again and again for every explosion that had occured, and these disturbances were plainly due to the magnetic effects, and was in no sense caused by plainly mechanical vibrations.

It is for ar scountry the first instance that magnettic effects caused by distant war explosions have ever been recorded at magnetic observatories. Machanical vibrations of magnetic needles caused by concussions of far distant blasts have also been proviously recorded. For instance the Lake gelicia crush, and flood wovember 13th 1912 caused a distinct mechanial c mechanical viberations of the magnetic needles for ut least two hours, ad a magnetic disturbance also was recorded afterwards. But the distinct magnetic effects of the morning of June the first pulled the magnetic needles anide from their usual direction for many hours indicating a great disaster had occured somewhere..

Yet in explosive violence, , the eruptions of Mt Poles, grakatea and others volcances put together in one was to this great series of explosions at Abbieann but the explosion of fire crackers of small size. Krata Krakatoa was heard distinctly about three thousand two hundred miles away,, the sound of the explosions at Abbicann p penetrated two hundred miles short of II,000 Krakatou sent its dust round the globe, the forest fires raging still in Calverinia and Angelinia a is also carried around the world according to recorded statements made. And such was the enc energy with which the vibrations of these one hundred explosions withinfifteen minutes were initiated at or near Abbieann, that even when the air waves thus arising had converged to the point diametrically opposite the coast near the Calverinian seas their vigor was not yet exhausted. The waves strange to say were then reflected back from their pint of convergence to retrace their steps back to Abbicann. Starting from pentral Mic-whirthan Seas they again go whead and describe a series of enlarging circles, watill they embran embraced the whole parth, Then advancing in the opposite hemosphere they gradually contracted untill they had again regained the central portion of Bengal County, or near Abbicann from which they had set forth about thirty six hours previously. Here was indeed because of such explosions a unique experience, for the air waves had twice gone from end to end of this globe of are. Even then the atmosphere did not subside untill after nome oscillations of gradually d fuding intensity at last they became evanescent....

The explosion also from experience known drove into the upper atmosphere for nearly fourty wiles so that easy a prodigous quantities of dust and powder smoke, and rained down on many towns and villinges a veritible torrent of debris and earth as if the plains had broken into a volcanic eraction as violent, so that these towns and villiages suffered destruction in the same fashin fashion as St Pierre did when lit Polee blow up. Hundreds of miles of air were thus clouded with that rolling ball of smoke, and the winds of the uper atmosphere were compelled to disclose those movements about which only after Krakaton and we any opjortunity of learning. The forest fires als also sent smoke clouds equally as high all the time they were and are burning, and with eyes full of blank antenishment many of the population of our states have ... watched those want volumes of smoke start on tremendous journeys in any direction according to the actions of the winds. And yet like a mighty tempest of fire striving to wipe out our country the "Red Plugue is indegently harrying with a speed much greater, than any other awful fire ever head of pefere vertunately for us this forest fires have been prevented by the floods from coming within less than twenty miles of our bigger cities ... Angelinia Agathia, Derothy Gale and other his cities though wrecked by the floods, are thus preserved from fearful and total expissiont destruction that the flames would produce, blases which whole forests of trees do not even stand before, and which in ten minutes do as much demans to a fifty hundred acro forest, as would the most violent ternado. Then this great forest fire makes so much emoke, then for 5y3 first for the first time, and , may also add for the only time, has the smoke ever kept a whole country side in total darkness for months and kept the sun shi shining all over the states for the sunch length of time."

"It is said" declared Stirring," by many witnesses that these forest fires puts them in mind of the earth being turned into a hage fire mist. Even Abbieann: a and foriegn acton actronomers tells as that the forest fires might as well be licened to the vast nebulas seen in the heavens These het forest fires raging for hum reds of miles around and ever the country will I'll bet if they keep on burning prevent Calverinia from seeing much of a winter this coming year. And as I have kept record of, and so as have violet, and her sisters, there have been since the war commenced about three hundred and sixty five disasters throughout Calverinia alone caused by only the enemy himself.

This estimate includes mostly smaller disusters, and disasters which which within the lust number of months have been in a record breaking force and fury. Secause of the forest fires a ring of terrific blazes a surround Angelinia Agathia or has surrounded her starting at the southeastern section of calverinia in June 1912 several hundred miles south oust of Angelinia Agathia, a belt of forest fires had burned their way up the sust central portion of Calverinia, extending also to the extreme east, and west, and to a sustern Angelinia gtute, from there it crossed crosses the Jessica liver, and spread along the Evangeline St Clairs to and off the city of the same name, thence it follows first the east edge of the November River through the Enstern gobals a present, the eastern section of the Mic-Hollester woods, and finally extends up tward Angelinia Agathia.

The series of forest fires forming and sweeping in all that region, have in places raged in long ranks or lines man, miles wide, and no one knows how many miles long, as along the Calverinian and Angelinia boundary, and near lake Selicia when Irienetown burned, elsewhere probably the forest fires may have been seperated by long distances, but nevertheless in time they connected with each others, gometimes they as, the line of fires, was either narrow or wide according to how they burned as in Central Angeline, ine, and then again some others broadened in a fire of hundreds of miles in extent, as in western Calverinia, where the worst fire of all is raging.

Within this great stretch of fierce and terrific forest fires, hundreds and hundreds of miles in length, are many big cities and towns, which fortunately through the floods have been spared the horrors of the confliggration. Bastward from this dread point, another branch of fires extends through gentral Calverinia. On the broken points between Big Girl Knool and Francis Atlanta, are over one hundred fires burning, many of which are striving to make a junction with each other and are so fierce that they might as well be volcanoes belohing forth lava and clouds. This is the great focus of forest fire horror in Calverinia caused by the enemy and blamed on the von battles. Touch nearly throe sides of Angelinia Agathia forest fires rages. In the far north of Angelinia Agathia, the Mic-Whirthian woods are ablaze, and nearly one score or others of forest fires are raging, cutting off all communication with the north. We can also draw the atention to the fact that the gr great conters of the war disasters in western ad and southern culverinia and in Angelinia State, are converging tward Angelinia Agathia, and Vivian Bickey, and that these centers of activity, are west and southeast, and sither one or both may terminate the whole war.

wheories about too sir, un to the cause of the forest fires and the like, but of actual causes we know little but that the enemy did it. And perhaps the most probable explanation of the explosion disasters can be as follows;

"First...In all probabilities the enemy engineers might have worked deep under ground, forming by laboring crows of soldiers under their instruction instruction great mine galleries. The laboring men gradually place in the unknown kind and ammount of dangerous explosives, and as time goes on, more and more explosives are placed. Then the ammount of all these high explosives is constantly increasing, untill the time comes when the ammount desired by those who are suched this vite work to be done its placed. Probably then batteries from an unknown source but at a great distunce is therefore placed, with long electric wires. The charge is let go and the whole like an ernormous volcanic cruption explodes with the most terrific jury. The proper strength of the exp electric might be applied which would hasten the explosion, but it is doubtful if there was used enough rever to do more than this.

The concussion shocks of the Lake Solicia Disaster probably timed the explosion that produced that terrible November flood. But in all probabilities the great Abbieum horror is the last straw, it brought the last since of cressure to sear on the patience of the people of Aubieannia, once one more ounce than even a steam boiler could bear. The local explosions of Mullencatt and other State districts were also unusual, Two other factors may assist this rocess; "The making of mine galleries under river leves, which explosions either violent or less violent allows the river waters to pour out over the land and generate an ernormous flood more rapidly h than a natural break would have ever been able to o do. Of explosion wilsasters in genera; general I say that the cause is still a matter of discassion. Certain geologists content that gun cotton and T.M T.N.T was the sole motive power. while others consider that explosives known only to the Glandelinians have see, ased coming from only the Glandelinian governmental munition works. The view perhaps most favorable entertained at present in reference to the general natural o nature of these explosions is that the Glandelinians dusquised as Angelinian leves engineer chieftians and the like insert explosives anseen, explosives that go off by time and not of batteries and shock wires. But what ever produced the most conspicious and the most terrible phenomena accompanying the Abbieann explosion disaster is a profound mystery."

"Tou might be right at that general Starring" said the leader of the Culverinas who e whose name we will mention later. "The recent disturbance of the Abbieum horror were explosions of the eraption type if they had come from underground volcamic cruptions as many people believed, and which cruption had exploded through the surface of the earth. But from the smell of the smoke produced from the blusts, the odor was that of T.N.T. Gun cottom, No Mitroglycerne and Dynamitte. These explosions were similar to what would happen if a munition factory with as much explosives would have created buth a disturbance and they are worse in currently that have created such a disturbance and they are worse in cruption than grakatoa ever could ever boast of."

"Maybe if I was there, and could do some investigation of my own" said starring I could light upon the mystery. I'd have Masses offered that Our Blessed bord for the sake of our holy cause would allow me to succeed. I know that those who at i first did not know the true nature of the cisaster thought the accompanying shocks were natural earthquakes accompanying the terrible cruption of some of our volcamoes,. N. ne of them have ever yet been eruptive. One ment told me some time ago that one of the least of the explosions left a crater in the ground over four hundred feet deep, now filled with water, but the rim of the hole shows abo above the lake. Earth debris fell over the country for many miles around. The people in the noighboring villiages fleeing in terror from their tumbling homes were caught and crushed under the shown, which buried fertile fields of crops. The outburst was proceeded by concussion shocks, and the shocks of the explosions were felt with "avoc resulting affects as far as Angellnia Agathia and neight and neighboring cities and heard just as far just as you told me for I heard evidence of that."

"You may have the chances to make the investigations when you got there on time" said the captian. "But let me finish first. On our arival four weeks ago to the scenes of Abbieunn, our parties were forced because of the nature of the disaster to separate. I and many others in boat boats when on the flooded site of that we still believed was left of Abbieunn, to ex examine the flood itself, and what might be left of the buildings of the flood torn city, while the rest of the party proceeded to the scenes where the explosions had occured to invistigate to investigate conditions in that section. The expedition of which we were a part had also been advised to enlarge the party if posible, to accose associate ourselves with the supreme Persons of the cemini, pargar, sinigore, and Whilliams Schlooder who

The accientiate whom we had hoped for did not arive,... General pargar himself embarked on a row boat, and examined the localities of the explosions as far north as St Anns Point, the north nd end of the Great Mic-Hollester River, making frequent landings at points where the wreckage floes still remaining in the waters were not to think. After landing at a little villiage, or what was left of it from shock and flood he walked or rode on boats; ean through the flood covered sections, making an effort to locate so sight of some parts of the devustated city of Abbieum which was said to appear above the flood at the southern end.

General Durgar according to the ass. Associated press of Angelinia Agathia, in dispatches from North St Ann was the first man to discover some of the craters caused by the explosions, fissures in the earth beyond the flood, or the innumerable wast cracks. During this trip along the region of diseaster, a trip attended with considerable peril, in addition to his work of investigation, Durgar rescued in his boats many poor persons of violet Lansin who a had been tempted back to their flooded homes by the apparent sading of the flood, and had since found themselves in great danger. On his return to St Ann he issued a brief statement as to his observations, which has been published in many magazines and books and also in the news papers. The immense zone of record breaking catastrophel in the Abbieann regions and gongal gounties is of an endless extent it seems for we were only able to go over a snort oval space of it, containing only about eighteen miles of

This oval is partly over the river region. We could find no trace of houses of beliann appearing above the seas of mater remaining oven up to that time. The cracked sections of land nearest Grater Ho One, is bounded by a debris covered paral district extending from Helda Junction to the peak of the Abbieum Lake, as we call the remaining flood, thence curving around to remaining the remaining flood, thence curving around to remain there were three well marked zones;

"First a complete center of Annihilation by explosion horror only and not by flood in which all life in big cities and towns, vegetable, homen and animal was atterly destroyed. The greater northern eastern and western part of Abbieann city was in this zone. Thirty cities suffered like St Pierrie at Martingue when a volcame on that island exploded.

"Become. A zone of singing blistering flame caused by the shooting of the explosions, which also was fatal to all life, and growths as well, killing all people and animals, and suffocating them with smoke and dust, burning the leaves of the forests, starting forest fires out of the flood zones hich still burne, and accrecing scorching but not utterly destroying the still stending buildings themselves.

"Third. A larger outer, non,destructive zone of fallen earth and other debris wherin rural distructs was covered with great loss of property and crops, and ci ies and cities and towns covered with the debris.

The focus of annh annihilation to was the closest explosions, midway between Abbisann and Wickey Lansin, where now exists a series of large craters, with hundreds of big cracks, looking like cracters of miniature volcances now covered with water and extent. The explosions as is evident had also thrown up into the air clay, sand, and and other materials erupting like volcance, probably hurling high into the into the air mushroom shaped clouds. The explosions from evidence had great superficial force, acting in radial directions, as is evidenced by the dismounting and carrying for hundreds of yards the towns on the hills south of Abbisann, and a big church in the same locality, and also by the condition of the ruin d houses in the various towns not hit by flood.

According to the r testimony of some persons who survived there was an accompany ing flame. Others think that the debris, and the force of their ejection from the exple explosion made craters were sufficient also to cause the destruction. This must be investigation investigated. It was on the following morning on the sixth of August also that Dargur started on hos horseback from the land side for the explosion or a er No Two-He reached the point nearest on the following morning where he succeeded in gettig a number of photographs. A close approach to the scene was impossible, so he started back in a southerly direction puring these two rights while camping out he made some important observations of flood action, and the results of explosions, and on his return issued the following statement.

"My attempt to examine the explosion crater has been fulile. I succeeded however in getting close to crater number one. It was a large one, as large as that of a big volcano, all filled with water, and sho had ever witnessed from a safe point one of these big explosions, might have noted the accompanying phenomena, while these explosions raged no one could live within t n miles of them. Following the salvess of detonations from these explosions, eithersee said the rolls of clouds ascended these high into the clear starlit sky, and then apread in a wast 1 blak ascended these high into the clear starlit sky, and then apread in a wast 1 blak k black sheet to the north south and east lirectly over their heats. Through the lower sections and upper sections of the clouds they also said, vivid and a f awful red flambes appeared with clarming frequence frequency frequency. They followed distinct paths of ignition, but were not like lightning, and this may be the indisputable evidence of the explosive exidation of the powders and T.N.T after they went off. This is a most pimportant observation, and it explains in part the arful catastrophs. This phenomenon is entirely new in i explains. He tool many phosot photographs, but he did not he situate to acknowledge hat that the war terrified by the excess, but he was not the only person so frightened. I was also. Mearly all the phenoment of these explositines are new to even science scientific compunies, and hey and many of them have not been explained. The floods at that location even in August I was still intenest, actional and no one can make any estimations and predictions as to what the flood will dowin the near future.

But it was told to me that both whilliam gohloeder and inistone under date of Arment

a portion of the fleed He spent two days also studying the first formed smaller cruters on the north side of the explosion area. Then he attempted to reach the main cruter, and with this purpose in view he get out over the fleed.

The fleed in that locatilty he told me was very crift and general but amid a thousand dangers, he reached too the erater and looked over the hope erater. Here also he spent some time in taking cereful observations. The approach was exceedingly difficult owning to the reter and most that covered the locality, but the ground was hard. After a tiresome trip, the rim of the cruter by heat afterwards was reached by middey. There was no trace whatever of vegetation, coundings of the crater was lately and and to appeared to be a dreadful hole over two thousand feet deep. The party with Ginginore did not venture at any other point to make a rigid inspection of the crater for the cround in that direction though not covered by water looked to be dengarous. Though there was no trace of vegetation there was no change in the topographical outlines of the landscapes on that side, and the far distant foreste retained their old hearty. The great mass of flood water that lay over this section has partially disorgened, and the lendscare here was probably intact, but near the river a subsidence of the chos to a shore to a dopth of one hundred fest occured for over an area of a mile. The explosions, he says we more violent north west of Abbienna, where the bigger craters are located, than on the western side. One particularly violent explosion as he observed covered the town of St Peter sixteen miles north of Abicann with hedious mud and dobris. Many of the buildings were razed as if a ternado passed through. The explosions rained water over the cities further off to the south. There are many other v explosion craters, difficult and dangerous to visit because over opening on the side of the river formed by the explosion main of a tremendous crater like gorge, and it was the explosion that made this gorge, which may have made the flood. The explosions were almost incessant for those fifteen minutes, and in the towns a hundred miles away which were also shaken disasterously the people had been for some time afterwhe explosions been complaining of a strange oppresive at each like sulphur from ma ches matches or as ches chemists claim, something from exploded powders, and that they had heard for fifteen minutes a long and appalling rolling thunder noise, a noise compared by the inhabatants to the hollowing rouring of thunder in the clouds at some great distance but infinitely louder.

at some great distance but in initally locals. These sounds had continued in successions of noises, and at the ending of the thirttenth minute the noise was terrible enough to fill all the population of the towns with alarm and the shaking drove themfrom the housen into the streets. It was therefore assertained with prefect satisfaction that he main force of the explosion had been exerted within a distance of twenty miles, and that the terrific sounds had been produced by the quantities blowing we. In the hope of allaying the general alarm, priests even at that awful hour after the subsidiance read Litanies and Said wass. A committee

Starring found when he had been with them for a day that these soldiers and their officers were very courteous men, and therefore before taps soldiers and their officers, of his dang dange ous journey to to this part, which was thrilling and profitable news for the Calverinian generals and their staff. He thrilling and profitable news for the Calverinian generals and their staff. He told the officers also, when he saw concerning the conditions of the country told the officers also, when he saw concerning the conditions of the country through which he plodded, and how unwilling some of the rangers were to go with through which he plodded, and how unwilling some of the country their without their not the expedition, insomuch that he was forced to go on it without their guidianship, for he duret not run the danger of that destruction which he feared would come by staying behind in the forestw too long, wherefore he had left the rangers and departed.

No it so happened through the hindering of his own advance, that this Calver inian general had been much hindered and kept back from his wonted movements into these parts which he so desired to reach, and so could not even now obtain
into these parts which he so desired to reach, and so could not even now obtain on opportunity to go forward, or make further inquiry, of how the country lay before him, that he might make a junction with general Vivian or some one class. Therefore having met with Starring and his scounting party, and knowing the two girl heroines with them, and having some concerns about the disaster at Abbieann he decided to advance his army thitherward again, and have Starring and his party with him. Therefore he proposed it to gtarring, h who for the sake of the full accomplishment of a part of his mission decided to go with him, and therefore he took up his bdgings lodgings with the compare which were 10,000 strong. Next morning during breakfast, the Angelinian and Calverinian general fell into discourse, and the talk happened to be about Gingigore and his travels, for thus he began with the general;

nummgir" said starring "What town is that that stretches like a paradize city far below the woods and hills, that lay on the right hand of our camps."

"That " said general Aurand" for that is his name"It is a small but beautiful forest dwelling in the midst of this c " Country of Destruction" but possessed with a very good conditioned and thrifty sort of people. To morrow a number of Scientists are coming from there to aid me and they'll be glad to see you."

"Ithought that was that city." quited Queited Starring"I when a young man I went once myself through that town, and therefore know that this report you give of it is true. Not in the path of the conflagrations I hope!"

"So far Far I don't think so. But danger lurks for them, and that is only too true. I wish I could speak truth in speaking better of the situation, for the eafty of them that dwell within."

"Well sir" quoted gtarring again, "Then I percieve you to be a well meaning man, and so me that takes pleasure to hear and tell of that which is good, pray did you ever hear what happened to a man some time in this very city, whose name was John Evens, that wont on a long scouting tour about three weeks before the abbleann disaster . ?"

Hear of him, ay and I also heard of the melestations. troubles, fights. and every difficulty that he met with in his mission. For what he accomplished nevertheless I must tell you that all our country rings of him, there are but few persons that have not ha heard of him and his doings, and also have sought after and got the records of his expedition yea, I think I may say that his hazardous journey has got many a person wishing to be in his boots, for though when he started out he was believed to be a fool by every one, vet now he had gone and succeeded, and he is highly commended by all, for it is said he recieved a good commission and commands a good army, and there are many more who are resolved never to run his hazards, yet wish they had his gains."

"They may "Qouted Starring," Well think, if they, think any thing that is true that he succeeded well what he went out to accomplish, for he now commands a division , and had has a command to his orders what he hank has never had since he became a commander of any division of troops."

"Yes, and all the people talk strangely about him. Some eas that he now rides a white horse, that he has a very excellent and splendid uniform, that he has a hat for a commissioned general on his head, others say that the main generals sometimes accompany him on scouting expeditions, and on all missions are become his companions, and that he is as familiar with them, as you would be with your best of friends. Besides, and this is confidently confirmed about him, that once Emperor Vivian, had bestowed upon him already a very richard pleasant headquarters tent, and that every day he eats and drinks, and ro rides and talks with sur superior generals, and recieves the smiles and favors of the very Vivian Girl Princesses themselves. Moreover it is expected of some, that Emperor Hunson himself, the Lord of the Middle Abbieannian county, we will shortly come into these parts with a vast army, and will know the reason why any enemy can stop him. For they say that now he is so in the affections of the two properors and that these Covereins are so much concerned with the awful indignities that has been cast upon Calverinia, that he will look upon all as done to Our Blessed Lord Himself, and no marvel for it was the love the Calverinians had for Him that Calverinia suffered, and John Evans revealed a lot. He is coming to morrow to help me, as I have begged the mperor to send him. He'll be a great help to you too general Starring."

"I dare say" quoted Starring"I am glad to whear of it, I am glad for his and the countrys sake. For that no now he is well commissioned, and for that he now reapeth the offects & his work with joy, and for all he accomplished he may soon cause it to be that Calverinja will be beyond gunshot of the glandelinia enemy, and out of reach of the country that hates her. I am also glad for that the news of these things is noised abroad throughout the country. And who can tell but that it may work some good effect on other spies who have not tried their best to accomplish anything. In fact it inspires me to a greater effort. Put pray sir, while it is in my momery do you hear any thing of Gertrude Angeline and her own scouts. I wonder what in the cau case of things th y they do since Violet, and her sisters were frustrated in their own mission y the forest fires hitting

"Tho! Gertrute Angeline, and her boy and girl accepta? They are even like to do as well as John Evans himself, for though they were forced to leave Manlots lines and floe from the fire as well, they would by no mouns b permanded by either the tours or entra entractic of any one to prevent them from going else where, and follow Hanleys army as it retreats, so they are going after him keeping nim well in eight untill they can enter again."

"Better, and bettet" quote Starring. "But what. G rtride, her scouts and all?" "The true."I can give you an account of the matter, for during my advance I came near or within sight of manleys retreating armies, and became thoroughly acquainted with the whole affair.

"I'a like to hear it "Said starring XZ "Well This famous girl scout, after she had bid good bye to violet, and her sisters betook herself on the journey to follow the retreating ermios of Manleys. despite the peril of the persuing forcet fires, and when impeded by a large stream, waited atill the enemy had crossed, a portion of the nearest division) a long footbridge, then not waiting for the bridge the arom over the river, the scouts with her, some awinming, r some riding across, and some using the bridge for a quicker crossing. They at this time could not hear of what camber himself ad had gone, therefore ne she told a later her thoughts began to rock inher and mind first, that one had lost her first or ordenly, and that for the hope of success seemed again broken between her and her followers, for you must know, as sho hadagain said it to me" nature can do less in aiding a person but intertain the hero and the hereine with many a heavy cogitation in the remembrance of the loss of a good operaturity, making you feel nearly as grief stricken as the loss of loving friends and relations. This therefore, of her lost opportunity did cost her many a teur.

But this was not all, for Gertrude also did begin to consider with horself, whenther her unsuccessful attempt, was not because of the fire, and then the river, whether she would have the attempt to see Manley again or not, and that in such a manner he might have escaped her watchful eyes altogether..... would success be taken away from her for good now? And also came into her moind by swarms, all her efforts, to aid her friends, which was successful, and they now trying to aid her were also not making much progress, and she did so went the worse way to discover the cause of why glandelinia gave forthewarms of her wicked disasters unatural and ungodly horrors to Calverinia, which should have clogged her conscience

he was moreover much broken with calling to remembrance with her menyexperiences and sight seeing, the restlessogrouns of the disaster injured , brinksh t cars of those who lost whole families, children, husbands, and wives and friends, and self bemanings of those losing property, and so forth, and how could any one harden their hearts, againstall the entreaties of those who were so torn with anguish, and there was not a thing that the refuggees said to her, or die cerose did before her, and suffered before hor eyes, all the while that the horrid burden hang upon calverinia, but it seemed to return upon her like a flash of lightning. and rent the caul of her heart asunder specially that bitter outcry of meny rendered homeless and with loss loss of dear ones""Has all gone from us" did ring in her ears most dolefully.

When I was with her for a whole I had heard her say to all her scouts who were assembled before b her "Boy and girl scouts hear me. If we do not succeed or if Starring does not succeed, our cause and we are all undone. Glandelinia has sinned and destroyed the holieis of holies of a holy nation, Calverinia is in danger of being rendered a country of the past, and therefore we must work hard for even our own homes and friends and parents are in danger." with that all the

"Oh " said of trude"If it had only been our lot to see Violet and her sisters siststers succeed, than had it fared weel well with out cause beyond what the situation is likely to be now For though I formerly foolishly imagined concerning the troubles of Calverinia to be over soon, it was only a foolish fancy I had, then also , thought I was overrun with melancholy humours, yet now it cannot be out of my mind, but that fears spring up in my heart, for that yet the enemy can do something more terrible than the horrors of Abbieann, but by the help of the discoveries we need so bad, we can cause Calverinia to escape from the snares of such horrors." then they continued to weep, and cried out,p;;;pp

"Oh woe is those days". The following night dertrude Angeline had a dream, , , and behold she saw as if a broad parchment was opened before her, in which were recorded the list of all the horrible disasters, with the number of those dead and thouse those who suffered and died,, and the times,, of the disasters,,,,,, and this situation she thought looked very black for her and her cause. Then she cried out aloud in her sleep"Lord have mercy upon poor Calverinia, and help me or Walter Starring succeed in looking for the information we are after. " and all the little girl scouts not asleep may have heard her.....

After this in her drawm as she told me afterwards she saw two very unly and 111 hated forms at ending by her cot, and saying one to another. That shall we do with this girl, I for she strives to found the our plans, waking and sleeping. If she con affered to go on as she begins in her expections, we shall see classifier war a aimst the christia, the cherrors we must by one way or another mask to take her off from the thoughts of such an adventure, also all the world cannot help it she will learn ever, thing so she seeks after.....

Now as she told me this dream of here made her awake in a great sweat, also she was tramering, and cetting up she ordered more study by her tent. Soon she fell slopeling ag in. And then she thought she saw Starring before gmperor Vivian, among many generals and other efficers, with an unusual yellow parchment in his head, of which he handed to emperor Vivian, ghe saw also as if he sewed his head with his face to the ground, that was under the great kings feet saying; "I have succeeded in locating what you wished so much to know.Here is the paper that tells who were aulity of the flood and other alsosters. Then should a company of the generals that stood round acould acout, but no one could tell what they said, but $farring, and the Dmporer.

Heat morning, when he she had rison, and had proyou to sea, and talked with her soy and girl secure for a while, her goard told her that some one wished admittanced into her tent, and then she sent the goard with the words;

"If you come to see me in God's name come in." So theman man said "Amen" and the goard all wed him add admittance in t into her tent, and saluted her and said, "Miss Arrenburg, do you know for why, have come!"

"Instead gertrude demanded "Who are you sir, and what do youwant!"

"Then he said to her" "I am an Angalnian military secret Service men, I have been sent by payorer Henson. It is talked of throughout most parts of this country of what informations y a desire to obtain for the good of the countrys cause, and also there is a report that thou art aware of the evil Glandelinia had formerly done to the states, by making all these diseaters, and causing s ch suffering. Miss Arronbur, paperor Hanson vivian has sent me to the tell thee that he is ready to have you continue the mission, and that he will take great delight in seeling seeing you or tarring successful he also will have these know that when either you or he even are successful that he will invite you and your followers and he to come into his presence, and that he will sraise jou all to an honor that will be a surprise. There is comini Darh paraga Dargar, with legions more of his companions, over trying for the same goal as you and starring are doing, and yet they too vill all be glad when they shall hear the grand and gloriousness that you or Starring have been successful."

Gertrude Angeline at this was greatly surprised, and the visitor proceeded, "Miss Arronburg here is also a letter for these, which have brought from Emperorr Hanson Vivian."

she took it and opened it,, and the contents of it read as follows,

"I the Emperor of Calveriniu and her states, would have you dear Gertrude to continue on the mission, and if possible join gtarring if you ever meet with him. You two can succeed better than one. Try and find him."

Then she cried to him"I will do so as is asked."

Then said starring:

"Mertrude if she does is facing the bitter before the sweet he will go through many troubles, even probably more than we have already to accomplish a mission of that sort. Wherefore I adfise thee general, to break camp as quickly as possible and continue on our own quest quest as we may find her on the way. We can go through the town over yonder. I got this pass through any part of the country hidden carefully always in m my bosom. Also when I have to return when have secured the information I will have to reture it at purporer Vivians headquarters, the father of the Vivian Girl Princesee themselves."

"Yes I presume so, but I believe on second thought, Abbieum should be our goal first." said the general.

"But can, stand the nights that may be there still?" asked Starring "You must percieve of late sir. I have been always much affected with the thoughts of the situation in calverinia and elsewhere, which I verily believe is by nature still very miserable. The condition to the country is a great load to y my heaet therefore maybe I would not be able to restrain myself if y saw too much. The thought of these things is enough to kill a warm hearted suint outright. But if it is necessary, then let us break camp, and start off, and I can use my ewn judgement us to my feelings accordingly."

Then did all the others burst into tears of joy for that Starring finally was so inclined. The Calverinias of Calverinians therefore started to break camp, and they began to precare to a sot out on what may be a dangerous journey, over d vas a devastated lands, big floods and horrible nights. But while they were breaking camp, I wo of the Calverinian soldiers said to starring;

"Pray sir, what is the meaning of such an expedition?"
"Starringlooked at him in surprise and answered;
"It will do for the good of country and cause."

"For what reason sir, I pray you?"

"What is it to you, But just the same my purpose is to seek important information from the enemy."

"I hope you don't intend to go on such a risky trip as that good sir.Pray for the sake of those of whom you may still have to command o do not so unwantomly cost away yourselfin such perilous conditions.""
"Nay" said Starring, I know what, am doing, and oal of my followers shall continue continue to go with me, for not one of them is willing to stuy behind."

"I wonder in my own heart" said the soldier, " what or who has brought you into going on such a dungerous expedition, when you could have a sent expert spies and agents as well.

"If you know as much about the situation as I do, and about scouting as much as I do, I doubt not but that if you were in my place you would do the same."

Yes. "Yes, and pray what knowledge have you got now sir, that vorks so upon you that makes you tempted to so to demorpase of which no one knows about."

Then Sturring replied;

"I have been as well as the whole nation has been sorely sufficted, since all the suffering has come non the people of the disaster devastated states,, but spe i out specially over the awful Abbiecon disaster herror. But that which is troubling me most of all, is that most of the country cannot go to the aid of those who are thus rendered to suffer and made h m homeless, and of clandelinias churlish carriages to the helpless Calverinians while under their distress. Masides I feel as if I was one of those unfp unfortunate beings, therefore nithing nothing will serve me but go on the jounrey till it is finished come what may I was a dreaming last night that witnessed one of the disasters at its vorset .worst. Oh my soul I felt as if Iwas one of the homeless. I dreamed I saw my mother perish in the flood and was unable to rescue her. All this to go on while those dreadful Clandelinian generals dwelleth in the resence of the whole wicked granleys, and sits and eats with them at their headquarters dinning table, all them of them have become commanions to the wickedest kind of persons ever known in history, and T always believe either one of them know something or are responsible for the series i of disasters. Only when the secret is known can the horrors be stopped. mmpero Emperor Hanson vivian has also sent me on the mission with promish of honor and higher commission from amperor nov Robert Vivian himself if a succeed. is messenger had several times met me on y my journey and I have a parchment which shows my rights to continue the mission. The Vivian Girl Princesses desire me to do it too." and with that he fick plucked out the parch rool roll and read it and said to the officers round him:

"That will you say to this now!"""

"Oh the madness of any one who has sent you to go out on errands and face such perils and difficulties. You have I know remembered what you did meet withalready even in a manner at the first step that you took on your way, as many witnesses can testify, you were fired on from ambush by the two clandelinian Professional Spies, who resemble nutt and Jeff, and who knows that they might not yet be shadowing you to get you sooner or last later. We also heard over and above, how you met with the fires, plowed through a portion of the blazing country known by nickname now as the "Fiery Valley of the Shadows of Death" and many other things. Nor is the danger that you and your followers met with in the ravine to be forgotten by you. So if you who was hard put to it went through all this for a beginning, what do you expect to meet with yet. Consider also you are a general of high commion commission in our armies, and you cannot be spared. herefore should you be so rash as to cast away thyself, so better send some of us instead, and assume personal command of your armies which you left far away at general visians camps."

But Starring said unto him;
"Tempt me not, you under commissioned officers, I have now a price into my own hand to get gain for the sake of the cause, and I should be the greatest fool in the world if I h should have no heart to strike in with the op ortunity when it presents itself. And for that you tell me of all these troubles that I am like to meet with in the way, they are so far off from being to be me an discoir discourage ment, that they show me that I am in the right. The bitter must before before he before the sweet, and later on that also make the bitter sweet, and the sweet the swenter. wherefore I am not going to back out."

"Well have it your own way, said the officers, where he goes we must."

Though they tried to persaude him again continuing the mission these officers were evertheless at a stand, for they did not Iko to advise h him against it but never theless they felt for hi safty and since they could not persaude him from gowng

they felt therefore like accompany him at any risk. First they all yearned for the same adventure, so they said within thomselves; "If Starring will insist on going, we all will accompany him not only to Abbiemen to see the results of the disaster there but will accompany him on his most dangerous journey" Secondly they yearned ever the awful situation of the cause of their own saidly (_vastated state, for what Starring had said had taken come hold upon their mid-wherefore they said within themselves again, "We will have yet one more talk with general Starring and If I find truth and a wi uning of the holy cause of Abbieannia in what he shall say further, curselves with our full hearts will go with her." Therefore they said to the officer who near questioned Starring;

"Colonel Herdrides" I did come with you indeed to help you interview Starring this profit, and since he is as you understand taking of himself a probable farewell of his country, I think to accompany him ourselves will be a great i p.

He will need reinforcements .. "

"well" said the colonel, "I see you have a find to go off on such a hazardous unact unactualing too; but take heed in time, and be wise, while we are out of danger we are out, but when we are in ,we are in."

So the colonel returned to his tent, and there he sent for some of his officers, to wit, Captian Handon, Lieutenent Hanson, and wirst Lieutenent Action also Major Henders, when they unswered the summons, he told them the story of Starrings process purpose.

Well boys, went to interview general starring, and I learned he had been on a i mission that was quite dangerous. So I asked him what his modning was by it, and he told me in enort(short) that he was bound to get information of the floods cancer within the enemys lines, lie told me also of a dream he had, and how the King of Calverinia and her states invited him to prolong his mission."

"There gold Cartier Handon" and what go you think he will still continue on the expedition?"

"Ayo, he surely will go, whatever danger he will have to meet with, and policyed know it by this, for that which was my great a argument to persuade him to give it up and send some one else, for a dreaded the troubles and minfortunes he was lkely to meet on the way, is one great argument with her to pub him forward on the journey-For he told me in so many words" the bitter goes before the sweet2""" Yes, and for as much as it may do, or does, it makes the sweet the sweeter-He means if he is successful, Manleys secrets will be out, and disasters in the future will be unknown."

"It seems a blind and foolish undertaking, said Lieutonant Hanson, but as long as he does not take warning by his recent gerils he went through, nothing I fear will change him now. For my part many of our spies would rest content with whole skin, and never run so many hazards f for nothing."

"The officer comisce also replied;;,;

"Away with such a country as Glanuclinia, from the world---a good riddance, for my part I say of her. Sturring is right in his process purpose. Should be give up his expedition when there is chances of his winning in the rad, who could live quietly by if he failed because he did not continue. Wherefore for my part, I shall never be sorry for his adventure, let him go and do it, we can accompany him, twas never a good part of the world since the whimsical fool of a glandelinia came into it."

Then the conol colonel maded,,,,,,,, "bom come put this kind of talk away."I was yesterday out scouting to see the lay ofthe the land, w and who do you think t should see, but a force of claudeliniums moving southwestward.and dare say, it was a column of troops bent upon going some place. That looked mighty suspicious to me."

By this time, the army of Calverinians were well on its way, and starring and his followers went along with it. And as they went, Jennie urmer and her girl and boy friend being there still also, Starring began his discourse. He said to the general in command of the calverinians;;;;;

"I take this as a very unexpected favor; that you should have me and my followers accompany you, to bring us forth to the views of the disaster regions of Abbisan." "It is because it would be for good purpose to you, and if it was not for that reason I would never rish to go near the arful location any more. It is a uangerous adventure, full pf peril and excitement.""""

"But I'll take the chances " said starring......

""Well" said general Saunders" "you may cast in your lot with me and my soldiers and Calverinians. I do not know for fullness what ight be the result of your great and unusual mission, but if you succeed you'll get a better rea reward than all the gold in gold mines and the like. Wor shall put a myeror Vivian reject any proposition you may a great, though you go only upon the invitation of the Vivian Cirl Princessee and not for compand. Appearing me error Vivian bus invited and advised you to go, and busides if yo, wish you can for the time being be a part, of my comend, only if you desire gold thinks for your benefit come to Abbicann..."

PBut how shall I or my followers be over ascentained that we shall gain success by just having a view of the ruins?" demunded Starring Had I this hope but from one that can tell I would make no stick at all but would be still more willing to go, being Helpled by Him that can help, though the way was never so tedious."

"Well sire said the Calverinian general"I will tell you what you should do. Co with me to the scenes with me to beleann, and there I will further advise thee shall there you have not met with encouragement, I will be content that you and your followers can continue your route alone as formerly. I will also pay thee for thy Mindness in accommanying as far at least, which you also showed me and my proper paying us this visit, and iin thy accompanying of us in arrays as thou do the starring which we have not as the said that the starring of us in arrays as thou to both non" said Starring, I will go with you thither, and will take that shall follow providing it is for my now good, and Our Blessed Lord grant that my bt lot at the beation of Abbieann may there fall even up the King of Heaven and His Blessed Mother shall have their Hearts pon me upon my me and my itentions."

The Calverinian general was now happy at heart, not only that he had a famous christian gene a general as a companion, but also for that he had prevailed with this general ande ad his followers to fall in love with a new part of the adventure. ... So they went on together, and for a time Jennie gurmer began to weep. Starring noticing her said;

"What is the matter, Jen? Why weepest thou."?

"Alas" said jennie," who can but lument that shall but rightly consider, what a state and condition, poor Calverinia, and her states are in, and prtions of our country that yet remain insuch an awful condition, plugues, and suffering everywhere and that which makes my grief the more heavy is, because there is no way to bring help to the sufferers and the homeless, nor any one who can even know what can be done.."

"YesBut crosses comes before the crown" said starring. "And you do for the suffering of Calverinia, as every one else throughout the whole world is didding when the dicasters were broadcasted, the world itself mourns, but remember Our Diesed Lord will gather up the tears of the suffering of Calverinia, and those who moder mourn for the peple, and at them into His Chalice, and both you and I and every one who feels for the efferers, are reaping fruit and benefit from them. I hope Jennie these tears of yours will not be lost, for the truth has been said that they that sow in tours shall reap in joy, and in singing, and those that go forth and weep bearing precious seed of sorrow for others, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing bringing his shieves with him."

When the army of alverinians came up to the river, not far from the town they began to be at a stand, for the river was wide and there was no boats in sight. The general in chief percieving also, that notwithstanding the size of the river it was line apparently all its length on both sides with forests, and the situation was worse than formerly.

"nut, said tarring" come let us venture to walk along the shore untill se wil find a place to cross.Only let us be "ary."

Asthey moved along, they looked well to the steps untill they came in sight of a large forry boat tied to the shore. This they took, and they had no sooner got across, when they halted for a few minutes of rest. Then the army went on again and Angeline Reste to And Angeline lione said to Starring;

"Had I as good ground to hope for a grand success in our mission, I believe no ammount of exciting adventures would discourage, me."

"Well" said StarringQ" ou know your own part of the countrys misery, and I know mine, and my cod girl scout, we curselves shall have enough evil before we come at our journeys end. For how can it ever be imagined, that people like the wicked, Clundelinians that design to attatch such ureafful horrors upon a country, as they have access, can always get away with it. And we was are on adventures cannot but full to meet with what fears and scares, with what troubles and difficulties and afflictions that can possibly come upon us, and how to we know we may not be associted by glandelinians also."

After two hours of thus traveling, they all reached the town. Wen they hat halted near the surfurbs the officers bett betook themselves to a short debate about how with y must they must find the easiest and shortest route to the region of abbiesan, and what should be done when they came in first sight of the new so called Lake Abbiesans; of it was conl concluded, since Starring was a good professional spy, that he should direct the column through when they got there, and therefore they discided decided to speak to him about it as soon as possible. They sarted started for the town slowly .Starring and the two girl scouts thanselves were greatly tumbled up and down in their minds, and knew not that to do themselves. Back out they durat not for fear of failure, go back the way they came to continue on the advanture by themselves they also durst not, for fear the Calverinian leader should capy them

"Let not you two Christian leaders be offended with me, for that _ have to come up to speak to you, as it is very important." "Starring looked at the man, and then said;

"Where from did you come, and what is it that you would have?"

"The can answered;

"I'm the Mayor of this city, and . know where you and your force did come, specially especially from whence you did come, and I know that hundreds of others have been on the same errand as you to wit, to be, if it shall please you and the rest, I will graciously admit you all into the town, and direct you after you have ben been intertained by the rural route tward the road leading tward Abbieunn, a railroad that had been operating and now reparie repari repaired, and I tall you once again that I am the city's mayor, and I have been informed of you by a telegraph from Emperor Hanson wivian," and he showed starring the telegram.

With that Sy Starring did narvel saying;

"That is my doing broadcasted. Yes he said I accept your invitation but please keep this information from the enemy."

Then the Mayor remounted his horse, and led the way, and said also;

"Let 's hope sir by Gods help you'll be auccessful in your efforts. Thousands have recently tried what you are doing and did not succeed."

As he proceeded on, he called a ps policeman to lead the way and keep the street clear as an admiring erord was gathering, and he obeyed many other police also keeping the croads in place o on the sidewalk, and a ban now accompanied the Calverinians, and filled the air with melodious notes.

For Jonnie Turmer herself was almost trembling and crying, for fear that the disasters that she know of would sooner ot later be fatal for the country because of the impossibilities of aid coming to the suffe rers. But when gtarring had no suddenly recieved admittance for the whole party into the town, then she began to take more heart, and prayed often that our Blessed Lord would make direct intercession for Calverinia, and her devastated sister states. and she said as she rede or alongoide to starring;

"Your excelency I have a hinch of mine that the series of disasters will make a fatul one from their results, and that makes me much dejected in mind, for I sometimes think that nothing will bear fruit even from our adventure. Yet sometimes I am very impatient, to be near the scenes of Abbieann again, for I was one of the witnesses of the early part of the disaster, for each minte during the first horror was as long to me an as an hour, thile Heaven alone presume prevented me from perishing with my compaions who also escaped in the ensueing flood, though the roar of the flood was so loud, that it made us all scared.

"You as one of or girl guides" must keep good heart." said the Calverinian leader himself. "Where we is that little black haired friend you met in that city before the flood. 'Is she among the lost!"

"No sir" she escaped with us fortunately." "you did she manage to escape wi with you. #?

"The accompanied us. We were in her home at the time of the first explosion shock. She is often with the Vivian Girls now. At the first shock , felt so faint I could have almost swooned, I felt as if the very life was shaken out of me by the concussion. But when my soul fainted within me remembered our Blessed Lord and my r prayer came in unto Him."

"that part of Abbieann did you come from when you escaped from the flood .. "???

"From the q eastern part sir. I came for or from that unto which section the flood did not come so sudden."

"Did any of the other girl friends desired thee to come with them to that disaster

"Yes" said ennie, and as any one may know we all had a trying experience. I have continually briayed for all those that have been victims of such an awful disaster which dis destroyed the city. If and if there is any grace or forgiveness for sins I beseached Him that I may see clandelinia brought either to reason, or be punished which ever way He desires test. For my being in the city itself, I did go, even though , was never n invited, as my friends were. They were invited by the Mayor of the city,, and my invitation was from them, wherefore at first I feared I would presume. They coaxed me and I did go then I at first refused. Gertrud & took me by the hand, end led me on. And so I did go. But I never could think, not even believe that so glorious a city, like Abbisann, rould be like shecis i like she is now."

The whole parts now was brought into the lar e yard of the Mayors home, where they were recieved by the Mayors wife, and two grown sons, who praised the whole force highly for the purpose of their mission. Then said Starring t to the Mayor; "We are highly sorry, as sorry for Calverinia and her affliction as a Saint would be for his sins, and beg of you good advise, and information what me must do to gain a easy and quick route to Abbieum, or its locality." "I will pant t grant the permit to have passage, free passage on the vailroad I will toll you" or you may succeed in your mission, probably by word and dead, by word in the promish of doing your work right well, by deed in the way you may obtain the information you are looking for Take good arms with you though as you'll need then. "He spoke many good words to them in advice advice, whereby they were greatly elated. He also led them to the top of the roof of a tall building and showed them by route they should take to reach the only open railroud, the famous Mic Hollester and Pandora or Abbieannia, Bondial, and Calvering as it is it also called, and told them elearly that that sight they would have again as they continued along in the way, to their comfort."

So he left them q awhile on the roof, where they entered into talk & by themselves. And Angeline michee hercelf thus began-

"Oh dear Bl essed Lord, how glad I am that we have get this far already." "So you may well say" said Tadeliffe, "but I of all have cause to leap for joy-

It is a splendid, exciting and interesting adventure."

"I thought for one time" said Angoline Richee "As I stood in one o' of the streets in Abbieann, than when I saw such a beautiful city, and now think of what happonee, that all the labor of the nation had been lost, erecially then that ugly flood made such a heavy overwhelming rush up n upon the city .. "

"But my worse fears" said Jennie Turmer was after I saw that the flood had destroyed a good part of the city before we were out of it, and that we were in danger of perishing with it. Now thought I then" when watching the progress of the destruction "It is fullfilled what is written" when the water s are let loose the land shall mourn. The one population shall be taken away, and the other left unboarably miserable." I had much ado t forbear crying out when I saw the buildings co before the waters " Calverine is undone. Calverinia too is undoe undone. Wee to the nation. And I was afraid to even see an any more, bt when we were on that float in the river and we saw the flood bearing down upon as suidenly, I thought also we wire were lost. I connot tell, yet how we escaped, for in that dangerous flood it was a struggle betwix life and death."

"Can you not tell how you did escape" asked Rudcliffe. "I am sure your prayers for delibe deliverance were so earnest, that the very sound of them may have started the whole of heaven. You know an escape like you and the other girls had was sort oa of a miracle. I never heard of such an adventure all my life. You and your girl followers surviving through a flood horror, that took the whole nation by storm."

"Alas" said Jennie, to be in my case it would be impossible, how could I tell how we so resdily escaped. We saw the water rush on us like a tremendous tidal wave down the river, and that we were helpless on a wreckage float. Yet we escaped across in time. Yet who I say was so fainted hearted as I at that moment, that I i wity with the rest would not strive to escape as we did. But pray, what said Violet, and her sisters about our escape Wore they surprised."

"Thy I should say they were, to even hear of you being there. Yet I believed your escaped pleased them well enough, for they h showed no sign to the contrary. But I marvel in my heart that you and your followers had the opportunity for such a tremendous adventure. Had I known that before, I fear I should not have had heart enough to even think of venturing myself in thiscmanner. But you you went through it, and you are out safe and sound, and I am glad with all my heart heart.

"I think , will ask, this general gaunders of the Calverinians if you please when he comes to interview us again, why he went to view the scenes of the horrors of Abbisann. Maybe he did so to try and discover something also which would help our armies to get exicted excited enough to drive such a filthy cur as Glandelinia out of calverinia. I hope he will not take it amiss?" "Aye do" said Radcliffe" if we could only find out who were responsible for the disasters a and hang the guilty ones it would bechetter." It was not so long after, when this Calverinian general came into the yard, and Angeline pichee rode up to him for she still was mounted,, and said,,. "I would like to ask if it does not offend you for the question, wherefor did you go forth to look over the scenes of Abbieann and the surrounding country at the sint of whoch which many forigners are ready to fly for fear?"

"Well" began general Saunders"That was a particular mission of mine, I still have another section of my force, there that has another commander, he is also kept in close contact with all investigators we know, only my force here you see returned purposely to look for you, and Starring and his followers, to get them to come as we are doing this work for you at the request of , iolet, and her sisters. Another company is going to come along with us, they are getting ready in the camp which you see there at a distance, and they will soon march up here. The situation of course at Abbieann has frightened many a brave and honest forlegne tourist from worse to better from the awful scenes he has witnessed, and by the great voice of the roaring waters. Indeed those who made the disasters did not do it of any good will to our country or our Blessed Lord, but with the inent intent probably to keep the Calverinians from being able to open the routes to which our armies can use to go against the Glandelinian armies, and that the horrors of the disasters may also make the armies afraid to proceed anywhere through Calverinia for fear of being wiped out by a like disaster. The government tries to give the unfortunates timely help, so that Calverinia is not d delivered up to glandelinia's power to do to the helpless refugees what her devilish nature would prompt her to.My dear girl I to trow, had you known beforehand, you would not be worrying of these disasters. It will bringevery nation on our side, which is already happening, and therefore shall a nation like wicked Glandelinia invading the provinces of Calverinia, whose disaster making will yet surely turn to the prof profit of our nation, i keep armies from moving against manley and his generals. That cannot be done as is already being proved. The government in short time will deliver Calverinia from Ca glandelinia. their darling state from the power of such a sicked bullish country as glandelinia."

"I confess my ignorance" said Angeline Riches, I did not understand properly when I questioned you, but we can in time ; know do all things well."

Then Jennie Turmer began talking of their journey, as the otherdivision from the camp in the cityo square had arived go within another hour the whole command was marching in parade down the street, being on the way, a bund following and playing lively tumes. The weather was not and sultry, there was enew no sunshine and this was aken taken for granted of so much smoke from distant forest fires.

Now there was in the western outskirts of the town, in the way they were to go a orchard, and that orchard was city property. Many of the fruit trees that grew in that archard shot their branches over the streett, and being permitted to, by the one in charge of the orchard, they all gathered up what they could for to eat on the way. The two girls, and Radeliffe were pleased with the trees trees and with the fruit that hang from the branches, and they also helpled themselves and hegan to est.

wije Time passed , and they continued on their way. No one did know what they were going to meet against on their way, or otherwise the whole column would have stayed together a wand would not have seperated. Starring and his own force was some distance, ahead, and as a change of luck would have it, the Calverinians were some distance behird, the two girls, and adoliffe with them. The former column had not gone but about five hundred yards, when the formost men being in the advance espied coming tward them on horseback, a large party of men, dressed queerly in similiar form of the "Ameria American KU.Klux, Klan but of strange gray uniforms.

with that, two of the men, raced back to warn Starring, who sent a messager back to harry on the rest. Not knowing who the party were, the men unslung their shoulder repeating rifles, and Starrings whole force met together, and formed a barricade on the road. Then some others came down to meet them, and Angeline Richae riding up" said to some of her followers "Stand back, do not go too far, but deploy to the rightres you should. The men in the distance seeing the array before thes. non naited, and Starring taking out his field glasses took a good look at them from a distance. At that moment Jennie nurmer and Radeliffe, waxing very wroth at the sudden delay in their advance, came riding up. Jennie suid to Starring"While the rest of the force remain behind why not you go forward a little way and engage the leader of the strange men in conversation, and see who tney are before there may be a fight."

Starring decided to do so. With Her advide he and the Calverinian ceneral rode forward carrying two standards. St arring then asked in a loud tone who they were, and he recieved an unswer that surprised him;

"We are the well known Cargoylian Kurds of landelinia, and knowing who you and your followers are, we make no assault upon you for no other procee but to to prevent your progress this way. I have come out however to tell you that if you will but grant one small request which we shall ask we will go back peacefully and not start a fight."

"That is that request?" demanded Starring. He however imagined what the leader might mean, but he wanted to be sure...lle recieved answer;

"Btand back, or go peaceubly back to t your camps where you came from and leave off from your expedition to Abbieunn. Stund back a und be gone, for we have no secrets of that country to lose to you and your followers, and therefore if you refuse we'll do buttle."

"Sturring answered:

"We will neither hear, nor regard, nor seild to anat you shall ask. We are even in harte--carrot stuy, our besiness in a business of life and death. If you do thet give any or open combs we'll attack with ourselves, as I am willing for a hood be ap a 1 , don't seem so be.

"If you love a conflict then go to it." said the Cargoylian leader. "We intend no opposition to you enless you refuse our pe e petition. The mother thing also we Clandelinians would have."

"Ay" quoted, Starring, you would have me abandon my expedition altogether, for I know for opposition against my movement you have come, but we all will rather fight to the death on the spot than suffer wreelves to go back and and abandon gan expedition because you say so. Stand back yourselves and give us an open road or I'll order my whole force to charge."

"No" was the answer.

"Starring rode back to his command. At Starrings advi ce the to girls shrieked out to the others to come forward, and the whole rushed forward to attack the Cargoy Lians, who stood firm with the design to prevail against the Calveringan s but as brave and as fierce as they were, they saw themselves greatly outnumbered and the onrushing Calverinians without a single loss to a man swept all before them lining the road with dead and wounded Gargoylians and horses.

The others also came up to join in the fray, and knowing that Carroylians had appeared; they made haste to join in the fray, but as they come up a portion of the cargo Gargoylian column had ralled rallied, and the two parties were in a great ac ffle. At the coming of more Calverinions, the Claudelinians made their escape over a hill fringed with thick woods, and there threatened to make a stand. A percuit was started for Starring wished to take them prisoners but they did also make their escupe through these roods, and disappeared so deep in the forest that they could not be located. Then Starring rode up to Angeline ,ichee the had followed closely to watch the f fray, and asked them how they enjoyed the fighting. "Ene unswered:

"I thank you very much, only we have been somewhat surprised, but it was it seems easy to worst them."

Bo after a few more words, Starring said;

"I marvelled much that you was almost in the fighting itself. You must have petitioned our Blessed Lord for help, for that may be the reason we avoided trouble and dangers, for He granted us a sure bloodless victory as we lost not a single man, nay not one was even wounded, while the enemy must have lost a hundred."

"Alas " said Angeline" I was so taken with our present blessing, that dangers to come were forgotten by us, besides who could have thought that we would in this wilderness have come in contact with a force of Glandelinians. It may be so that some main glandelinian army is close by Indeed it had been well for us that we had asked our Blessed Lord for help, for it was only to our profit, but I wonder the Cargoy lians did not come with a still bigger force than they had."

"It is not always necessary to go through these kind of adventure adventures lest by doing so, they become of ittle esteem" said Staring"But when nevertheless the want of a thing is usually felt,,, it then comes under, in the eyes of those that feel it,, that estimate that properly is itis due, and so consequently will be thereafter used. Had we been prop prepared accordingly we would not neither so have bewailed that oversight of are, in not acking out for glandelinian enemies, as see we now had occassion to sa do. So all things generally work for good, and tend to make us more warv."

"Shall we go back to the town again, and get o some more men to join us?" asked Radeliffe."

"I don't think it is necessary" said the Calverinian leader. "For in all places where we will be going, you will find no more danger as long as our force i is reliable, for in every portion og this region, there is sufficient troops to be found to furnish us against all attacks whatsoever. But I will go back and ask for more help, for it is a poor thing that is not worth asking for .. "

A NUMBER OF BUILDINGE ALVESTURES WILLE ON THE WAY FOR THE REGION.

With he had thus snoken the calverinian general, tward back for the town, and the remainder weited for a time untill he should return, and when he returned with the reinforcement the whole column went on its way. Then said Angeline Riches to Jennie Turmer 11:11

"that A sudden blank to here. I made account 'we had now been pasta 11 danger and that we would be all right and neversee thrilling accounts more since we apparently had outdistanced the raging forestfires."

"It might be our innocency on that matter." said Jennie murmer to Angeline."that might es excuse us all, but as for me my fault is so much the greater, for that I saw this danger of the approaching dargovilans from a long distance, before we met even the camp of the Calverinians, and yet aid not provide for it or even report our find. I am therefore much to be blemed."

"How aid you know this befr before we came in with the calveringang Pray tell

"I will tell you easily enough, pefore we set out for the comp , from some high righ rise of grounf, saw a trace of these gargoyllens. But of course I did not think they knew of our intention or that they wouldn'try to block our way. This you know ug ought to have made me take heed, and warned the rest of us. But _ had forgotten formotten all about them."

"Wall" by this neglect we have an occassion ministered unto us to behold our own imperfections, so our Lord anyway came to our help. For knowing our parit he has follow followed us with , is unasked kindness, and has delivered us from their is power and their intention to stop our work has been frustrated. "

Thus no w (cow) when they had talked away a little more time, they draw night nigh to a another small town that stood in the way, a town occupied m stly by forest rangers and their wives and families as you may as you may find fully related in the first part of these records of starrings adventures. So they draw on tward the town, When they were about to enter the villiage they came non a upon a group of people, and they everheard a great and exiciting conversation among them. They listened carefully as they approached, and heard as they thought Starring, and others mantioned by asme, for some reason or other, as the reader may know there went along, even before them, a talk of starring and his followers going on this marvelous and ateresting adventure, and this thing was the more pleasing to the town folk, for they had heard that starring was a Professional Christian apy-the apy and coldier who it is generally said most glandelinians who know him are so unwitting to meet in open fight. Thus therefore the column salted as Starring heard the good people of the town commanding him, who they little thought was almost in their very midst. At last starring rode up to the crowd end the leading man said as he salured;

"Good evening general. With whom would you speak with in this crowd."

"Answered Blar n Starring;

"We understand that this is a town for ranger s and their families, and we have just arived to this villings on a bag tour, wherefore we pray that we may be partakers of your villiage for the night being, for the day as you know now is very far apent. and in such a forest we are very loathe to night go to go any further."

"Pray, sir, whey the gray uniforms of you and your followers, and by what may

I call your name, that , may convey it to the Mayor of the town."
"I am general writer Starring. These are my followers. I have come all the way from general General Aviana lines. These girl scouts are also my companions. The troop of Calverinians are my escort, and are leading me on to have a chance my self to incestigate the regions of the devastated Appleann city and other places.

This man ran back to the crowd, and said to all those gathered,,,

"Can you think who is the leader of that big force of soldiers and others come to the town just now?"

"They all looked and he went on,

"They are General Waiter Starring, and their troop, all waiting for loding and entertainment here."

Then the whole crowd leaped for joy. A tall stately doking man came forward and looking at Starring said!

"Are you general Starring that traveled all the way fro from general , ivians odmp† " "I am that very man. I first started out on my journey alone, but now this is my force force, and am now convince ed no way is right husbut this."

"Then for the good of our cause is to be fullfilled , hope, that which is also written of the country, that suffered from war after war and yer never lost, and for which the enemies finally repented."

"Bo be it amone said starring. O"God may make it a true saying for Angelinia and her cause, and grant that , may succeed in finding what . have been cent for and not fail, for in her cause cause Abbicumnia is spotless and plaine planeless." "nut why remain out in the street sir. Come forward and share the town hall with us during your stay, we was talking of you and your followers but now, for tiding tidings have become to up a few days before how you had set out on this aventure with your followers. come into our bit big town hall. C .: Come in."

And he led them all to an imponso long building, and when they were withinthey were bidden to sit down, and rost themmolves, and while they all conted themselves those that attended us upon starring and his followers, came into the great hall to see them. After a while became supper was not ready, the Mayor of the town himselv came to see them. hildren of the town came to look in upon the adventurors , and they all smiled for Joy that they had such daring friends in their midst. The Mayor himself took starring, and the two girlscouts and Radoliffo, nit into his significent rooms, and showed them some thin a to remember. Here therefore they saw magazines telling of the flood and explosion disactors, saw photographs of the devestated section s of Calverinia. This done a and after these things had been pendered upon by granning and his three companions, the Mayor takes them apart aga gazain and brought them into a room, where there was a man sitting by a round table who was engrossed in a map, and even at their entrance he did not look up, but continued to write fariously with a pon. There also stood another and at his rist right side, with a bondle of envelopes in his hand, but for a time the man who was writing did not look o up or regard, but continued his furious writing.

Then said it starring;;;;""

"I somewhat know the meaning of this:

"This man is busy on comothing extremely important. Is it not good oir," ?., L "You are perfectly right" said the Hayor. "He is busy writing a report to the Abbicannian government on the discovery of the rains of the cly city of Abbicann of which he had observed. And as you see him rather give hand to try your own lo luck at discoveries when you arive there, for it is believed by many that such a diseaster is only a dream, a fable, and that such a thing never happened and that it i is only exaggarated reports. Now as it is also showed you that this man is too busy just now to be disturbed, it is to lot thee knew that he was successful in his investigations, and he is quite count do wow by his work. When his report is finished he will send it on to the Government."

"But" said starring" his work also shows his own part of the mind .. And where you see him rather give heed to continue his work in uninterrupted, than to what any one else might expect of him, it is to show that the situation of Calverinia from the disasters, is but a terror to some, and a probable fable to others, and that things that the enemy can and would do are counted only as thi ngs much to be exagrerated. Now whereas it was also showed me that while so busy the man would not look either up and down, it is to let me know that he is so engreesed in his work, that his heart is quite carried away fr m from everything else but his work for his countrys selec."

Then Angoline Richar said;

"Oh deliver calverinia from future disasters of my Bloomed Lord." "That prayer" said the mayor "Will I hope be answered soon. "Give Calverinia a better show is the prayer to day of tens and tens of millions..... Herugges and now nomes are the great things now looked for " """ with that Amerine Richee and Jennie murmer wept and suid;,;

"It you seems to be in vain."""

When the Mayor had showed them this for experiment ne led them into the very best room on the hall, and hig them look around at the pictures, and see if they coulf could find anything profitable there that would would help them in the cayse cause. Then they looked at the pictures, going round the room, but there was nothing there to be seen but pictures and photographs of the disaster scenes, and of refusees, and yet they overlooked nothing. Then said K Jennie;

"Sir I see nothing but pictures of devastation." But Angelink Angeline gichees held her peace.

But said the Mayor.

"Look again, and closer .. "

They therefore looked again, and said:

"Here is nothing but a small map with a design as of a spider in the center." "Is ty there but me spider in the country in the map?" Then the water stood in Jennie's eyes, for she was a little girl quick of apprehension, and she said ... "Yes sir, there is here more than two, yea and di designs of spiders whose wenom is far are destructive than that which is in a Tarantula. Those spinders on the map are Clandelinia, and her armies in Cal v Calverinia.... ""

The Mayor then looked pleasantly upon her, and said;

"You have told the truth."

This made Jennie blush, and Angeline to cover her face, for they all began now to understand the riddle.

"Then said the Mayor., "Clandelinia tries to take hold of Calverinia, with her bloody hands as you see-and is now devastating the land with fire flood and explosions to gain her ends. And wherefore is this recorded, but you must know that is is to show you. that no matter how full of vonom of wickedness Clandelinia may be, you our own country can by the hand of faith, and trust in god lay hold of Glandelinia and throw her out in due time."

"I thought" said Angeline Richee " of something like this, but I could not imagine it all. I thought that Clandelinia and her wicked armies could be compared to wicked spiders, and that she And the armies could be compared to ugly creatures, but but that by this terrible, venemous and ill favoroured creature, we were ourselves to learn how to assume faith in god to help our country bring clandelinia to a fall some time to come, yet for a time untill now that did not come to my mind...and Yet alandelinia ha taken hold of Calverinia with her bloody hands as 7 see by the may and dwells in the best o part of the beautiful country. Glendelinia it seems has not made the disaster horrors in vain."

Jennie and Angeline looked upon one another and then bowed before the Mayor. After this he led them into a smaller room where there was a number of children playing playing, and bid them observe a while. Soone some of the children went to the window to look out.

"See" said the Mayor, " these children, how innocent they are and what they do, and learn what could happen to thom any time because of such foul o enemies as the Glandelinians are. Observe and dok look see what they do now."

So they gave heed, and observed that the children took time to say their prayers when called for supper.

"Now" said the Mayor "Compare, these children, supposing they were your own. "Think well how you would feel if they were victime of flood" .. "

"And sir, said Angeline Richee," Pray let us see a little more." "So he led them into another room, where there was a picture of our nord hanging upon the _ross. "Then said he;

"You must learn of our Lord to suffer for his sake, just as we Calverinians put up wrongs without murmurunigs and c9 complaint c complaints even when wicked Glandelinia devastates us. Behold how quietly He had taken his His most cruel death at the hands of is wicked enemies, and without objecting e suffereth them to nail Him to the Cross. We claim Glandelinia done to Him what she has done to calverinia."

"After that he led them into a beautiful garden, where grew a great variety of flowers. And he asked; "Do you see all these!"

"Yes." said the girls.

"Then said he ugain: Behold those beautiful flowers are unusually b divers in stature, in quality color and smoll and virtue, and mm many are better than others. But think if the enemy came here and saw them, he would devastate them."

Then as they were coming in from the flower garden, he led them into a field which he had sowed with wheat corn and grain and other crosp, and he said; "Thisground was dung,ed and ploughed and sowed, but what would the enemy do with the crop." "Then said -ennie;

"The enemy would destroy it."

"Yes, the enemy would" said the Mayor as he led them on tward his house again. "We went to beware that the enemy do not cause a terrible famine in our land." "Yes, said Angeline ichoe."Glandelinia is am an emblem very apt to set forth before the world of her menance, for to sight Glandelinia as as dangerous as a fabled dragon, horrible of features,, color and carriage, the wicked country like the dragon seem also to have a very great love for disasters and fires, and to goble up her victime, and above all other to acc associate with and be in com pany with other dragons as wicked as herself, if only she can seize all cou good countries and pt them uner her power. Glandelinia pretends also that she is to take charge of goodly things, but when she is by herself as the snake, she can catch up and gobble up christian people, she can change her diet,, drink the worse of iniquity, and swallow down the blood of her victims like wine."

They had not entered the big hall again, and as supper was not ready, Jennie and Starring again desired that the Hayor would either show or tell of some other things of profit for the adventure."

Then the , Mayor said it; The ware devastations clandelinia causes, the more she assires to make to gain her wicked end, therefore she in more o prone to evil. The more stronger she

she is the more gamesomely she goes forth to try and conquer the christian cal cause. and the mo. more ammunition she has the more she'll blow us up. There is a desire in the Glandelinian Government to conquer the world itself, and it is a comely thing to be thought of, when in god's sight that in her cause is a world breaking crime. Tis easier said than done, is custor for one to say he, 11 de this and he 14 ue that, than to held out as he she la in the end livery cuitian of a great ship in a hurricane will willingly cust everbourd what endangers his ship. But he does not throwcout the best first. One lik leak will sink a ship, one blunder in your expedition will destroy our cause as sure as a mortal sin will destroy the sinner who suddenly died without repentance.

The provers is that those that makes disasters upon others will suffer disasters unto themselves. The nation that wars in unfairness, and looks for success is like the man who lives in mortal sin, and looks for han incan hereafter, and yet sows cocke cockle, and thinks to fill his parn with wheat or party... Such disasters proves that Clandelinia wicked as she is cannot be trifled with, and therefore proves the effects of sin in the world. If Landelinia loves disaster, aking, and aces not live well, then at also disaster will always be her company maker. If the world which God sets light by, is counted a thing of that worth with men, then why leave clandelinia to possess it if she cannot or will not amend .? wery nation is crying against the doing of clandelinia, but who is there among the nations affected with the goodness of God who takes her part!None! Nowadays our people seldon set down to eat, that disaster of some kind does not stalk us as prey, and there has been and is more disaster horror than the whole world has need to

when the Mayor had finished speaking, he led them out into his big garden again and led them to a line of treus, one of which was rotten and destroyed inside, yet it grew and had lots of leaves and whole and entire branches. Then asked gertrude

"this tree" said he whose outside is fair, and which yet is or rotten inside, it s is to which many may be compared that are the suffering in the garden of god, who like Calverinia suffer for Him, and despite of thier misory speak of God and His Heavely host with their full heart, and in behalf of him Him, whose leaves despite their suffering and ass loss are fair, and their hearts are almost like His, and wish the davil to be tinder boxes for the flame."

About ten minutes later supper was r ady, the table being aproad for gtarring and his whole force, and every thing placed that every body likes to east. So they seated themselver, selves said ther grace before meals. And the Mayor to be more good did un usually entertain those that lodged with him with hymns and music and speeches at meals, so the band came and played ... hen the supper, songs and music had ended, the Mayor asked Starring, what it was that at first aid move him to start out on the mission to discover why the enemy made all the disasters so listed since October 1912.

Starring after some ponder on the aubject unewered;

"It was no invitation of mine. But I il tell how it ha, ened. First, Violet and her sisters tried to do it, and failed, the loss of their efforts came into my mind, at which , heartly grieved grieved, but al that was natural affection. Then after tha for several weeks came the news of so many series of other disasters following closely upon one another, and lke a churl . I revited the Glandelinians for it. The guilt of Glandelinia and the horrors of the scenes I heard of and read of came to my mind, I dreamed of the horrors time and again, and finally one day I was talking of it kind of excitedly t excitedly to my own officers unconsciously in front of The Vivian Girls who overhard me. "You are just the man we wished to see" said the girls and they then beseached me to try it myself telling me of their plans to try too. I went after I recieved a report from some source that they did not win. The horrors of the disasters, and the result they might bring in the future if they continued forced me to this way."

"But met you with no opposition before you set out. ?" "Not right away. I was able to go about nearly fifty miles, untill I came to a stream. Here I was shot at from ambush. Many of my officers fearing for my safty had pried to persaud me not to undertake it, every ne urged me, and tried to do what they could to dishearten me to it, the hardships, perils and troubles, I may mest with in the way, but all this , went through so far and got over pretty well.

Of course If I knew the future and knew my mission would be of no avail, I really would give it up now. Many have tried to make me miscarry in my journey, some of the forest fires have troubled me and my followers much, yet it still runs in my mind, and makes me afraid of every glow I see lest a forest fire should surprise me and my whole force and do us a at of mischief, and to turn me out of my way or force me to alter my course. Yes y tel you sir, though I would not have every body know it, that between this to n and another smaller one, we w r were halted by a column of Gargoylian Kurds, but we were the better in the fray, and fortunately came off without a single loss though the fighting was hot."

"Your beginning's is good" said the Mayor, thy latter end should greatly increase. But you'll be soon in enemy territory I'll warn for for all of the Abbieann flood region is possessed by the foe now and many armies abound there which are fierce and more dangerous than a flock of big Blengiglosmean creatures are to the enemy, so be on your watch."

Then he addressed himself to Radcliffe himself and said to him: "And what myed you my boy to follow the general."

"The Vivian Girls had me do so sir."

"I see. And you Angeline. why did you do it?"

"Tryl Truly sir, my want of experience in answering such questions makes me surprised to have to answer, but it is the same reason. I know the whole country of Calverinia as I do my AN A.B. & C'c and therefore I was asked by Violet and her sisters to accompany him and be his guide. When the forest fire hit general Manleys camp and frustrated our work, and drove us out for dear life, we took a short cut, and here Violet and her sisters knowing you have also gone Now speaking for a moment to starring," suggested I and Jennie follow you and Radcliffe too, Gertrude Angeline coming to meet us before we reach Abbieann. Violet said she met not sent us sir to go to aid starring as his journey at the sarlest part near the forest would be dangerous and then they told us how to take the route to. find him. We had a hard time to locate him, as hard as if we did not know the country for though we could follow his tracks the forest fires frustrated our eversmove to find and join. We could not get through anywhere. I sent Radcliffe occassioanly occassionally forward to scout, and then he would only return and say though he too located horse prints in the reads and trails, yet a forest fire was coming and we would have to beat a hasty retreat. Now ' thought, while he was telling these things to me, my heart burned within mo, and , said in my neart if this be true , we will be competted to leave off our hunt, and will have to go neck to netter playes places, so reasked padeliffe further of the truth of these things, and asked him if we should return to the lines and give up the hunt, for T thought I saw no hope of finding starring and his friends, but he refused to give up, he being of a kind that nevers gives up in anything, he is stubborn at that and des perate too. So I continued on with a heavy heart, when suddenly we came upon Starring and his followers unawares. Thile we were on the search for him, he had found us."

"Your setting at was good, for you have given credict to the good, "ASaid the Mayor. "You are a good girl scort who did for the love of Country and God leave the s safty of camp and army to come out, and go with a force of scouts on the most risky of missions. The Lord recompense your work, and a full reward be given you of the Lord god of Israel, and aid you to help Starring succeed in his worthy mission."

It took half an hour before supper was ended, and then preparations were made for bed, the little girls going to their own quarters, and the boys and men and officer officers by themselves. Now & when the tow girls were in hed they could not sleeged sleep for joy, for now that her doubts as to the outcome of the mission was ended,, they therefore lay blessing and praising God, who had such favor for her and her then the u sum rose in the morning of the gloaming, they arose, and prepared for their departure, but nevertheless loathing to have them go so soon, the mayor desired for them to remain for a little while longer, for he said to them;;;

"It is best for you to go in better position. "Then he said to one of his servents-"Lead them to Bredring creeek, and there allow them all to swim to their hearts content, so they can therefore be clean from the soil which they all have gathered by long and hard traveling.....

The servent therefore led them, tward the large creek outside the little town, and told them what the mayor had said. They were indeed glad of the opportunity, and they surely went in and washed to their hearts content, having lots of fun in the waterrr water, they and gthe children and all, and when they came out of that most,,, glorious swimming not only sweet and cleannn, but also much enlivened and and strengthened in their joints, but they looked better a good deal, then when they first entered the town,. When they returned out of the woods back into the town, Stu rring thought to himself when he looked upon the girl scouts"Fair as the angels" They were then again interviewed by the Mayor, he said to the servent .-

"Go into the vestry, and fetch out proper garments and disguises for these advent

and he venting in, and fetched out all kinds of clothing, civilian and other more like those worn by glandelinians than anything else, and they all took their choice and put on what they found fitted to a T. The girls choosed to retain what they had but Radeliffe and penred put on something new and funnier. When they were all thus adorned, they seemed to be a surprise and u j ke to one another. for some even were dressed like strange clowns. The child scouts also stood to amuzed to see into what fushion all their comrades were brought.. As they were then all ready to continue on their journey, Starring and the Calverinian general went before them, the girls also being in the lead, and the Mayor said " God speed." All who followed for a little distance in the town, crowds of people, followed and cried out all sorts of good wishes.

Now they continued on, and as before Starring and the Calverinian general was before them, and after traveling several hours they came to a large glen. Here then they made a pause, to rest and bless God. "How" said Angeline Richee"It suddenly comes to my mind, what was once said to us when we first started outto wit, that when we come closer to the region of Mullen town near Bengal County, that we should be more on our guard. What we should guard against of that I know and suspect something, but what else we should meet with we do not know. I sopp suppose general Francis I suppose you know whereof if you please, glet us hear your discourse thereof."

"The general looked at her and said;
"Main thing to be is watchful, for if we are watchful success can be obtained by come one for another, that had need of success thereof, not by the persons doing nothing however,, but in the way for another, in which he rightfully has obtained it. So then to speak, to the question more at large, the success that you and the others with you including all those who may help you in the future and the girl scouts also would have attained would be onlt obtained by the help of god , to wit, by Him that died for all of us, and if we all have faith in wim He will obtain it in even a double way He can do anything to cover you and us during worthy adventures, even though He spilt blood for the saving of all sinners, including Glandelinians also.

"For a moment Jennie pondered, and then she said; "But suppose He does not see that the petitions for our success would be worthy, h what will He do then?"

"That is almost a doubting question." said the general reproachfully. "Anyway we ourselves should know whether a petition is worthy or not, our conscious should warn and tell us that. To pre pray for something not worthy is a sin. He has more right to grant what He might see fit for, even more than you expect or have need of, or that He sees a person needs. Its Up to Him to do the granting as is best for any one petitioning for anything he or she desires."

"Row car. any one make that appear" asked Angeline Richese. "ith all my heart, but first I must premise, that He of whom we spoke of this moment: knows what is best for all of us, and if any prayer is a worthy one it cannot go ununswered. is we know the great disasters have two natures, one flood, the other explosion, both plain to be distinguished, also also to devide. Yet without a true cause and responsibility know, they are something which it is impossible to stop the enemy from doing into each of these kind of disasters, a strange mystery belongs, and each mystery is absolutely essential to their natures so that one may easily cause as it seems nature to almost be exte extinct, the other can devastate the whole land. Of these unusual disasters therefore not only Calverinia but her sister states are made partakers therefor so as that they or any of them shouldto looked into before they and their nature are again sent upon us, or otherwise probably they'll come as far as Abbieannia yet. Besides these there is a disaster which is however only one. And this is not only the unusual forest fires as distinguished from flood horrors, nor the flood terror as distinguished from the forest fire, but a 3 series of disaster horrors which seem about to come combine in the nature of many into one at one time, and may properly be called the complication of Record breaking disasters of a warfare beyond comprehension that is essential to capacity of dominating Calverinia and her sister states. If for instance these big forest horrors would part into several it could orphably part into worse disaster for our states wherein they retaining into one stretch does not therefore spread beyond measure as yet, if the forest fires parts into a score of di d different once, they could gradually form as many big ones that wou would destroy the forest lands of the whole state. The disaster storm has therefore another Student of its own which make their their own performance, or drama beyond what any moving picture could rortell, and that is it it puts upon other sections of the forested country, the whole state would be covered by fire." mout without our success in our interprize would the cause of country pe or any avail to us?"

".NO I don't believe so, for the enemy therefore could devastate us into sub mission. These disasters are essential to the success of Glandelinia in her own interprize I'm sure, and it is by their effects and the nature of them that the extent and frequency of them justifies glandelinia for her success, and is for that purpose efficacious. The knowledge of the lay of our land gives capability to the errorts of Landelinia to succeed, and the nature of every kind of disaster that sweeps over land and sea and hill and through the forests gives full prr proof to the results if we fail to do the work for which we are ordained. So t here then here is a nature of the propagle greatest of all disasters so far, and that is of the horrors of Bengall County County, for the calamity is can calamity without parallel, here is a disaster that I wiped out a numbe numer of Liggest cities in our country, for it is a perfect disaster without one acid otage of nature anguagain here is a a nautre of the disaster that he one can explain, its strange force, like a humareu volcanoes, the nature of the ulsaster, which no one knows or, yet is perfectly devastating throughout a good part of the state. Here then too is another nature that the explosions, as force, extent of snock and vioration han no explanation with reference as to the effect, and therefore no one can justify its true cause. Hence it is called the Mystery explosion. This explosion which blusted cities like a volcano did on Matrinque but a hundred of them and in the same fushion with hot cloud and flame has made more devastation byshock resulting flood and force, than anything known since History t started recording the events of the world, for the law only does bind historians to do so much in historical facts and no more, wherefor no one knows why the explosions occured, whether they were actual strange volcanic outbursts from the level plain or with or whether they were explosions caused by the enemy. Now Bengal ha county had two disacters explosion and flood. And thus Starring, Angeline, and Jennie, and the rest of you that are here do the country a good deed by making this effort to learn whether the enemy did it no or not, but it was my idea that since you starring are a good investigator and a famous scientist, you should first for facts learn whether it was a convulsion of nature of explosions committed by the enemy. With repeated potitions for help from heaven God will lead you to the true facts, for it is frequently disputed that the disasters are natural and not from the enemy himself.

But again to in order to gain success for the interprize, there must be something paid to God as a offering or price, as well as something prepared to cover us withal This sin of Glandelinia had delivered her up to the just curse of a righteous law. Now we curselves can be u justified by seeking redress, making Glandelinia pay Abbieannia g a goodly price for all the harm she has done, and this by all she can give up if she wishes to recieve quarter for her transgressions against Culverinia. An Abbicannia also wishes to save the slave children so Glandelinia in price to recieve quarter must surrender all these in general. And in the future also to save herself from destruction she must cover her polluted and feformed and deformed country with righteoueness. But our success comes not without God's help. We must never cease to pray for success."

"This is the best information. Now I see there was something to be learned by our being aided by God in our interprize. So let us labor to keep this in mind, and let us and our followers remember it also. But sir was not this that made other scouts and spies sugcessful in their interprize, and thus do some fo goofd good for the country."

"Yes it was that, no on other means am sure, and therefore gave a proof of the virtue of this that we all are suffered to carry burdens with us if we wished to succeed."

"I thought so" said starring" for though my heart was lightful and joyous before yet it is ten times more lighten lightsome and joyous now. And , am persauded by what I have felt though I have felt but little as we yet that if the most bravest man in the the world was here, and did see and believe as . do now, it would make his heart the more merry and blithe."

"There is only one comfort " said the Calverinian general, and the ease of the burdens of adventures brought to us by the sight and consideration of these but a an endrared affection fr for such adventures. For who in the world can if he does once but think that success comes, not only by his own efforts, but by his faith in the aid from above? """""

"That ess is true" said Jennie," yet it makes my heart bleed to think that all of Calverinia should have to bleed because of the enemy, Oh thou unfortunate State. Calverinia you deserve to have a goodly name in history. You deserve to have the best place in the whole abbieannian Nation, thou hasepuid for the freedom of child slaves a hundred million times more than the best of them are worth .. No marval that the news of thy affliction made the water stand in the eyes of violet, and her sisters,, and which made them so desperate to find out how the enemy did thie, I um personded to wish they had succeeded, but the fires inthe forests have frustrated them.Oh Angeline Richee, that violet, and her sisters and gertrude angeline were here too, yea and mildred Maxwell too. Surely , too they could share goodly in our adventures, nor could no the fear of one or the powerful efforts of the disasters to come, prevail with them to go back to the cames again, untill their mission had been accomplished.

"Vell" said general gammders "T you speak now in the warmpth of your affections, will it, think you, be always thus with you. Besides all the horrors of these disasters has not been net communicated to every nation throughout the worlddd as yet bit, nor to eve y one who would have chanced to see them. There was some who strod by ,and that saw the floods of bbieann run its course over large sections of the country at the start, and yet were so far off, that instead of lamenting, they laughed over it, and instead of coming to the aid of the stricken, did .. harden their hearts against the s the sight of misery. These were _lendelinians.... So you my daughters have a great mission for the sake of your country to perform, R Remember it was told to you, that God will help a worthy cause, , """...

They were still continuing on, untill they were come to a place where there were a number of big trees growing, and behold two men were hanging from the branches. Angeline pichae and the other girls were for a moment horrified, but the Calverinian general said;

"These two men were Glandelinians of bad qualities, they were hanged for attempting to start a forest fire in this locality. You know the penalty in all parts of this country for starting fires is death. They were for starting another . big forest fire themselves, and who ever they could persaude with, they made follow their wicked incendarial ways too, and withal taught them to presume that they should do well at last and succeed by great fires by driving all christian armies out of the country. They were caught in the act of starting a blaze blaze in a gien, and now as we pass by here, we see they are hanged for even the attempt to make a forest fire ... "

"But could they persaude any to be of their opinion .. "

"Said to be successful" said the general They made many follow in their foodsteps. There was a Glandelinian ciz i citizen, that they persunded to help them. They also prevailed with two other men to aid them in their foul o work. Besides they prought up an ill report of the situation in Calverinia, persuading others that the christians made the flood themselves. They also brought p an up an evil report of Calverinia saving the disasters were only exaggerated and were not occuring at all. They also began to viling the christian generals, and to count the very best of them as meed meddlesome, troublesome bus pusybodies, further they would c 11 the call the cause of our country ,as more wicked than that of Glandelinia the comfort of the people of the nation as lazy, the chirs christian Catholic religion of Abbicannia a thing of no purpose.

"May" said Starring"If they were such, they never shall be bewailed by me, They have but what they deserve, and I think it is well that they hang so near the highway, that other glandelinians may see and take warning. But had it not been well if their crimes had been engraved upon some board or iron or bruss, and left here even where they tried to do their mischief, for a caution to other glande! inians. ?"

"so it is as yumight percieve if you will go closer to one of the trees?" "No not ." said Angeline sichee, 1" let them hang, and their names rot, and their crimes live forever against them. I think it is a high favor to the country that they were hunged before they started a blaze or other wise maybe we our selves would not have been able to come hither." Thus they went on till they came at the foot of a high hill. There was a spring close by, and Starring dismounted to secure a drink.

"Lo" said he This spring sometime before I know was clear and good, but now it is dirty and muddy, which we cannot use therefore."

"But Jennie said"How did it be spoiled. It looks like it was done on purpose. ?" "It is probably done because glandelinians are trying to frustrate our progress tward the place we intend to go" said Starring. "But the water will do if it is taken up. and put into a vessel that is sweet and good, for then the dirt will sink to the bottom, and the water come cut by itself more clear."

Thus therefore, Starring and her his friends were compelled to do. They took it up and put it into their canteens, and so let it stand still till the dirt was gone to the bottom, and then they drank thereof. There were two byways that ware at the foot of the hill. After investigating them a little distance Starting came back and salu:

"These are usuagerous paths, and for some reason or other these puths are stop stopped up with chains posts, and a sitch, and yet there are it seems many who will chose to venture on these paths, rather than take the pains to go up thr up the hill s. It is a wonder they can get into these paths without danger of breaking their necks. They will venture yea, if at any time they choose a closer direction, even if rangers do happen to see them, and call unto them, and tell them they are in the wrong way, and do bid them bewere of the danger, but they I suppose do not harken. If you bok a little farther, you may see that these wass are made cautionary enough, not only by these posts, and ditch and chains, but also by being hedged up, yet they will choose to go there." "They are inle, they love not to take pains, uphill ways is most impleasant to thom. So it is fullfilled unto them as it is written" the way of the slothful man is a hedge of thorns. Yet they will rather choose to walk upon a rusre, than to go up this hill, or round fout it on their journey. Generally the shortcat. way leads to danger .. "

Just as they set forward, and began to go up the hill, gtarring spied a sanvedpp thitk ev envelope thick and large lying open the ground.

Starring picked it up and opening it, while the column had halted it read it over and was surprised by its content.

"It(s a long letter" he said written by some one whose name is not on it.But I'll read it aloud so all who are within hearing can observe;

"To Hanson Vivian.

Chief general of Abbieannian and Angelinian Armies.

Your Gracious Excellency;

"I sent in my firm and truthful report of my investigations of the recent horrors at or near Abbieann, State of pattingth M Bengall or County County. I had proviously made a number of visitin visits to the region as far as I was abla to make explorations and was somewhat familiar with its topography and goology. My researches consisted of twenty days study of the County of nengall, from August Ith to the Twentieth incl s inclusive. Most of the time was epent to studying the effects especially the strange physiographic effects of the volcanic eruption like explosions, the nature of the blasts,, t and the sjacts blown up by the explosives, and the procuring of evidence from eye witnesses concerning the facts of the catastrophe, and whether it was a natural phonononom or caused by the enemy. I and my followers traveled most extonsively over the surface and margins of the unusually large area of the distaster by foe foot, on boat, and hotseback and circumseribeat the river shores with boats.

During my stay, I was placed under repeated obligations for courtsies extended by the many refugees I met with In the present article of my statements I have endeavored to present a good statement of the actual events of the greatest of all disasters known. The time has been too limited for me to completely describe and intrepet the data collected. As soon as , am able , shall present some further remarks of my final conclusions on the phenomena in all mazagines , can place such statements in . It is also but just to remark that the accompanying article in this long letter does not pretend to be a complete or final presentation. I will state as follows:

"The Lord rained fire and brime stone, and the emoke of the country went up as of a furnace...From the Bible. This seems with Calverinia. The present year of our unusal war seems to be one also of unusual, disaster and forcet fire horrors. In angeline Vine, Angelinia, Calverinia, Bongall, Mullencatt and even Austemala County Calverinia, and Avyssinkile disturbances of unusual severity, accompanied by great loss of life, flood and expl. explosion and fire horror, while the regions of southeastern Calverinia and contral north Angelinia State are also surfering from disasters of marked violence. Yet it was reserved for two great disaster, that of Lake Sclicia, and Bongall to give us an exhibition of sudden and coadly violence and to awaken a world wide serrow and sym, athy for the sufferers of these disaster phenomena.

As we all know your Excellency, the first news of the flood outbir outburst from the Bengail region to reach the good safe parts of An Abbicantia was a dispatch August Ith from the city of Pandorn, to the Sacremento Journal of Abbicannia State, announcing that Calverinia was being devastated by an unusual flood from an unknown point from the north, a flood begun by an explosion deveral me months earlier, and which within a short time was destroying more cities and towns them any other flood combined, and a report also of a rumor that Abbicann city was hit, and had ontirely disappeared. It was not until July ninth however that the frightful news followed, announcing that the beautiful and large citybof Abbicann with all its inhabitants had been annihilated on the proceeding day of the rices up the lores and abook of a terrific series of volcanic like explosions that blasted towns and cities for miles around like Mt Pole did to St Pierre in the island of partingue.

As horrible as are unusual explosion disasters, they are always exaggerated in the first reports, and the whole nation at first really laughed the news to scorn, saying it was the greatest joke of all ever heard of, and refused and were loathe to believe that a city of eight million inhabat inhabitants had been swept into eterninty i within fifteen minutes as was described, and then the remains of the city, with all the bodies in the ruins being swept away to no one knows by an ensuing flood, gitting in my office where at the time I was preparing a long deferred report upon the nature of floods of the past, to be published by the presses in two cities the news was made known to me by reporter 'he Pandorax Daily Herald, who asked me to give him some information, upon the nature of of explosions of the past, andowhether they were greater than eruptions of volcances or not. From that moment untill I started off for the region to see if the truth was there, I was besieged by all kinds of reportsere and correspondents for information, but I could not give any. I had no information to give.

On Agud August Foist, the officers of the Ceminian Investigation Committee re---quested me to accompany them on the expedition for not only to investigate the region of unusual calemity but also on a relief expedition, which was to sail on the following morning. Being a dangerous trip at first I hesitated, but finlly finally not wishing to be a coward. I after having a years Masses said for me during the meantime joined the river shipp, and on the morning of the thoid was well on down the big Nic Mic-Hollester River, headed for the scene of the disaster We had hardly settled ourselves on board this river man-of war, for we need such a ship because we heard the region or disaster now is in possession of glanuclinia, armi s in many pice places, when we lead to speculate concerning the conditions which we "would find awaiting us when we reached the scenes of Bengall County first. Every where down the course of the river we saw desolution for many miles desolution seeming never to come to an end. Immediately following the news of the unusual catastrophe at Abbieann proper, tward where we were literally heading, the report were full of accounts of many startlin; phenomena. Among t ose these may be mentioned the rumors that the tor of a hill had been leveled by the concussion, thatva whole town had been blown away by one of the explosions, the top of a hill from another, that no volcanic eruption of all volcances going off at once could compare to a single one of these explosions, that the region of the river by being drained by leveled levees were rivers no more, that the entire norty yeast coast of Lake Selicia near the explosion region had disappeared, that the level of the lake nan sunk one thousand feet, that up north few streams of water were flowing and that the configuration of the languages in nengal county had been changed from the shocks. Finallybas we left Mildred Greensonia town the afternoon papers pre printed rumors that Mildred Greenburg city had been devastand by flood, so that for many days we sailed in ignorance of the still worse conditions than even reported awaiting for us.

From all parts of Abbicannia also came notices of accompanying phenomena that seemed impossible but which happened. . Craters as big as those of volcances were found where the explosions had occured. Some craters were seven miles wine. The earthquake snocks produced by the explosions were reported from Sacramento "Abbie aiina Abbieannia State to Glandelinia, red sumsets were really seen in distant parts of the land where forest fire smoke did not obscure the sky, floating bodies and debrie ricked up far from the scene of the record breaking disaster. Even recently it has been reported that the surface of Bengall par County had caved in since the disaster, which we ourselves actually seen with our eyes, and that those who first discovered this unusual fact, was coming to Genton city the State Capitol of Bengal County to see if h it had suffered a similiar subsidence. We ourselves went there, and there is no trace of the city. We were horrified. How glad would be the fortunate result if we could only have found that most of these reports had been only founded upon imagination, or over excitement and over enthugiagm, but this is not really one third told. Two floating islands are in the river, and one almost crashed into our boat.

It will be impossible for me in this letter o to take up each letter or rumor and dissect it specifically, but I shall lengthen this letter for your benefit and shall endeavor to proment every fact which has come under our observation or been recorded by me from the lips of with witnessee, la leaving to the end the presentation of deductions concerning the immediate cause of so world record breaking a disaster.

We all know by now, that hurricanes of forest fires, plagues,, and terrific massacres, battles, buring of cities and towns, and other war dramas have played terrible havoc with the whole states of Angelinia, and alverinia, but the awfulll awful calamities resulting from such dreadful explosions, and floods were some of which they hardly droumed off..... As we soon when we reached the Explosion territory, within the region of Mic-Hollester Run, and a portion of the Lake Selicia pegion, on the southeast corner of engal County, two of some of the most serious of the explosions were the most appalling and destrucive the world had ever heard of or observed. Near Mic-wollester North Bend, ten miles west of Lake Selicia, and one mile of Hihi Adeleheid, the scene appears as if the whole country side had literally erupted. This explosion was a most fatal and far reaching cataclysm being equaled only to the eruption of ten thousand times the probable force of the well known volcano Krakatoa, excepting this former is not an eruption as the nature of the region proves. In the town of Adeleheid II,000 persons were buried by falling debris in a single moment,, and from the concussion of this and succeeding explosions as the scene is from a height, ruin was wrought within the whole region as far as we can observe. The crater caused by this explosion is several hundred feet deep, and is partly f 'full of muddy water. The crater is fenced in by almost steep banks. It is two miles wide and six long... gome force this explosion must have had.

The second scene of explosion is near St vincent De Paul town, where the terrific mine eruption was double to that between Mic-Hollester North Bend and Adelaheid city, for it buried the whole territory for scores and scores of miles راید ایستاد استاد استاد ا توراستر و د Of course your gracious Excellency is by now surely aware of the general features of this great national tragedy which took place in Jume. This article,,,, of the li letter will point ould so far as can be learned from the reports of to day the essential features of the groat catastrohpe and their interpretation. As witnesses said to me the people of the destroyed city of betann looked upon their part of the state i with pride and love...The charming ravines, rivers, and forests and rolling hills were the homes of myth and legend of poligious worship and the big rivers pleasure reso rts resorts. That because of explosions the waterways here would visit the city with algender, the inhabatants could not believe. But the people now gone, had as witnesses told me felt the chocks of ogn other far distant explosions. During the first greatest horror at Lake Selicia there were some shocks that vibrated Abbigunn, rather unusual occurances in this history of all parts of Calverinia, although some of its ne ighboring states are quite given to real earthquakes but of no severe natures.

The explosions at Lake Selicia in that fatal October or November 1912 startled the city,, and when day broke the pwopl people found their hourstops and streets covered with mud, grass, twigs of trees, jayers of stone clar, and even sand and gravel which gave the city the aspect of having been visited by a strange cruption which might have vomited this strange ejecta, and this debris covered all the country between Abbieann, Wickey Lansin, Violet Paul, and i prientown. The city of Abbieannia however was not inu injured by this explosion, soon the scene passed and Abbieann forget the intimation which the wicked enemy had given of what was to come in the future.

Just when the present explosions of such force came no one can tell, but many who survived told me that before the terrible blasts, that there had been all day and part of the night of May 3jth a series of smaller booming of a far distant nature rolling like thunder. A woman living at the town of Bt Troase which alone survived stated that on May 3 Ith at seven oclock in the evening, she heard sixteen district shocks or reports in a long thundering roll in the direction of Lake Selicia which were so great that in her home the dishes from thrown from the cop cupbeard shelvescand broken, the house rocked, and the furniture danced the tango and highland filing. These your Excellecy as she said were the first effects of the present series of more disasterois disasterous explosions that destroyed the big city and many others and lot loose such a record breaking flood.

At the same time others said they had seen a great cloud of powder colored smoke tward Adeleheid Junction, and from that hour untill the catastrophe at Abbieann smaller explosions had occured. These were noticed from seven to eight thirty. At eight thirty several children of the town of St Trease observed a roll of smoke rising from a distant plain from a high hill they stood on, and in the slowly gathering darkness the cloud was a remarkable black mixture of cloud of different black shades. Another eye witness had discovered what should have been an alarming fact that strange men had been seen in the region several days pefore, just at the time when the distant lanuscape many miles away nau bean emitting strange clouis of smoke for three minutes, but the smoke seemed to have b en been produced so normally that even those who were always inclined to looke on the dark side of things seemed not to even think of a coming catastrophe. For a strange reason or other, in many near by towns there came borne on the wind a blizzard of dust, for a moment for those outside in the streets breathing became uncomfortable, eyes were dust filled, and some chocked. At this time ominous rumulings were heard at Abuleann, and white clowns rolling upward spread over the sky. At that time strange fine dust real over the i city. Rivers began for an unknown reason to swell, and some streams became raging torrents, carring carrying debris and dead fishes in the current. At eight oclock at night the first series of real alarming shocks occured, and debris of trees and graval and grass and even flunks of water fell on the west side of Abbieunn. Coud thi could this have come from the explosions many miles away. After this date it was continually noticed that columns of debris and earth had been hurled up by a blaut ten miles north of "deleheid. This occured at eight oclock but its effects did no harm to any city or town. The rivers were of a dark hue, and as shocks repeated and fearing it was of a strange natural phonomon phenomena many began to depart from the town. When it grew dark flames accompanied with rumbling noises lighted the sky causing wide spread terror. On thi c this hour the first railroau line disrupted north of Abbieann at an unknown distance from the v city. A rain of of debris term from the earth began for a few moments, and the action of the river prevented river craft from reaching abbieann. After eight thirty oclock the strange incident ceased, and a calmer state prevailed, although some smoke clouds still seemed to rise near the city of adelehals.

Strange to say however a stream of musdy water as witnesses told me flowed out of place ever the landscape, and reached the olg river, Michellester in three mu minutes, and in its right the strange flood swept from its path, plantations, towns, Jactories, cattle, farmers poultry, and hundreds of people ever a breadth of of fourteen miles wide and six y miles long along the Mic-Hollester Run branch.

At the junctions of the river stood the town of La Palos one of the finest villiages in that section. It was completely entombed in muddy water. Church spires alone coul, be gg observed above the flood. It is estimated the people of the whole town had perished, but the officials give a somewhat smaller number. And this your Excellency before the main and horrible disaster At the same time a most remarkable phenomenon occured during the rush of the muddy water tward and into the Mic-Hollester River. The river first apparently slightly receded, all along that section for a distance of about two miles, and then overflowed elsewhere with g gradual strength covering a large landscape not far from Adeleheid and swamping the city in some places to a depth of three feet. This created a general panic, and the terror stricken people were said to have fled to the hills, though later the river resumed its normal course without doing any great damage. At that time the most terrible detonations were heard hundreds of ales to the miles to the northwestward, at short intervals, and continued untill midnight when the main and most frightful crashes came. In Abbieann city at this time the electric lights for a uninown reason failed, but the city was lighted by strange flashes of from from the far distance. Terror stricken the inhabitants of other towns thinking the very sarth was breaking out into volcanic cruptions rushed for the hills scream ing and wailing.

It happened that at seven thirty oclock the railroad lines from Cav Calverine to Abbieann and Wickey Lunsin was swept away to the west. Gemini great who published a news of the disasters of the south, noticed that the river Mic-Hollester at this time was furnisheding furnishing a hundred times the volume of the greatest power and carrying even stones and rocks weighing many tone, and even ships could make no headway against the current. That this occured before dark,,, Some refugees from Mickey Langin stated that on the hear of Seven fifteen most terrible detonations broke from the direction of the stratstraight north at short and irregular intervals accompanied by dense powder smoke and luris flashes which are seen in distance attributions.

This was awiux so early in the evening but when darkness came on it appeared much more terrible. This awful phenomena was so terrible that even in Abbicann people in their night clotges carrying x crying and frightened children, and lighted by any sort of lamp and candle they had caught up in their haste ran out into the dark streets wailing and screaming and running aimelessly up and down the streets. the mental strain becoming unbearable, and refugees from towns near by go on board ships and started off for the north for safty. At quarter to eight, the distant explosions apparently were in full sway. The detonations were heard as I was told as far as Calverine for naif an hour, and thick clouds overshawoed the whole northwestern horizon line. The town of Handon was abandoned because of the awful concussion, and debris fell in Abbisann. Debris fell even in mickey Lansin. a foot of earth, grass and all kinds of ground and other debris was reported even in the Lake Selicia EgioR Region, and the majority of same debris fell in Abbieann. People who survived former disasters were departing from Wickey Lansin, on foot to neighboring villiages, and by river steamer to Culverine. At this time all telegraphic and wire communication between a hundred cities was interrupted. There were six main line trains leading to Abbieunn city, all of wh which were eventually broken or destroyed. The hour before the end, was one of horror in Abbieum and elsewhere, though the strange distant phenomena did not seem so vivid as before. Detonations like the heaviest parks of artillery were heard from seven thirty to quarter to eight. People as far as Pandora (Calverinia) heard detonations as of artillery firing in their streets. These even reached as far north as Calverine, and as far south as Francis Atlanta.

Similar detonations were heard even in Mic-Hollester City but these were believed to have been from some other source. At that moment the telegraph operator at Adolcheid recieved a message from the operator at Wickey Lansin saying;

"Creat concussion felt here, don't know how long I can hold out. Many buildings have fallen. Great horror raging in believen. Buildings falling there as if from an earthquake." gimultaneously the Counsel at violet paul sent a message to the railroad telegraph office, and was informed that all railroad communications were broken, great concussions were shaken shaking down cities and towns a elsewhere. pefore this untill midnight the frequent detonations had apparently ceased, and the Mayor of Abbieann in the town of Wickey Lansin at the time tried to stop the panic while which the strunge disturbance caused. He declared that probably some big battle was raging near somewhere, that the danger they feared would not increase that there was no great volcanic activity anywhere, and sent a large detatchment of soldiers tally the ally the panic, and help those who wished to leave to get the earliest boats and trains and other cars still raramning, and later he himself went with his wife and children to Abbieann, where they too were killed, when the great disputer.

At about twelve twelve, June the Foist, the steamer dertrude then approaching Abbieum, and her fate,, reported strange flaches all along the distant herizon and the sky was red closchers, and comething like rain was falling, aloth although the night was rair, and the moon and stare bright and clear. Indeed the rays of the riging moon had hardly descended over the eastern hills,, back of Abbieum on the midnight hour of June the Foist, when at fifteen a after twelve, as witnesses tell me of other towns a great series of most terrible apparent oruptions occured raging half an hour at different point in a perfect relling fuedlade, and not only suddenly destroyed the city of Abbieum and its probable eight million five hundred thousand people, all river craft and ships in the river anchorage, and all the country places within a region of fifty miles, but devastated many towns and villiages in almost the name fachion as its Pelce ucetroyed the city of St Pierre on many years ago. The presence of these series of most craormous immediatured expressions so far as I have been able to ascertain them were are follows;

The witnesses Witnesses of these terrible events were indeed numerous, but there were not many of them who survived. Of these I personally interviewed the captian of the Steamer Certrude, Captian Horns, and his engineer and so e some others, who witnessed the event from the river side, and about fourty others who observed it from the landside mostly soldiers on guard in a camp of troops near by. I have also carefully preserved the printed reports of many other witnesses. Some of the withesses if the lirst supposed oruptions because of the darkness could only see a portion of the phenomena, gix persons at Mt galisbury whose stories are the most intelligible of those from the landside as aid and see see the explosions but intervening hills and forests obscured their view of the rivet and the city iself itself. This also was the case with many others, who lived northeast of Appleann. The witnesses from the ships could see the sequence of the apparent eruptions, but us the edges of the des dense black masses of smoke appreached them the cloud itself overspreading land and river cut off their full observation of what was taking place in the city which coulf be seen by observers from the shore sine, though of course they near the awful noise of fulling buildings. All of the witnesses on the ships many or them rrightrully snaken, and injured were too ousily engaged just then in securing their own suity to devote their autention to the strange phenomena exclusively. About thenty twenty have given unusually intelligate and accurate accounts of what they witnesses. These were the crews or a steamer called the Anna. I was associated for some time with the latter for a week upon our return on the ship. Many other witnesses have noted most important single facts.

another man who did not like to give me his name, but who was a farmer near Abbieunn, and whose miraculous escape from the city before midnight, informed me that the needle of a large unercoid barmoeter batometer hanging in the house at which place he was visiting fluctuated violently, and this fact determined hm him to leave the city. These fluctuations were undoubtedly disturbances in the air from the other distant explosions heard before the destructive blasts came. Professor Hansonia who was an astrononmer of the Abbieann observatory at the time of the unusual catastrophe was on his overlooking plataue about fourty miles from the city. He told me he heard an immeasureable roar of detonations, when the disaster took place, asscribing it as a hundred thousand volcances erupting in one places with all their force at once. Jeunie Evans, a foremen of the yeldorn marm equally as far from Abbicann, but northwest, also told me that there was a roll of the most frightful and loumest detonations he had ever heard in the direction where the apparent eruptions came from All witnesses agree that Abbleam and many other towns and cities near her were overwheamed by the concussion, and by terrific landslides that buried many villiages with an unknown loss of life. Great clouds from the explosions also wrecked and destroyed towns, which travled with great rapidty over the cities nearest the crash. One witness said he saw a great series of black clouds boiling upward in great balloon balloon balloon or mushroom dh shapes with numerous rolling convolutions, dissipating above, and floating away in great horizontal ribbons, preceded by tremendous flashes. According to the engin eer of the ship called the Gertrude, was looking at strange glows in the sky tward the northwest, and suddenly noticed there were about fourty miles away about a series of ernormous apparent eruptions, big puffs of smoke coming as if from blendrede of volcanic cruetions at one time which mushroomed and spread out, and accompanied by a deafening thundering rolling sound, which shook the ship and togged the river into great waves. Then after a noticeable inerval interval, there there was again a second series of apparent cruptions a hundred times worse than the first, and while lower portion of the clouds aid not ascend but suddenly fell and rushed down tward the ship, and the city of Audieann in ten great horizontal puffs. No one could tell what caused this part of the freaks of the explosions, but on seeing this which was known as one of the first fatal apparent eruptions, the crew of the ship run down into the engine rooms. One of them with the Enginner Engineer when all was quiet again took nerve enough to return on deck, though strangely purned and suffering as they were, and saw a third and apparent more severe eruntion at a longer distance which took place about three minutes after the second one. There were quite a number of others after that, at which the eingineer described the very landscape seemingly to open over an area of twenty to sixty miles, at a point probably fourteen miles northeast of Appleann followed by a most terrific eruption of .lame and smoke accompaniou by an most Immeasuremels your once he could not describe. The caption of this ship had a clear view of that locality but not of the city of Adeleheid, and of the nearest explosion. However he saw a most tig and dense column shoot up and sideways from the surface of the ourth full of fire to the very top, which spread out like one of the biggest of thunderheads seen at the approach of a du distant thunderstorm. The cloud was full of fiery flushes, which even sourced above the cloud and fell like fiery rain with a great hissing. Then be was terrified to see the cloud coming forward tward the river still retaining its flory color, and he ran for to go below deck. He declared the cloud did not go up in the air however like a volcanic eruption, even though of course it went very high propagily thousands of rect but not like a volcanic eruption and it spread like a ball or cauliflower, and then burst into columns like clouds of smoke viewed in explosions. Three women i on deck at the time saw the immense column of sucke issue from the surface of the land at that distance which as they claimed at the lower parts did not rise but settled down in a fiery rain like a cloud of fire works display tword and upon Abbieann which suddenly became obscured in a dense cloud of dust and a terrible roar of falling buildings

Strants indeed was the composition of the cloud. It's visible composition was of cours a most dense mass of fire heatened powder smoke which everywhere filled the air mixed with dust, lirt, sund clay and debris of all description all of which was heatened or caught fire from the tremendous flash of the exploding materials. Basides this, explosion made powder heatened gason, and superheated smoke were apparently presented as will be shown. A ten of heatened and was found in the officers cabin on the Sentrude From fifty to six hundred tons fell upon the docks of the bigger ship known as the St Ann, less than a foot in all the bigger explosions fell on the streets of budly shaken Adelohold. These were piled highest against the northern section. Examination proved it all ground dooris, and fragments of trees and stones.

The immense clouds as seen approaching from the source of the apparent eruptions were dense, opaque, and of the varied colors produced by the blasting of high explosives added with a brownish black color. It's size and density was so great as to obscure the whole sky over the scene and to cause more total darkness of positions it enveloped than the night hours did. The cloud not all of smoke but debris also was heavy, and the lower parts which travled alon the earls configur ations driven by the forward forces of blasts destroyed everything it touched. Owing to the heavienes of the debris either shot upward and then falling, or shot horizontally, houses, estates, forests, and people on the higher elevations beyond Abbieunn and other places were spured, except from the concussion, as well as forest and towns in the extreme northwestern section of the County and elsewhere. The lower part of the cloud was forced by the vibration of the blasts to advance horit horizontally through the air, at the speed of a mile a second, following. the configuration of the landscapes, and besides the progressive motion its con volutions surged and rolled. Many said the cloud rolled vertically. From the con cussion in the lower lands forests were prostrated, big landslides buried all villiages for nearly a hundred miles making as it is termed mountains to walk, and all fallen trees lay in one direction. And the path of the explosion clouds was from north to southeast, and the cloud came against a strong southwest wind No one can ever I believe interpret the phenomenon. Either the cloud was hot or full of flashing fire and burning sands and dust and debris. All witnesses in towns and villiages and on the ship, spared testified resting a great heat e en even when beyond its margin and great fires in forests broke out. The debris of dirt and even ground was hot for hours on the ship known as the Gertrude, and still warm about two hours after the disaster.

.The flaming debrie falling upon the St Ann and other ships were sufficiently hot to set some ships on fire, to cause ignition of the rope and rope and bedding to ignite woodwork, and atth pint tar timber on the ships forward deck.

For hours the smell of powder was in the air.

Other witnesses eight can miles northeast of Wickey Lasin felt a hot blast of powder Lanuon air.Others on the margin of the explosion aisaster testify to the hot air and smell of powder in the air. Others have personally selt the not plast of air from the explosions. In addition to the hot deoris, some say there was an 14. visible heaten superance in the crown of smoke and deoris which penetrated clothing without firing it and yet scorened and burned the human skin beneath as attested by the burns of many survivors, and others. It is possible that the explosions dug deep enough to touch water and shot up and forward superheated clouds of vapor or

There as was plenty of testimony that the cloud of the destructive explosions were from the ernormous flash of powdor invand incandescent. Indeed all parties who that fatal night witnessed the cloud from the front and advancing and rising side testified they saw for a few moments during the uprour fmue or incandescence in it to a most terrible degrees. There indeed is positive evidence that the cloud at the under section was aflame or incandescent. The ongineer and some of the crew of the ship called the "Gertrude" who looked up through a skylight says he at first thought the heavens had taken fire even though his point of view was the outerr the outer side of the destructive region. There is plenty of great evidence that from the heat of the flame regulting from the ernormous explosions that flame developed in portions of the closes during the outbursts. All persons who witnessed the terrific explosions from any side of the region of destruction testify to see ing great sheets of flame develope within and under the clouds and and even far above them suggestive of suiden ignition of the ejected inflamable materials probably thrown up by the force of the explosion. The Mayor of Adeleneid city may a sheet of red fire in the air following after other phenomena observed by

He said that in the city of bbleann, not all of it but the extreme north side behind the smoke clouds there cand sheet after sheet of 11 mme, stating that at the time or the explosions he saw the heavens clouded with flame which descended like fiery rain in all directions with a fierce hissing roar, and then five minutes afterwards there was total darkness. He said other terrific explosions occured of more greater viol violence, and then a great cloud a parently seemed to settle over the northwest end of the city, there was a roar of falling building, s followed by a sea of flashing flame and he put his hand over his face to shut out the awrulll awful sight. He said;

"As I looked I saw an immense cloud roll upward and forward, followed by a earsplitting roll of thunder, and after having run from the shaken scene for a few hundred yards. I saw a most blinding flash over the northern part of the city. As I looked terrified as I was, there was a blinding flash of fire, and in a moment that portion of the beautiful city was in flames, while the rest was roaring withfalling buildings which finally obscured the scene with great clouds of smoke. The flame seemed to travel like lightning over that portion of the city from west to . east but it was not lightning and most of it descended like a fiery spray. It looked as if something shot up with the black clouds had been ignited as soon as they been ejected."

The Mayor of wickey Lansin but who was not in that city but in the country about ten miles north of the city saw a flash of flame within two seconds after the clouds had erunted from the ground. Many others testified that the cloud itself was not visibly afire, at the time of the explosions, but that the heat of the . flushes of blasting materials influmed all objects ejected by the force of the explosion that could burn, as well as fragments of trees and so forth, and hurled this over the north part of the city-liany said that all these blazing things when they fell set the ruins on fire. The ensusing flood the next morning had carried the fire down with it for that reason there being so many big wreckage jams and windrows aftre for many weeks after the floreness of the flood had spent itself. Tremendous displays of strangs bolts and flashes were seen at the city of San Pedro Junction and San Antonio before the flood within and far above the clocks clouds during the explosions.

The evidence of these flashes is indisputedly testified by many witnesses. I myseld have personally witnessed the phenomena in other big explosions already recorded which I happened to witness. Many witnesses in describing the current explosions that flashes of all kinds more like a tremendous fir w fireworks dis play and like bursting bombs moved the length of the sky, along the horizon and overhead at all points where the explosion occured, and that the noise was too severe to describe, saying that the whole world was noise. This phenomena was produced during that intense darkness for several minutes with a most beautiful and thrilling horror. Great sparks shot along the horizon also in every direction. Others distinctly and voluntarily testified to me that there was much display of fire works like display in every direction during the explosions, during the catastrophe. Though destruction of life was heavy in Adeleheid city there was no positive evidence of dusth from shock or concussion, nor is there sufficient data to say that there were no such kind of effects. No fulgarities even were found, no splintered trees, no shattering and most buildingsthough burned were wrecked by concussion or shoof. . The ironworkof tracks and some buildings were bent by combustion heat of the burning city. R The only apparent phenomena reported where some of the flashes were like lightning or electrity was the alleged report of a survivor who said he found a ton of commercial iron bars standing against the walls of a shop that had been fused and somewhat injured and some parts melted down...The telegraph of ice in Aleleneta city and its contents were burned, and that some fragments of the app arutus were thrown a hundred yards. The office was believed to be burned by the hot contents of the cloud, but surely the throwing was not due to this cause. !any of the bodies looked as if they had been struck by some unseen objects, but this could not be proven.

Important studies of the results of death in the city of deleheid by officials of the cemini in the the vinicity, this town having escapeed the ravages of the flood, being on too high an elevation to be reached by the torrent.. It is certainly an interesting coincidence that the marconigraphs on some of the boats and in towns were made useless during the disaster. The Superintendant of the Abbicannian count quard, Mr Hanson Mic -Hollester reported that the delicatly execunded magnetic needles at the many oa t Coast and Geodetic gurvey Magnetic observatories -- and me situated at Handondon, Abbieannia state, and the other at Forne southern Angelinia gtate--were violently disturbed, beginning at about the time of the unusual satustrophe at Abbieann and engal County is reported to have occurred. The Magnetic disturbance began at all points at once, at a time corresponding to Twl welve thirteen, Abbieum loval time. This disturbance was also registerated in many foriegn countries, and in the B! lengiglomean andcounterine isles.

There was direct oval cral testimony of explosion powder gas in the cloud and air, all silverware in the ruins of many towns not hit by flood were blackened. most of them re resembling black junk, gilded picture frames and other objects were blackened lke ink, and silver platters picked up in the ruins of houses were black and corrugated. Bronze silver and images made of real gold were likewise blackened, but the blackness could be removed from the gold. In fact every metal relic suspe susceptible to powder fum a and sulphur discoleration showed its blackening effect. Even twigs of many trees showed the sul h sulphurous coating from the smoke of the exploded powder.

The presence of the sulphurous powder gases was reasonably sensed. and and it was worse than sulh sulphureted and hydrogen gases of volcances. The deputy mayor of Selson Town told me that the captian of the Gertrude picked up fragments of exploded shells in the ruined streets of Wicky Wickey Lansin on the afternoon of the catastrophe. The whole region was filled with sulphu reted smells for days after the explosion, as testified by many, the smell of sulphur of powder being so strong that survivin horses would stop and snort, and some of them drop and die from suffication liany of the relief parties and rescuecworkers in the regions not flooded were obliged to wear wet hundkerchiefs to protect them from the strong fumes of powder sulphur. One of the very few survivors of Abbieann city who arived in Calverine on August the eighteenth, and whose name is HicNallie claims to have escaped from Abbieann to a ship in a raft, and that he was picked and that he was picked up by the Gertrude. He said the air was filled with mud and falling debris, and the sulphur fumes in the smoke was so strong that breathing was absolutely difficult. The d deputy Sheriff said that when he approached Abbieann on the night of the explosions there was afterwards a most terrific ofor or odor of sulphur and smoke in the air. Governor Evans of Rengall State said that in his city there was little sulphur smell but the smell was like something dry like steam with a itt little sulphur, team clouds were seen by many others rising from the erupt erupted clouds which no doubt was produced by sudden heat of the water. Strange it seemed but steam may be inferred, and the burning of persons bodies through their clothing without firing their clothing indicated the prosence of steam, and the great rain of wet mud and stones and clay and fragments of trees and leaces which lollowed the catastrophe from the cloudless sky might theoertically we assigned to the condensation of the steam with the ejection of the clouds of dust plown upward with the steam during the explosions.

Also one of the most tremendous destructive forces on record wasupresence was present during the explosions. It approated forests of trees, destroyed many villiages and towns far south of Audieann, threw all the people out of their houses, made the river momentarily change course, overturned river ships and boats, destroyed their rinn rigging and for many miles caused tremenedous landslides. It is impossible to concieve that the force was initial from the explosion blasts,

Whole walls of b ildings in north Abbieunn which was too high to be reached by the flood were thrown down, foundations were uprooted and displaced, pedestals with statues standing head down, rigging and upper works blown off all ships in river streams and small lakes, hulle keeled over, and ships literally hurled out of the water upon dry land by the force. Hundreds of big buildings were shaken down or torm asunder, and thrown great distances. The Statue of the Sacred Heart and of the Virgin as observed by me on the upper cliff on the north side of the city was thrown to the south withtheir heads I ing to the north, but not duning in the least, not even scratched or discolored by the flame. In the cloud. Hany parts of the woods southeast of the town which were too high to be reached, by the flood on foothills were thrown southeastward as against the clist, authough cothers in the north side of the city were apparently rooted sufficently to to withstand the blasts .. Against a cliff near the no southern part of the city h which was swelt ama, by the flood are are hundreds of strange rocks thrown there apparently by the explosion. However, in the cliff line abl above the city many trees are seen still standing with their branches and scorohed foliace foliage, and a green roofed building preserved there, with furniture and fol ago folloge stact showing the line of explosion fire cloud did not reach there..

adjusty to the

The shickhock was felt as far as Calverine, eight hundred miles to the south or northwest, and Angeline Junction nearly a thousand miles to the southwest where many people reported in letters that they were thrown down.

According to Engineer Huns of the ship Gertrude there was a great horizontal disturbance in the water of the river caused by the strange aerial force produced by the explosions. This atruck the port side of the ship, her head being on shore. She keeled to the starboard, so that the tridge got under water, and water came into th the hold through the fiddlers.

.The ways lifted the Certrude, so that her anchor chain broke, and she was enabled to escape. It also took several of the crew off the deck, but the return return movement brought them back to a busy, from which they were rescued. This return wave tore up the river beach. In the south end of the remaining portion of the city of Abbieann which was too high to be reached by the flood objects were blown southeastward by the force of the explosions in the northwest, the north and south ends of building buildings being blown in. The Gertrude at Buoy was struck by force from the northwest, other ships were destroyed by force off the west and northeast, trees and forests of them in the vinicity of Adelehedi were blown by force from the northeast and southwest, all trees of the slopes of the Calvering wills tward the roads to Francis Atlanta were bent by force from the west and gust, and many other points was destroyed by forve from the straight north and south. This seems to have been near the north end of the remaining portion of the city where destruction was greatest, the strange effects decreasing radically in all directions.

Among the evidence of force are the fact that in the smallnorthern part of the remaining higher sections of Abbieann the b i buildings were absolutely pen polyeraled pulverized. Not a vestige of many little villiages near the city were left, and not a piece of the buildings of these towns could be found.

Also a return force is absolutely evident by the south end of buildings of all explosion torm towns blown northward, and by the testimony of witnesses. The engineers of the ships said that the force had the strength of a most wild tornado , send noted that it went out, and then when the explosions ceased came back. All who felt it, tenfied that they were blown abour as if a harricane was raging. Evidence of great earthquake like shock was also noticed to an unusual degree, and the buildings bridges and eary earth embankments within a milet a hundred miles of the zone of explosion disaster, which showed disturbance also to disasterous and most appalling effect, urvivors similarly located testified that at first they thought there had been a most violent earthquake.

Also many witnesses on the perimeter of disaster testified they were not suffocated by heat, sulphurious fumes or powder gases, but could get no air to breathe. These worus to its effect is the testimon; orthumdreds of witnesses from the ship officials to the survivors of ruined towns and villiages. Even the engineer of the ships that were in the zone of disaster stated they could get no air to breathe on deck after the explosions untill they went below.

Governer Evans of Bengall State said- " It was not at all hard to breathe untill all was nearly over, then the wholepopulation felt as if they could get no air. The engineer of the ship Certrude insisted there was more noise than any one could describe to save their lives, a most terrible deafening roar that injured his ears a good dealSome describe the falling objects and flame making a hissing noise like escaping steam from pipes. I have heard evidence of the most resounding explosions ever known on record for the testimony concerning noises was inquired for throughoutly. All witnesses testify to the sudden and instancous instantaneous conflagration of the north part of surviving Abbieann, all other cities and towns nearest the blasts and of whole forests. Un Many noticed that the seas of sudden flomes swept rapidly from northwest to south. All combustible materials in all places was destroyed, but in the southern and northern edge of devastation large forests of trees stand which were only singed of their leaves and twigs.

And the whole catastrophe, outside of the fires, from the first tremendous world record breaking explosion to the main and final most frightful convulsions, was over in less than fifteen minutes muni minutes, lalthough the forests even now up here are still burning. Immediately following the terrible destruction there was still more strange to say according to witnesses a tramendous rain of wet sand . muxl. clan clay and torrents of water. This muxl and wet debris plastered all objects upon which it fell with a thick coating of wet slush, housen ships, lans landscapes, and heads of human beings. The landscape was everywhere coated with an envelope of this strange mud from the sky. This rain of mud continued for one hour after the explosions. Accompanying the rain of muddy debris, was a shower of rocks of all sizes. These stones were indoubtedly those which had been thrown higher in the air from the force of the explosions than the other ejecta and which with a long trajectory came down last of all. These stones of small and large sizes falling on the soft plastering of the landscapes, rolled down the hillsides, striping the plaster with their parallel paths as if it hand had been raked with a lice comb.

Death was an accompaniment of any of the terrible phenomena of the apparent series of world breaking eruptions of explosions described, and without the slightest doubts occured in thousands of wars and in different degrees of sudden ess and horribless. Many were killed throughout the region by inhaling not fumes, others puried by the same on the ships, others purned by strange steem, still others jkilled by force, and killed by flame. All of course did not die suddenly. Mearly all those who were wounded wove burned burned survivous of the ships and the eyes of the injured were not affected, and the eye lashes were said to be intact, on the other hand remains on share and in the towns were harribly burned to the quick. Many children were found who mounted for water, but who were una hunable to swallow because their throats were scorched ; on the inside.

It is not believed that the inhabatants of all towns died of asphyxiation in the position in which the disaster surprised them, for many were found in positions indicating flight in search for shelter.

The caption f of the Gertrade told me he saw many pe ple running along the river edge for several minutes. In the town of St and a woman was found dead in the act of putting on a nat, a man was killed walls lighting his pipe.

Another one wi ness told me he saw in delened a man helding a straighing frightened horse of his deliverywagen, both being killed in this posture. The man at the pi piloet house and steering wheel on the Gertrude was killed almost instantly where he was sitting, for he never moved. The First Mate was giving orders whon killed, and yet near by some children and their mother and father were only burned and recovered...It is also stated a man who died on the same ship was burned badly and internally.

The effects of the proceeding explosions of that fatal and most fearful Midnight of June first, and of the results and awful floods which had taken place and raged for many weeks and months sin ce the day of the great explosion catastrophe notably that of the main flood, all of which devastated large parts of carveringa and northern Angelinia are so intermingled, and their results so terrifying and so conglomerated that it is difficult to distinguish them. The area of devastation as seen by me and my followers, represents mainly the effects or results of the force and concussion of all those rintern minutes explosions. As a whole this ilm immense area includes all the country, between Appleann and down south further than ressica Angelinia bounded by the north and south, and along all points near Angeline Vine state, previously mentioned in all the n wapaers and in the description of the configuration as constituting the most ernormous and immeasureable and horrible amphitheatry of death and destruction

This area practically as , discovered in my many months of t trav weeks of travel and by eve witnesses includes the country between Hengal County and mengall State all portions of southern calverinia on the south, and all of the Central Cart of of calverinia and the section of the Lake selicia region, with the addition of southeastern Calverinia and wesern Angelinia State, added with Angeline vine State. The whole of this area, both the included sections of either stae and state and. and territory was enveloped in the tremendous flood. This flood had covered a confined and well defined zone, reps representing the the area of the main catastrophe. Yet in the area of the explosion outside of the flood zone the whole of the explosion area, both the included valley and the faces and summit edge s of the escarpment and landscapes is enveloped in a smooth compact casing of gravel and md plaster, resembling a coar coat of black gray cement. This cement also covers a well defined zone of the disaster area, the shower of mud and gravel following the explosions. It may be noted that the mud was the unusual feature of the results of the ernormous explosion, and was extensively found in all sections of the explosion area.

petween mud rivers made by the flood of mud in the streams south of Wickey Lansin is wrackage of buildings hurled about in all direction by the blasts of the explosions. Along this bluff extends the remains of what was once a most magnificent and costly highway and also crossing it a portion of the Yollow Brick or Big Girl Knool Rad road. Their surfaces is now covered a depth of many feet from the landslides caused by the concussions, and obsetured here and there by fallen trees and buildings. In the labris there are numerous bodies of animals, cattle horses, hogs, whickens and birds of all kinds, with large manbers of numbers of occassional human remains.

All the houses of the Lany millions of people of Abbieann are destroyed, three quarters of the lower sections swept away by the ernormous found floods the other sections thrown down by the concussion and blasts. Outside of the big city in the area above the flood line there is not a visible sign remaining of any of the towns of the numerous of thousands of people t who lived in them are and elsewhere.

For all these section the only term for good and complete description is absolute annihilation of both population and buildings. while two quarters of the number of hourses remain in abbieum and only in those sections where no flood reached high enough the annihilation of population extends northward to as far as La polama City. Among the many country towns destroyed of which a few I was at and which I can name are El Verso. El pazo, Eurcaun and Telldon. Over this entire area the vegotation is entirely denuded by the force of the blasts with the exception of a few larger trees standing in the unflooded sections of Abbieum, from wickey Luisin southward, stripped of all leaves and twigs and even bark, only the trunks in most cases remaining not even the largest branches. On the edge of the hills above Abbieum a large forest with part of the foliage singed remain standing in

In deep valleys especially in the gradients of the valleys and of the head-water ravines, ferents of trees still stand untourned but badly shaken from their roots by the concussion. In proted protected lateral ravines, other vegetation is still green though trees are slightly standing inclined in every direction from the effects of the concussion. The vegetation on the summit of higher hills nearest the explosions strangely enough was killed or blusted and singed, but in the deep valleys of the Algrove streem entering the Mic-Hollester giver southwest of the city of Abbieum, trees were not affected though partly inundated by the flood.

Along the stretches of the river vegetation was thested as far south as Wickey Lunsin twenty miles south est of Altieum. Till further south the trees are green. To the north near loucher city as far as the north bracen of the Still water creek all forests is also denicled or turned and blasted to an altitude of three numbers feet or more.

For or Mic-Hollester Town doud forests and other trees are broken down three or four feet from the ground and lie to the southwestward. The whole region of all this explosion horror had recieved a sprinking of the destructure force of the explosions. This ad is not comspicious or discolering however, except within an area or two coyona the wreckage covered region close to the explosion area. The quanity and extent of had and debris and dust and foliage and rock wreckage wrupted erupted by the explosions carnet be estimated, nor is it material at present to do so. Heny crocks are filled up so with debris of sath earth and mud that they are absolutely and torribly obliterated. What was the lower valley of the Crock Babbly for miles down is so filled up from landelides that now it is a convex elevation, build up by the great slides from the adjoining mills. The river Palto northesst of the city, and the St Anna have been the site of mud torrents from the effects of the explosions.

.The river Know is still flowing mud in intermittent gulps from the region of crater number one which is full of muddy water. elsewhere are there many conspicous mud streams near Adeleheid and Lu Palo, presumely from the other mud filled craters above that town but it is not proven. Two other mud rivers outside the area of devastation are elsewhere mentioned.. One mile south of Abbieann there were two small gullies or canyons in the bottom of which there were two flowing streams now these canyons cannot be found, where they were there is nothing but a lake of water to a great depth. Besides the mud streams there are many great stretches of plasted rocks scattered all about. On the mouth of the St nna Creek is a status thrown by the blast and where the river border is extending from the deposited mad and gravel. A small islet one hundred feet long, and twelve feet. from the shore has appeared above the water to the north of the mouth of the St Anna. From the River stretch down from Abbieann to Wickey Lansin there are many strange and large and small triangular bights in the river beach on both sides and on largement of the mouths of analler streams entering the river cut by the force of rebounding waves. The mouth of the Creek Johns has been deeply incised and prs present new vertical cut bull bullfs, some thirty feet in depth, which renders the crossing of it utterly impossible. The probable movements causing these strange brights consisted of a strange after movement of the water from the shore and a return wave. They were naturally caused by strange explosion within the air and not by any movement of the bottom of the asu.

The waves were observed at Mildred Greenburg. It has been reported from Mildred Greenburg that at the time of the explosions there was a strange commotion in the river as if the waters were boiling over a large area, or as if two big waves had met. However this report lacks any verification. It is also rumored that tward the north the hill known as St Anns ridge had broken down from the concussion that a town at the edge of the summing is gone having probably disappeared in a tremendous landalide. One man informed me that several fricers had managined the an altitude of Mt ganders had found that its side had broken down into a big slide, and that a portion of its summit had lowered sixty meters by the concussion of the tremendous explosions. Again a part of the hill is ruined and they tell me that during the flood Lake Selicia was a sea. The configuration of the lundscapes around the rivers show serious change. Every hill, valley, scarp, precipice, or other surface feature of the relief as laid down upon the map of thirty years agging absolutely beyond rate recognition. The lorse worse changes however are the destruction of vegenation and the venering of a small triumgular area within the region of mud showers, so that it is converted from a green carpet of woodland and grassy country to a barren desert like that of volcanic regions.

Of the total area of Calverinia, besides Bengall state, about 2,167 miles have been seriously affected by both explosion force, concassion and worse od of all by the ensueing floods. The ejacta from the explosions have conclusted of limestone, clay, gravel, sendstone and also granite, together with and and waterate some places along the rivers in the vinicity of the explosions there had been some evidence of subsidence and elevation of the land, that has been recorded and recognized by me. There had been produced by the explosions serious concussion earthquakes resulting from the rending of the earth by the orations within fifty miles south of abbisann, the broduge bridges, read houses, and strees show signs of the concussion. Eyewitnesses testify thatthuy felt a sensation as of great earthquakes, and also a force in the air which tended to knock them over.

And on the other hand there have been terrific jars and tremore from the tremendous explosions felt at Calverine, and these were of sufficient force to rock buildings and break windows.

You'll this be stood for by our surviving people of Calverinia. Ack the thirty hundred thousand doud, the sixth of Abbieum mouldering dead population, which either moulder beneath the ruine remaining or swept to heaven knows where by the flood.

usual eruption like explosions, I your Excellency have almost forgettan the main part of my story the enemy who might have caused all the trouble. First I have observed that far across the seird landscape from the far distant summit of a long high hill the distant forest fires produced by the flashes and singing heat of the explosion clouds still sends forths its frequent bursts of flame and smoke coulds rising in great thunder heads to apparently twenty thousand feet above my view. At night the summit of that ridge is aglow like a seething h. II. But to go back to the explosions. I went first to one of the craters said to have been dug by the blast, and observed that outside the rim of one of these gigantic holes that existed after the explosions one can see plainly a built up pile risen a hundred feet or more, and largely composed of tremendous blocks of atone, stone sand, gravel and dried mud which have been thrown aside and accumulated around the edge of the crater during the descent of this debrie.

I never saw a volcanic crater so large, not even in the biggest volcances of I never saw a volcanic crater so large, not even in the biggest volcances of the Hwait or gandwitch Islands. Town the dreary western slope of the Valley Fairyknoll one can sow the smoke of enother forest fire some three thousand iset up the slopes of a high ridge, and not over ten miles northeast of Abbicount While the first fire sends up its great seething balls of cloud, which floats away like first fire sends up its great seething balls of cloud, which floats away like the immense thundoundorm clouds, from this lower slope may be seen enother and larger wreath of smoke which also lingers near the ground. In all the fires I witnessed which bars my approach to Crater no number two the columns of smoke ascended whole while the smoke from the other blazes rose higher first and then floated off horizontally or followed the contour of the land tward the south. The fire is far from the crater but I cannot approach it for the heat is terrific.

The fire is far from the crater but; cannot approach to the stream Still nearer this crater an inky black river of mud follows a str stream from this crater twend the big river. There did all the mud come from and the mud does not always run but occeassionally near its head great fountains of and shoot high into the air, and then the stream flows onward with a great gulp and

Somewhere on the hillsabove Abbieum there was another slowly descending mud stream. Around the northern edge of the hills near Adeleheid on a portion of the Big Girl Knool road there was another mud stream which material for a time had flow a down to Soconf Point which was partially buried beneath it. Still to the Soatward was another mud filled cruter, which is lituated twonty miles oust of the Soatward was first seen by one of my followers. It occurs in the hed of the Central pivor itself, and the water of the river is full of mad. Great clouds of amoke immence in size were noted on July the fifth from over the horizon in the northeast. These clouds appeared to show themselves themselves intermitted. but with increasing size and augnitude, untill gult July loth, and are still continuing to appear at frequent intervals, reports having been announced that southward immense forest fires are devastating the country, wen up to not there is continued traces of the immense flood since the deadly explosions on the midnight hour of My the last. Some rlacue the flood forces still continue to exhibit themselves, and will not avain awa, for months to come. I noticed on August the Fifteenth a great black campy of cloud continuing to rise and spread along the far southern and southeastern horizon which spread out over the sky to the opposite horizon causing harkress even in the middle of the day making it hard for me to make my inves i investigations. On the evening but early of the same day a great cloud of emoke rolled up continually in the nouthwest, and was witnessed by all of my members. This cloud from the ... its appearance was timed and rose up to the zenith in three minutes. I took thotographs of this cloud, from which others made a sketch. One of the cithescer told me that the last three of the explosions wars the most violet of them all and occurred about Twelve courteen. The clouds floated over Bildred Greenburg and caused a partic among the people of the city. This was need mponied by many detionation, and it was said that in the city of wildred Green burg heav, chowers of stones of all siz s lell upon the regis of the buildings. The ralling sounded like hail and tore the leaves from all the trees in the

The explosions were accompanied by total darkness over Atticann and neighboring cities and towns, after a great explosion of flune, one half of which source up to heaven and the above half tward Abbleann and neurounding country. Hany others stated that a wave surf followed the concussion, and stones fell on the decks of all the surviving ships, rearing down like a severe nailstorm. According to many this explosion leveled many policings almost to the ground in Adeleheid and buried the dead in the city of able Ablicann bens beneath a shower of debrie. Many who witnesses the blasts thought they were frightful cruptions from the surfance surface of the groun; and that the flaches were accompanied by lightning effects believed to be the ignition of guees under ground. An account of this horrer is described in many papers already. Another told me he had seen a outburst of incandescent sand from the surface of the earth, and that vast quantities of md and mud and even maken lave flowed out of the craters in the ground and that torrents of it overegr a overspread the region. I investigated and saw no evidence of lava prumice or anything relating to volcanic cruptions, end no volcanic guses either had truced itseld. Reports of other seirexseries of of explosions have continued up to the last few weecks, and will probably continue for a time untill something is done to find out the cause, and means to n taken to stop those horrid disasters.

It is now evident that the destruction of Mobieann viewed from a broader standpoint than human and other disaster was but a general drama and episode in a group of more than general phenomena constituting the great explosion disasters of Bengall tate, and that the great explosion of disasters it is but a epinode in a series of stranger events than by mere natural occurance as many believe which have been taking place since the war began. Let us your Excellency for a time forget if possiblev the catastrophe, and consider when whether it is a natural phenomena or a disaster designed by the enemy.

That from the nature the country side for one hundred and thirty miles that from the nature the country side for one hundred and thirty miles have collo collasped in long fiscure like lines in connecting with each of the thirty six ernormous or craters, something by this is mighty mu cuspicious. something putting me in , i mind of mining galleries underground by human lebor, and also that the country for five hundred and sixty nine miles is terribly split up into millions of girantic cracks and fiscures like shivered glass, that a whole country side is sumk by the convulsion makes me think that something is pr peculiar in the whole range of disaster.

"I.Th Where Lake Selicia used to be, ever since the explosion disaster and flood, there is now an inland sea, and the water despite the old time gap refused or refuses to drain out but increases every day. I witnessed this change.

or refuses to drain out but introduced to the state of one thousand feet above "2th that The Calverine Hills rising to a height of one thousand feet above sen level is devoid of all its scoptor slopes which crashed down in the most sen level is devoid of all its scoptor slopes which crashed down in the most terrific landslides every known carrying its forests with it and burying many terms. This according to will nesses went to destruction in fifteen minutes these.

This according to wirnesses went to destruction in illustrations source, for though the mg. That the flood which occured came from a mysterious source, for though the explosions loveled the levees of the big rivers, the rivers waters never reached explosions us many try to may.

"5 that the explosions occured within loss than fifture minites and occured at many different spots and not in one place. The resulting geology of the randocapes as shown after the dispater, prove that the dispater with the dispater.

even its own nature,, and that the procent floods still remaining as I have viewed, instead of recoding are but the recent maximum of the worse flood that ever was recorded in the world since the Fourty Days rain made flood in Bible name, which in many places have continued through a long interval and is still in view. The explosion made flood of last October proceeds similar lengthening horrors, which had as we know resumed to some extent with the coming of spring, and had almost affected a similar area. The first important deduction then is that the present horror at Abbieann is only the redoubled repetition of horrid events which have taken place time and again, at different spots throughout Calverinia since last October, and that the results of the explosions and the floods succeeding have been altogether the same, though the former in leaser violence, the worse probable next to the June horror being that of the Arronburg Ruver River disaster which flooded Ancelling Arathia and hundreds of other places.

So far as recorded, the flood symptons is the same as it was the date of the horrid October disaster, no re new kind of results have been recorded, but morely same symptons in different degrees of violence over and over again. The second principal features of floods, is the opened explosion made outlet of the great Lake Angeline or Selicia, which made a flood of record breaking force for days. The fact that there were serious earthquake like shocks for every explosion horror recorded, shows that the explosions were more exceptionally severe than they were either recorded or known, in fact no vie volcanic eruption ever recorded in the world were as severe as many of the alighter explosions which have taken place from October up to now with such deadly earthquake like effects, without which nothing was at first really known to full conditions.

No evidence us yet has been dec deduced showing that the present explosions was produced by the enemy or not, or by accident or design, neither is there except in the craters any condition which yet enables us to hypothesize a deposit of materials which would show the cause and so forth of these great blasts.

The c confo configuration of the landscape, the repetition of the floods one after another at different locations, the absence of many well known creeks of times gone by, the failure of many towns to reconstruct, indicate that the natures of the disasters taking in also the forest fire plagues, indicate indicate that something in the country of Calverinia and Angelinia, is wrong with either one of the State governments for not taking means to prevent the repeat of such calamities after the first and most horrible October one. The floods of June this year which even now is still in progress over wide territories has been one of most progressive intelsity for many months. The waters of Lake Selicia despite the gaps fail to drain out because recleving the waters from the still remaining floods and all the same territory flooded by Lake Selicia before in still under Conspicious activity succestive suggestive of intense flood waters was first observed since the beginning. The strangeness of the floods of this one with the othere before, and explosions of a similiar but different varities of force throughout Calverinia, to say nothing of disturbances reported in other areas throughout the war zone, is strangely almost positively suggestive, that the causes of such horrors succeeding as after another was not the c development of strange volcemic srupti eruptions under ground as many believed, but upon the contrary the nature of the explosions and their results show that they resulted from far any natural means, and if the enemy cannot be blumed or proofs cannot be forced from the foe, then we will have to take the matter as that of natural causes whether they were or not, as there is no other outlet to the mystery.

Finally as witnesses declared there accompanied every explosion the strange phenomena seen in volcanic eruptions except electricty, gases and magnetism, but some do declare that there was such occurance, which while not probably really ocuring, yet such news have been conspiciously brought to our attention, and should lead to important deductions upon the origin of the magnetic storms that followed every explosion, and whether the nature of the earths interior under ground had anything to do with it or not. The strangest thing of the Bengall Terror was that the 7,678,888 people of Abbicann city were by the concussion, flume of explosion and other horrors exterminated withina few minutes, death resulting from being caught under falling buildings or killed similiarly like the people in the city of gt Pierre by volcanic activity, the town on the upper landscapes gut on fire by the sudden cruption of the explosion cloud, and flame, and the rest with all the slain carried away to heaven knows where by the flood.

This is the investigation by many of the doath caused by explosion also in Adeleheid town which was the same in Abbiscann. The fatal clouds of the nearest explosions came from the North Bend of the Adeleheid River, fourteen miles north west of the city. The flash of the explosion singed the cities and leveled the ground itself around it from the hillsides by concussion and set fire to forests and buildings and changed the course of streams.

The smoke coming from the cloud were sulphurous from powder and other explosive material added with positions of great destructive nature, I something like that of Mt Peles but reaching a greater distance than twice the extent of the island of Martinque which left much evidence that heatened powders within the clouds exploded from terrific heat from the blast after having reached the air. The unusual explosions were accompanied by a tarriffic and atrange fire works like do dispuly display. A unusually great magnetic storm accompanied the explosions which were recorded all over the world and which indicated a connection between them and the explosions. In connection with the magnetic phenomena it is of interest to note that many others presented a table showing the relation between explosions of such nature, and those occuring during buttles, which were absolutely the same and had the same effects. That does sound suspicous does it not your Excellency. One is r was during the four battles or four days battles at Delight's junction or Eva Crania. Of thirty eigi explosions at Cedernine, seventeen occured near Hemirick Junction and fourteen near Nelkingburg and had the same effects of concussion and blusting things to destruction and death, The maximum of number of explosions occured during battles and vice versa. There is evident that flame accompanied every explosion. All the evidence indicates that the fatal explosions were always different in places. All the circumstances show evidence, and much is strong in evidence that the destruction of towns for every distant blast was caused by the far reaching nature of the blasts, and their effects.

The foregoing data and a mential facts concerning the great catastrophe I have not dared to interpret, nor do I wish to be observe the understanding of the events by individual interpretation and hypothesis, nevertheless it may not be presumptuous TO suggest that conflagration, death, and fatality in Abbleann and other cities may altimately be explained by either of the two theories.

I.. The heat blast theory. This hypoteonic assumed that the unexploded powerful powder were sufficiently heatened by the flash of the blast to catch fire and fire the air and cloud and debris hurled up by the explosion, and became sufficiently hot to have inflamed the city and neighboring places and destroyed the people by singeing, suffication and asphyxiation. It does not however account for the forces exerted radically and herizontally, nor the flat flame.

2.. The strunge serial-explosion theory. The explosion of powders within the explosion crupted clouds after their tremendous projection into the air would also account for all the dreadful phenomena observed by many witnesses. The t strunge serial explosion which there is evidence that it really occured was most probably aportion of the emexploded portions of the powder that shot into the air and caught from the flushes, but not accounce is still anothe to solve or state whether this can be true or not. The discussion of anexploded powder catching fire in the air involves a line of accountific specialization which I do not possess, but as saiden and as mysterious as was the great servet as it has left its terrible traces and clues which the detectives of science may follow up if they come to do it. Metal surfaces of all kinds of objects in the ruins still left can be examined and analy analyzed for traces of blackoned pader smoke/. Even the finer debris and dust thrown by the explosion will be submitted to investigation. And then there were those fright ful fireworks display and bolis. What of them, and their own igniting powers.

See geveral days later I headed for where the unflooded sections of the higher elevated portions of Abbieann la buried in debris, and explosion thrown wreckage an and dust and mud. Vast cloud banks shrouled alike the terrible explosion region and the silent victims a distance off. A few smouldering forest fires were visible where the once beautiful forests and towns had been, the sullen glows of the last smouldering embers. The morning had just approached when I approached the city On nearing it I first came to a scene beyond a desolate ridge, where smoke in large clouds and volumes was rolling upward in dark colored sheets and wreaths, and beyond could be seen, the gray blasted eastern slope of the wnearest of the nearest stretch of the Vivian Hills. Rounding a promontory, the desolate silent city was in sight,, where Abbieann but a few months before was embowered in magnificence and beauty, but elsewhere for the site of the main city the and eye must needs be strained, or field glasses used in order to distinguish the outlines of gray ruins rising up through what appeared to me a sea of water stretching as far as eye could reach, with wreckage floating as thick as log jams here and there, and this is August, the water nearest me stretching against a background of barren blasted slopes where once grew the fairest forests of this portion of calverinia. In the central portion of the waters not a single house appeared above the water, and it was still flowing southward at a rate of abouth ten foot a enout ten miles en hour.

To get to the high portion of the city I with my followers had to chance a trip in a quay over the slowest part of the flood waters. After perilous work and difficult travel, in which we had to work like mad to avoid collision with parts of houses protruding out of the water, or grounding on something under the water, we came into the readstead in front of the higher part of Athican, and the jusy beat was made fast to a wrock of a wall. Foats were lowered and quickly filled with m with men eager to study in various ways the evidences of the great disaster before studying the flood itself. I gave command that all who went unhere should r turn to the boats when a blast from the quays h whictle should sum on them and that no one so all bring off objects of value from the ruined city. Therefore I take pleasure in recording that these commands was obeyed with alacerity as well as the accord. Our wicht to the city was repeated and our explor ation of the ruins extended for five days but it is not necessary at present to be precise as to dates. While rowing from the quay to the stone quays along the river front of the dead city, we pussed much wrockage and even apars of some of the ships that went down on the terrible hours of midnight June the First-Se far no attempt had been made to raise the sunken ships, probable a great number-like ruined portion of what was or is left of the city lay before, us silent, desolute, and covered with dust and debris thrown from the explosions. I could not see a single person in sight, and not once during those five days did we see a living thing during our clambor over ruined walls, and through deeply debris filled streets, and while walking along the edge of wrocked elevated train structures still stunding, except the members of our squad.

It is unecessary at this time to attempt to describe in any detail the scenes that met our view as we passed in gloomy sorrowful silence over the dust and and rubbleh beneath which thousands of human beings lay buried and probably decomposed to the last by this time, as this has been already well told in many news appears. We glanced uside in horror in passing the grim remmants of what on the right mid night hour were living but sleeping men and women and children. We could not aid in the work of a cromation going on some places, and avoided no far as possible the gruesome sight still lingering. On passing to the higher portion of the city however where the soldiers had not as yet performed their sanitary work, the piles of dead almost skelentons now could not be avoided.....

The best general impresssion of the present condition of the once beautiful city of Abbieann, was by me and my followers obtained from one of the high rises of ground to the extreme northeast end of the remaining end of the city, termed St Marie, where formerly stood a colosal Cathedral, year the f vacant ruins of this great cathedral is the wrock of many giant forest trees, their broad buttressing roots still unchored into the ground, and their blasted branches lifted like appealing arms tward heaven seeking help. Probably long ago from beneath the deep shape shade of those wide spreading trees, any one could have glanced over the once immense and peaceful city, with its almost new work or Chicago Like acenery of trees and houses and yet twice wider streets, and then beyond to follow the green slopes of the Calverinian Hills to beyond the fields of every kind of crop known on the market, upward to the dense forests of hills and mountain sides and level plains. Any person "he may have last saw that fair est of pictures, of beautiful city landscapes, verdure covered slopes, and the vast cloud filled sky -- on the morning of the fatal disaster, were swept away never to be recovered, while one even now on the days of my visit here, bodies of them lay still under the ruins with many others, heat shrivled and decomposed corpses, partially or entirely buried beneath the seemingly universal sheet of waters, or ruins of fallen buildings and under explosion thrown debris.....

This most beautiful of pictures which no artist can concieve had been blotted out, even some parts of the beautiful rivers, and the rugged mountain and hil forested alopes which were all asmoke. At my feet lay the portion of the dead city far above the still remaining sea of flood waters, silent and gray. Reyond where stretches the water, here and there in places on its probable shore lines buildings in ruine showed somewhat above the water, and jame of wreckuge floated here and there. Not a green thing as in sight. Not a tree was standing, not even on the far away mountain ridges leading down to the partially destroyed city of St Jeseph, and oven those were scorched withered and bla blasted. Reyond lay a sea of wreckupe covered waters. It is impossible almost to convey in the proper number of words the appearance of such a sea of wreckage covered water, the abson absolutely plantless landscapes, the scenes of terrific forest fires in the distance, but in this location a far as oye can see there was not a thing at all left alive, and not a tree left standing, after the explosion blusts, forest fires, and floods swept over this territory. As is evidenced here terrific firescho and flood followed the hurricans of hot blasts and flaming clouds and the rain of explosion debris and flung house debris buried what the fire did not consume.

Maybe the flood I witness here will never go away. Never before in the history of man had such complete destruction been wrought on such an ernormous area.

Caring down into the stient streets from the heights of 5t Merie I could trace their course and see the beautiful plains and hillsides and plateaus the city had been built, but now no conspicious objects were in sight. Even the big cathedral was a mass of ruins. Further northward, where the higher sections of Abbieann extended beyond the bold hi heights on the lundward side of the flood, where formerly rose the most bauutiful buildings of all and heautiful parks and gardens, the houses were level with the ground except smaller buildings which were partly wrecked and some buried out of sight in the debriscof the others.

Even the strects were completely obliterated in the debris, and probably the reason for the worse ruin and deeper covering of debris of the northern than the southern part of this highest section of the city, inc is that the former was was at the margin of a sloging plateau like surface, leading tward the Calverine hills, where the concension was worse, and some of the sections were even almost buried in slight landslides, thile further south sheltering heights intervened and the area of which debris could be thrown was much less extensive. I feel however your Excellency, that from roading so much of this long letter already that you are or femiliar with the desolate pictures, which Abbicans and her surroundings present as any one who viewed these scenes themselves, but I may wisk to ask not only you, and all the generals but many others as well if it is really true that all the destruction was done first by the explosions within the space of a few minutes. ond end the lower sections of the city and all its reighboring towns swept away in less than three quarters of an hour by the big floods, and how this most exceptional event in the history of all disanters, came about thether it was a mysterious freak of nature, or whether the Glandeliniens,,,, were responsible.. The evidence of many thousands of eye witnesses, who were near the border of the devastated area, on the shore ofrivers, hilltops, or on the ships in the rivers, or who survived among the ruins, and all other places facing Abbieunn is conclusive that the more than seven to eight million people as the estimate is who perished with the city, and many other places died within the space of a few seconds, or perhaps two to three minutes or shoter. shorter.

Indeed your Excellency i t it may deem mufe to predict that probably the most of them met their death in less than one half minute after the nearest blasts of the explosions shook down the buildings of the city and neighboring towns. Meet no doubt us I telieved died under the ruing, of of those injured being drowned while rinioned in the wrackage when the fleed descended upon the city ... As to the precise nature of the explosions the members of your own commission, I believe differ the

It has been stated in many various newspapers and all mazagines throughout the state and in all history and new story books and novels that the inhabat inhabitet inhabitants of Abbleann were mostly or all killed only in the ruins of fallen buildings with the isjuid drowned, while the opulation of Adeleheid city and other places were asphyxiated by strangely noxious gases, or killed by the explosion of ignited powders shot up with the clouds Or was the cloud it iself really heatened by the flash of the ernormous explosionstheny say the cloud destroyed like a harricane, putting me in mind of the volcanic eractions of St or Mont Peles only on a putting me in mind of the volcants erigitions of the best interpretion hundred thousand times bigger scale. By own observation and the best interpretion that I or my followers can give you placed upon the testimony of serviving witnesses many even children Catholic Irleada and nuns favors the opinion that the general cause of death was a blant of mysterious flame, charged with many explodions in explosions in the forward rushing cloud, the cloud which did not ascend.

Powders shot up from the mines probably in part becoming aftire from the shoots of explosion flashes, were no doubt present as all evidence shows everywhere I gp f go- as the odor of such powders, which reminds me of T.W.T. cuncetton, Mytro Olycerne and even dynimite and other dreadful charges was still noticed at the time of my visit, but the part that such hurled up powders might have played must have only been secondary. In order Your Excellency to be able to judge the conditions where everything was destroyed by the explosions themselves it is necessary for scientests to be sent my conscription to investigate and learn what took place on the outskirts of the dreadful fire storm from the explosions. The people on the borders of the unusually devastated areas, or who were in the heart of the diseaster area and escaped, were in all instances injured to a slight or severe degrees, and it seems evident the injuries were afflicted by hot or flaming dust or powders, which on touching the skin adhered and burned, and caused among many even the dread disases locked jaw. These burns resembled those when you touch a red hot iron, and even resemble scalds, but destroyed deep into the platetof flesh of the more seriously injured.

In all such instances the hair on the burned portions were totally destroyed, , but where the bodies were covered with thicker clothing they were more seriously injured even unto death by the clothing catching fire. Whatever it was, or if it had been ignited power or dust, yet what ever it really was what struck the injured people it was not enough to ignite their clothing, and those w o they suid had inhaled the hot pwders, death had been almost in an instant. The condition of the dead in towns north and southeast of bileann and in deleheid favors the conclusions that this adduction shows what there took place. Thile the awful inhalation of smoke charged with ignited powders and dust may seemingly be accepted as the prinicpal cause of death in these stricten striken towns, it must be admitted that in Abieann and other places too the manority of people were no doubt killed, by falling walls, by nervious shock, and by drowning in the floods that ensued. The blasts which swept over northern Abbieann on the first hour of the June Horning, passed through the city with explosion force. This is demonstrated by the manner in which great forests near the city were uprooted, the strongest buildings thrown down level with the ground, elevated structures for trains torn asunder or to pieces, and the streets torn away. The direction in which all these objects were swept, was a little tward the southeast, and southwest together, or directly away from four gigantic explosions nearest. The most conspicious evidence of the strength of the four blasts which wrought this strange mechanical destruction is furnished by the tallest buildings, which were swept from their upper sections and hurled several blocks to have their ruins scattered among other fallen buillings. All evidence collected in this connection cannot here be present, but it indicates that the blast which wrought the havor referred to push over the city with explosion force. Though it too is a big city, Adeheiei Adeloheid gives a much less loss of life than any other city on the explosion area. As has been reported by the Mayor of that stricken city the number killed was about 34,567. Many more were injured than of any other surviving city. Yet the region around this neighborhood was more thickly populated then elsewhere, but neverthelesethere were no cities comparable to Abbieann in size, but was is significant no one in any neighborhood of the explosion disaster had been warned of the coming cutastrophe, and if they had been suspecting any such disaster probably not enethird such a less of life would have occured.

> PART THREE OF LETTER. EXPLORATIONS IN NORTHERN ABBIEANN. THE DISASTER AT ADELIGIEID. PRODUCTS OF THE RECEIT EXPLOSIONS OF THE SITE OF OTHER PLACES.

REPURTS OF VESSELS AS TO THE RANGE OF EXPLOSION THROWN DUST AND SMOKE , AND DEBRIS..... FIID OF LETTER.

The destruction of Adeleneid was due to blast heat, materials and rocks hurled by the eruptions, stones and earth, and so forth, but the sudden blast charged with burning and exploding powder swept more down upon this city and her neighbors than it did in abbieann. The area in which the materials thrown down and about by the explosions was about twice as great as any territory covered by the eruption of Krakatoa, and extends in a belt some six to seven hundred miles wide across the northern section of mengall state leaving however a narrow strip of verdure elsewhere but blasting everything every where else like My Mt Peleo did at Martinque. I reached the northern extreme part of Abbigunn on the morning of August the 14th and later the same time through the courtsey of the Calverinian Governmen who had immediate charge of the distribution of the relief stores for the refugees, I was enubled to reciever some helpers who aided me in a trip on a boat northward on the flood waters to the extreme devastated northern areas of Abbieann and her suburbs. A landing was affected without difficulty and the country around northern Accieann carefully examined. hile proceeding carefully forward on the bout calls were made at ruined and blasted villiages, and an opportunity was afforded of seeing ruine similar as at Abbieann and Adeleheid, yot as fully desclateed as Abbieann, and her sister s cities.

. Near the shore of the flood waters where a town of some four or five thousand people stood before that fatal night of June First we sadly walked over the burren wind rippled and rill cut surface of devastated and badly cracked land with a huge crater looming two miles in the distance. This town as in the cases of thr the northern portion of poor Abbisann was situated at the margin of a broad aloping upland from which the deoris was swept and piled deeply on the flat land to the leeward. After inspecting the towns Courthouse, a strongly built built structure of stone and concrete, which which was completely destroyed, I pressed on with my helpers to the bluff overlooking Mic-Hollester Rum River, and had an obstructed view of the deeply filled valley of that once beautiful stream, and of the forested alopes of gertrules Ridge even to its still smoking and blazing sides and summit where forest fires set by the explosions still raged. Nover have I in my life gazed on a more stranger or more instructive scene. We had caught the very effects of the explosions at this location.

On the slopes about us still stood the denuded smoking thrunks of trees, their sides facing the cruter in the far distance stripped even off their bark and scorching with the heat of smouldering fires about them, showing that the wind during the hot hurricans of fire had blown from the dir ection of the conflagration. The hills about us were covered to the depth of three or six feet with smouldering and smoking forest debris, and so terrific was the heat we could not dare an exploration in that direction. To the northward, we saw the effects of two tremendous landslides.

One of the many interesting sad sad features to claim attention was the wonderful manner in which the la er of burned forest debris had been cut by the rills origining originiting on it from heavy falls of stones. The cills and gaps were like channels through the smoking debrie. The steep sided trenches with well marked to terraces were leveled into slandslides by the explosions. Among the larger features of the recent horrid changes that especially astructed attention in which the sloping sides of the Mic-Hollester Valley, had been thickly covered with ruging forest fires, and the way the farlous flames were endeavoring to burn through to their own right of who same a smoke from these blayes formed colo columns that rose for thousands similar phonomen phonomenon was witnessed by me near Adelsheid, and was again such near Wickey Lancin, and in each instance the cause was the explosion. The upper part of the Mic- Hollester River was somewhat displaced from its former bed by the concussion, and a landslide, mainly the vast landslide which precipitated an immense ammount od debris into its channel, The debris had checked its flow and for a time had held back the water and acted as a dam, the streambed downstream becoming dry, but as the pressure of the water had increused, the dam had given way, and the large flood of water black with material in suspension, had rushed down the previously dry channel, and became a flood it its own to join the bigger one . A similar behavor of some streams near Abbleann, and also those near Wickey Lanein was or had occured. From the heights above the ruined Courthouse, the entire country side was in full view during our visit, and like elsewhere was without life... Note green sprig of anything was visible, but more atter desolution could be obser ved than it takes words to describe.

And over all of the devastated region lay a thick sheet of either water, raging forest fires, or a thick sheet of gray smouldering debris, or the wreckage thrown by the explicions. The newly added fires, which so recently formed a part of the disaster horror was being rapidly spread, and taking its place in regions that would in ammount of trae destroyed cause an immeasureable loss. every spread of the flames this way or that, caused per half day hundreds of thousands of acres of tress to be burned. The spreading of the flames which had been going on since the explosions with such a rapidity that within these few months hundreds of miles of forests may have been denuded from the hills and mountain side valley and plain, takes for northern Calverinia snother record breaking forest fires. Outside the devastated area where the fall of explosion debris was not quite so heavy and in depth did not exceed an inch or three, it had already at the time of my visit been partly sunken into the softer ground.

One of our trips in the flood waters, was precipitous, not that we harried to go off b cause we feared more explosions, but own owing to the factthat in our excursion tward the north part of abbisann our boat struck an object in the flood but under, and all we can say is we regained the shore wet to the skin and our bout broke into two places and sinking. We were comeplied to compelled to walk around in our wet clothing, and worse of all there had been no sumshine for days because of the sky overcast by smokes of forest fires, both near, and distant. We in our wet clotting continued northward along the shore edge of the flood, passing as near to the floods adge as pu prulence would permit, and we had splendid views of the very plasted and utterly desclate mountains closest to the explosions.

This part of the country of engall gtate or county is remarkably rough, and before the catastrophe presented a paradize like scenery.

we could see far up the slopes of calverine Hills where beautiful forests once were in presences like immense waving and rolling green clouds, and birds haunted the chadowy recesses, but now all was smoke and fire and desclation. Not a trunk of a tree remained in all the stern oppressive landscape to suggest the loveliness that had been blotted out so suddenly and terribly. Here we passed a town where many were killed when a landskide buried it, and obtained a full view of a great forest conflagration which though about probably twenty five miles off we could feel the heat to an uncomfortable degree, and the wind was from us to thr

Out trip here was indeed exciting. We had to avoid the fires of course as no one could live within a mile of them so fierce is the heat. On t returning a to Adeholeiheid we found the work of discharging the relief stores brought by boats still in progress and through the courtsey I of the Mayor I was enabled to make another trip on a new boat in company with one scientest and my own companions, and this time to Maleheid and then through and into that town which is situated somewant somewhat southwest of Abbieman but on higher elevation. Ariving at Adoleichid a Lunding was affected by means of a stronger line which we pulled on to shore. The Landing was no vol and to a degrees somewhat exciting and perlicus. Some distance out from the town on the shore of the flood was a mass of grounded wreckage. The shore bont munned by strong men who well understood the situation, was loaded with relief supplies for the hundrain of refugees in Adoleheld. The boat was rowed to the wreckage jum, where after many managemental attempts, the rope cable leading shoreward was grasped by strong hands. The water of the flood here was rushing past heavily, suring past the almost immovable wrackage jam, and passing with a heavy rour. By means of the long stout rope the boat with her provisions and living examples of the people from the same lands was drawn with great difficulty, without however being almost captized to the wreckage jam, and held there, although surving up and down with each oncoming wave of the floods rush as if it was trying to dance a strange sort of back and forward steps. From the shore near the bjam projected a rude drrrick derrick made of boards taken from the jam at the end of which was a pully and over the pully pulley passed a rope from which I could noe suspended a large case like box about fourteen feet equare. The derrick and cage had been made harriedly for the purpose of embarking many of the people injured during the late dispater, and by no means seemed an attractive instrument or vehicle in which to be lifted from such a crazily acting bout. The uscent was made however with many dips and small disasting in on in which once t recieved a good ducking, and a heard on my heat, and a jam in the mouth with something else, and a bang in the ear, and other amcertainities and minor accidents too manny and finny to relate here attending it awakened the keen at sympathy for the sufferers who descended by the same neas an hour later.

A few minutes later I was viewing the rains of deleichd, with two teath missing, from my moth, a black eye, a lump on my head, a buildaged hand and a swellen gomet,ing behind my ear.

It was a fine start.

From some high hop hospitals many of the recovering patients who were buried by the flash of explosions on that horrid night were taken to the end of the wreckage jam, lowered into the dancing boat, and conveyed to a flood ship where they were then taken on board as gently as the unusual circ circumstances would permit, and placed on mattresses on the deck. All of the wounded were suffering from burns on the hands, face, neck feet and elsewhere, inflicted by hot flames. Of the injured of delcheid numbering I believe five thousand, all suffered from burns from the nature just referred to, a cexcepting others injured when caught in the wrecking of felling buildings, or strock by flying explosion flung wreckage.

At Adeleheid the fact that a terrible disaster had reciently recently occured was impressed on my mind even more forcibly than duringduring my visit to the wiped out city of Abbisann. The beautiful Abbisann city was so completely devastated by flood and fire that very little remained to proclaim the tail tale. But for the presence of some of the bodies in the ruins still remaining, the ruins might seem to be two cen u centuries old.

At Adeleheid however although the town was only partially ruined, and less of life was only less svere, the strange dust stones and broken fragments of trees and ground turf piled high in the streets, the shattered windows and roofs, the blasted trees and tee telephone and eletric light noies, the the absolutely barren landscapes adjacent, and the still smoking forest fires far boyond, all appealed fo more forcibly to the imi imagination and assisted in enabling any visitor to picture what had occured. The people who had aurvived and been explosed to the great peril still thronged the streets, many weeping or mourning their lost loved ones or property, In the outskirts of the city, refugees were crowded in houses not even sufficient for their shelter.

About the doors of storehouses groups of eager applicants were recieving government aid but here no acute suffering was visible, except the most sad sight which were of the injured persons, although their wounds had been well call cared for by the physicians early on the scene. sadly leaving the half ruined town, after having my black eye, and other minor injuries attended to, I hurried inland with all my followers, three of which carried cameras to visit the stretch of the Aronburgs Fin river in that location and get a view of a typical example of the region on which the descent of explosion thrown wreckage dug from y the ground had been heavy. Our tramp took us across previously cultivated fields now buried some four foot deep beneath all debris , and across small streams of no hot and warm water. The view tward the volcanic lke pall of smoke from forest forest fires, and northward along the flood coast, where many plantations and estates had been wiped out, although depressing in the extreme on account of the on unusual devastation that had been wrought was highly instructive as an exemple of the explosions effects.

. It was in this region that great loss of life acc eccured. In one town which cw vintted we vinited all persons had perished. The woodwork of many of the houses were not burned, and no other seeming evidence remained of the death dealing agency, except blackened walls and strange blackened burned dust on the floor, which was extremely fine, and had a depth of about four inches. The windows of the houses which faced northward were hadly shettered, the glass being broken by rocks and stones which evidently pussed through them from the outside, and their frames were indented in such a manner as to show that the flying stones and rocks must have struch with great speed and force. This interesting observation taken in connection with other facts dh shows that the wrockugo hurled upward by the tremendous explosions might have strane strangely enough rose through the layer of the atmosphere atmost here affected by the eastward ble imblowing winds, and on reaching the higher region of the at, atmosphere where the winds might have been blowing east to west, vere corried well to the contward and weatward of Adelcheid but on fulling vere ewept worthard by a new trade wind, associated it is to be procured by an indust tward the explosion areas and given such a slout that on striking the rang windows refored to they passed through and entered the rooms within, within, in the region of Adelcheid the rain of debrie, dust stones water and ground turf and masses of trees was similar to that which foll on abbieann and other places, and in general the material is more course. Indeed throughout the desolated area rough, angular rocks very large in size, some five to siz hundred pounds to six tone in weight foll in vest quantities and at a distance exceeding five miles more from the dust clouds descended so abundently that even at gildred Creenturg, II2 miles from Abbieann they also fell. At Pandorn, and again even at Calverine, each distant about one hundred fifty miles from the explosion area, I had received reports that rocks and stone and dust fell to even a few inches. This is a minimum measure of the deapth depth of the disasterous shower of stones on the devastated area and the average thickness of the strange deposit is several times as great.

This material it must be remembered came down, in a terrific shower, and not only were the stones that fell on Adelacid larger than those which descended upon northern Abbieann but what can also be instructive, stones of all classes are very conspicuous on the desolated fields. The greater part of the debris, consists of sand clay, and lineatone and soft earth and grasses and plants of all descriptione besides fragments of trees, sendstone and granite and much of it also was reduced to dust by the force of the expanding explosions. In addition to all this, the fields are stream with angular masses of different rock or more compact rock, which was torn from the decorr recesses of the earth by the tremendous force of the explosions. Those fragments of different rock are much more dense than the accompanying fragments of other rocks. Those that fell on the desolated area were somewhat heatened by the flashes of the explosions, and retre retained the heat when during the ground and capable of igniting houses and shrubbery. In probability these heatened rocks and flashes of the explosions set off the forest fires I see

This brief account of the mateir material which fell on delcheid will I believe show the main cause of the loss of life, and the destruction of houses, vege tation, ac etc, on the landscapes. The majority of people Miled, as elsewhere, in the opinion of physicens, and others early on the scene lost their lives from the inhalation of strange hot dust or powder, flaming flashes, and being scalded by steum charged with heatened powder gases. On the outer margin of the regions of destruction the explicion at losions must have shot up mud and water from the river for I found mud adherring to everything within view as if mud had rained down. Casulaties also resulted from the rain of fulling stones, crashing roofs and wallf walls of houses, and as had been frequently a stated, heat from the flashes was intense and frequent, and is supposed to have caused many deaths.

After returning on the boat to Abbieann, visits were made to more interesting places which T was told was slightly not so badly injured including the boautiful parks. Te erived there o at noon on the third day after leaving Adeheleid. There was at that time a slight trace of sunshine, but the vast columns of smoke rising from the forest fires which rose probably to a height of fifteen to twenty thousand feet was still a blot. On passing the main site of Abbieann we had only a view of what the raging waters would permit. All this scenery of disaster may seem intering and worth exploring for by many suppose, but it has left to me a forlorn melencholic feeling, something of a feeling that tells of a sad occurance a droudful event of the past which the world itself could not atone for. This long letter Your Excellency I trust will serve to show the members of the cemini at least in a general way the nature of the observations we were able to make for the sake of our Cause, but _ trust it will in time be followed by a critical discussion of the very characteristic explosions which desolated such large portions of country and eplit five hundred miles of country with fissures, sunk one whole country, destroyed wast forests, end made seas of water where cities and towns had been, and devastated such otherwise large prilons of charming lands we had hoped to visit.

As I know, soon after the diseaser around Abbieman the Abbiemania Weather Eureau itseld had sent to the Abbiemania geogloical survey for examination of a bit of the dust, and rocks of the explosion debris collected abourd a river attempt miles from the scene of the nearest explosion to see whether it was of volcanic material or not, so the real nature of the diseaser could be proved. To this was added later some of the erupted sund and mid which fall on the roofs and streets of mildred reenham, and the source of the material, whether from the locality of Abbieman, or Adelcheid. Therefore when recleved from Cancral mendro Eurgar for addy the material which he too collected at Abbieman north during his investigations for the Abbiemania Geographic goothies, I recleved much pleasure in cearching for the source of the dust. Headro mendre pargurar collection embraces must precise as most of which came from the region of Abbieman. All the speciments resulted from explosive forces. Not one particle is lava, pumice or anything brought up by any kind of volcanic eruptions. The rocks of the blanted regions thrown up by the explosions are remarkably simple, and belong to all kinds of rock, granite being the leading, and Linestone and Sandstone folliwing "The region from Abbieum past Mildregreem Mildreg greenburg is composed largely of thos clasted kind of rock. In the prevailing rock of the collection, sandstone is the main kind. In closely allied specimens, something relating to marble, and even coal, and peat comes in and increases untill in a few of the specimens it shows the rock belongs to the granite and sandstone type.

To il ustrate the strange products of the explosion activity of pengall state previous to the explosion horror of that fatal midnight, with the hope of finding evidences of what the eru eruptions really were, examples were also collected of materials found stuck to the ruins of many buildings in any ruined town or villiage not touched by the floods, and also that among wreckage found in stream and where Lunsin, and even from Mildred greenburg Junction. The other spriffers enbruce boulders from Adelencia, fragments from greatlin and many after places, and send and clay. All of these were good examples of all material but entirely lacking the proper materials so well known as lave or colled molten magma. We me the rocks look the colled of granite n and sundatone, and only on a second closer look one percieves that from some strange cause many of these are repeared full of strange holes or marks. The rocks very in color. Most of the structure is of course limestone. From the river shore near Abbicann is an interesting specimen of black sandstone. In addition to this fragments of granite were obtained at twenty other localities. All specimens differ from the others. There is only the alightest trace of quartz.

Fut every evidence of these stones, with ground dirt, found, , , endro regards as not from any marine or surface cruption or volcanic activity, for he also says, an eruption that would break out at one place, last a second, quiet down and break out anew continually at different places for fifteen minutes if happening would be an unusual case indeed. In if there could be found any such rocks belonging to those that would give evidence of volcanic activity it might have happened, and a strange thing indeed, but there is no sign of any moiten like rocks, neither is there any trace of fieldspar, hyperathem, , magnetite, , ground mane, phenoryst, pingiociose, , endedtes or other such volcanic rock. There is neither rundee accrise or any other kind, the rock fragments are generally normal.

There is suce our evidence that the explosive enegry in this section was far from the cause of colonic activity as many bolisved. The strungest material consist of merely ground dust, the color being the usual grayed gray of dust seen in a country road. The s Riversteamship the Mic-Hamer was in the river herbor of Mildred creenburg about a hundred miles from the place of the nearest of the explosions, and sand and dust and rocks came on its decks. The color of the dust was similiar as elsewhere. From dust found of different colors it is also believed the force of the explosions might have pulversied the rocks and ground dirt. A communison of the material ejected by the plasts discovers under the microscope certain difference between the two kinds of dust, but chemical analysis which deals with a larger quantity them a thin section and which recognized small difference by means of analyses being made proves the dust was from ground, and roadbods and send from river shores or from sendstons.

There is a small empount of mercel, and only a small empount of herden stone of which menume connect guess. Nest of the greater portion of the finer material which fell on the decks of surviving ships was derived from the ouden pulverization of solid limestone and granite by the explosions. Boulder stones, and even house bricks and fregments of concrete are also present, morter and forest deris debris also, but at least helf of the mass if sendstone, and the particion are too fine for discrimination with they the maked eye, but under the microscope are found to be dust of limr, lime and other stone, mixed with a larger proportion of ground dust, except that the proportion on the ground dust seems larger at the granter distance and this is to be expected for the brittle and lighter ground dust pulversizes and floots in the air more easily than the mileral particles.

Many exploded rocks were picked up from the remaining streets of the ill fated city of Abbieumn. It contained stone undertail of ull kinds, and the imagest pieces of which there are many are composed of cement stone and cobbin stone. In this rain of exploded debria the fine and light were carried down with the image fragments but it is evident that much of the finer and lighter material was shot up by the explosions to gra great heights above the large heavy fragments to be appread for and wide by the under currents. If for beyond Abbieumn, the dust had for appread so that it fell even in Calvorine.

 If we your Majest consider now the most complete analyses, those of pargar they appear chemically to fall into two main groups, granite, and saundatone, and therefore; can assume that the figure given for these stones is correct, and mount tyst that we have here a proof of cases that the eruptions could not have occured from any underground sources, and that the fragments of debris from every blast is equally alike. Therefore that the eruptions were volcanic as many believe is highly improbable, and I doubt greatly that the explosions came from any kind of natural causes. In most other respects analyses show these facts from the condition of the explosion j ejecta, likewise the high granite and limestone.

Therefore how is it possible that these eruptions could come from volcenic disturbunces, and should have ejected from the same vent as many times at the same time, and fallen with such disasterous effects upon _delehcide?

Even had this happened it soems beyond the bounds of the possible that an explosion would occur like this from underground sruptions. Is it an unwarrented suspicion that the activity was volcanic. It is hoped that this point can be made clear by the editor of newspapers, and the chemest who made who madeves.

As to so many statements the announcement in science implies that the explosions came from strange underground activity of volcanic origin but there is no proof whatsoever that this is so. The interval evidence of the analysis itself plats most points ment strongly to explosions as the source, and I and general pargar shell so regard it untill proof to the contrary is forthcoming. The wreckage left by the explosions is given in the original publication as such, without any statement to the contrary. The reason why the materials thrown up by the explosions is that because of what they consist, especially fine send wet and dry end ground earth and dust, clay, and limeatone and even mud and some portions of crusted quickennds, which were blown high into the the air.

If the above ing inforences are justified we find then that while the ejecta from the from the explantane are of the same material from the same creters and they do not vary in the composition, and between the eje ejacta they do not show ant any difference by which it is to appear easy to distinguish the product from or of one crater from that of the other.

Possibly, as I have already admitted further careful investigation will not near out the conclusions above suggested, but the evidence in their support are so strong at present that reag geologists and chemests will do well to put them to further and decisive proof. The any analyses aff afford room for speculation in other directions also. If it bistrue as said If it is true as said, that the deaths in cities not totally leveled by concuesion resulted largely from strongulation from the fumes of the explosions and blasts of power and powder gases, the source of this gas is not far to seek, for there might have been liquid explosives contained in quantty which blown in the air would act as deadly hot fumes.

In many places the testimony as to powder fumes of deadly nature in the smoke and dust clouds is overwhelming and the odor of posion gases under favorable conditions, perceptible miles out at sen itself, but it does not appear to have been formed from volcanic cruptions, as shown by my analysed, which further accounts for the nature of the explosions. It is not my opinion necessary to assume the prior existance of pader aulphates in the explosives powders, for while there may have been such in soke some there might not have been any in others. In making further als analyses chemests should be particular to ascertain the condition of the rocks, enden and not be content to report it simply as probable crupted fragments of magma without further comment. Fork of this kind is surely worth doing well, especially for our cause, or it were better to be left undone.

It may be here said that in the analyses showing much limestone and granite, and ground dust and earth are absolutely a fact. The exact error due to the fe ef effect of too quok an examination causes difficulty in correcting, and ascertaining ascertaining the total and right ammount of rocks, which serves as the bases for calculating the rocks.

I could allude to one real disagreement between one analyses reported by the chemest of the reographic Department, and that by the Geological survey, this relates to the presence of real pumics and scorial rither we of the Ceographic Societies have overlooked straces of lava because of some inherent defect in our method, or the Geological survey has counted as love something which looked like but we not that elemental may as say as the result of our experience for many years, that I looked for same and found no trace of pumics of coria, and that handrady of realyzes have been ends without finding any trace of lava .Dargar mortioned with some reserve of finding much copper slate, and other kind of mineral in his specimens of dust from the elevated part of what is left of Abbisons. This absention I believe to be quite correct. I also found it in sixteen specimens from the crater adge near Abbisons. We said on report it because of the apportunities estably present for its introduction from outside, but my personal belief is they that it is as unuversally distributed through rocks as any one of the other metals, though of course in very small ammounts. Some of the points refered to in this unusually long letter your Excellency may with great advantage be dwelth upon at a grouter length in a future letter or publication, when further data are available, for examination and discussion.

From the decks of the ship called the peechnut, about fifty miles south of Abbieum the captism claimed that by half past twelve, the sky overhead became everaget, and tinted a strange sackcloth black color, and that what surprised him still more fine whitesh gray dyst dust began to fall at about one oclock or later. He conjected a volcanic cruption from some point, and reported such things to be, Therefore on my reference to a chapter longer for the latter, I can give an account of the reports of fine dust, which fell on vessels on many rivers of the country within a radiance of the explosion territory and which came from the region of oxylosions. One captian reported to me thus,

"I was astonished to find strange dust coming upon the decks of my ship, and bolieved there might have been a tornado somewhere which clouded the sky with so much dust that it settled down to where my ship was. I bottled a sample of it. On my arival in Sucremento in Abbieannia and hearing of the supposed volcanic eruption near A Abbieann, I concluded it came from there although we were six hundred miles northwest of that region.

The experience goes thus, I had arived withthe ship near Mic-Hollester City, in Calverinia, some five hundred miles couth of abbienni, the weather being fine and clear. Between Twelve end fifteen minutes after twelve midnight, I and my crew were awakened and aroused by many reports as of the heaviest artillery firing violent volleys incossantly, and cone consternation started as my crew thought the enemy was firing upon our ship. We started full speed ahead, but shortly afterward, while the ship was cutting through the water a strange dense black cloud appeared moving down from the north , from the direction of Bengall State, five hundred miles north of us, and gradually rolled and moved southeastward, and spread. Within three hours the whole sky u was overcast, there was a strange smell of exploded powder in the air, and two hours later a shower of strange dust began to fall, and it grew as dark as erebus. Policying now it was the cause of a far distant volcamic eruption that was unusually sudden and violent we headed southward, the weather being so dark that we could not dis tinguish anything at a distance of fourty feet. At this time the dust was pouring down and speedily covered the decks to the depths of one third of an inch. About twenty miles from Mic-Hollester City the dust was so dense as to cause more total darkness/. For hald the half the night the dust contonued to fall continually and tward morning it commenced to clear to the southwestward, and the early morning stars were occassionally visible. We steamed through this strange rain of dust for a disaste disa distance of one hundred miles in a direct line from Mic-,ollester city to pandora, and at a low estimate a little one two inches of strange gray dust fell on the decks. All that time the wind was north. "

From the ship called the Mayday the reo report came from the captien as thus; "The only unusual thing noticed during the passage was the strange action of the river water, glowing fashes in the far distunce, and the discolering of the river water, which was a dark grayish tint, which appeared at first to be to me volcanic ashes, but which on examination showed to be some strange kind of oil. classwhere the water assumed its natural blue.

started rising in the northwest, and wit within three hours covered the whole started rising in the northwest, and wit within three hours covered the whole sky. At the came time a strange fine white colored substance started falling, which by morning covered the decks to the depth of one inch. The wind during the incident was northeast, and blowing strong. During that time I heard a very loud booming like rolling thunder continuing for fiteen minutes, in the north and northwest, and the shower of dust covered rigging, deck and smoke stacks. The cloud northwest warm sometimes cool; the moon having a strange reddish color. And a violent vibration was felt throughout the ship for about fifteen minutes, as if going over the top of a hill, supposed to be the effect of a submarine oithwquake. "Yours truely.

I.F. minuse."

It's surely intensely interesting, long as the letter is" said starving. This "This letter if not exaggerated shows the nature of the disaster, but as it is only a duplicate of the real copy which, can tell by the carbon nature of the writing it would not do me no harm and keep it untill can present it to the deverner of calverinia. But let's go shead. We have delayed long because of the letter."

"I don't see nothing yet., said" Jennie," but have the others sit or lie down and we can go forward and scout."

"Not as yet eaid Starring. "We cannot sit or lie down here now, for only a lttle little aboe above is the top. If you girls fell feel tired 1811 have some of the hand to help you alo g."

"no we can make it and display and property your saying that you see something suspicious has been on the elect." a d and he saw she had drawn her pigtol and so had Angeline

Padeliffe and even the Calverinian general."

Starring eignalled a commend, h h which only soldiers and the wirls could understand and they deployed into columns and at enother signal separated a little more and then moved forward more cautiously. However when they had reached the summit, they were very willing to lie down, for they were all in a pelting sweet. They were de loyed as before, and the officers commanded all to be on the lookout. "This is strange, said Jennie. "But of this hill I have heard much, but this region I have been usen before. But let us beware of being caught naping, for it might cost us doar. There is appearance we are near enemy territory. They say you know that parts of pengall county is in enemy possession now."

"No 2 flow " said starring to Radeliffe. what do you think of this advanture no far."

"Sir" said the boy scout,"I was almost beat out of heart when surprised once by the fires, but I thank you for accompanying me and the girls and trusting us as your guar guardians. And I remember now what yield, and her sisters have told me, namely. "That the way to heaven or success is up a ladder,, and the way to defeat or perdition is down a hill. But I had rather see the adventure through than abandon it so soon."

"But " said Jonnie with intent to k joke a little; "But the proverb is, to abandon a dangerous advanture is easy."

"Yes" said gadeliffe," but in that case the day comes, when in my opinion, deserting a arry because you are ar afraid of excitement will result in disgrace and destruction."

"Tis a good boy scout " said starring. "you have given us a right good answer."

Then the girls did smile, but the boy scout did blush ...

"Come" every one, said Angeline. "Let's all eat a bit, while we remain here to sither rost ourselves ourselves or keep a look out for the unseen danger. For we have now plenty of prosions you know."

They all thought it a good advice, and they all had a share of the things they had recieved in the camps.

"I thought we all had something worth while" said Starring."

"Yes" so we have said Radcliffe but it shall be as I said it should, when at first we came together after you found me, that all of us should be a sharer in the good things of the camps."

flow when they had eaten and drank, and had chatted a little longer, and kee kept their eyes and ears open in the meanwhile, Starring suid;

"The day will soon be wearing away, so let us prepare to going."

They all rose up to continue the march, and the girl scout being the guides went in defore, but jennie forgot to take her pottle of smelling salts with her, so she sent one of the soldiers to fetch it, and he returned readily enough.

Then said Jennie;

"I think this is a suspicious neighborhood.gir what is the cause of your suspicions."

"So Starring made unswer;

"It is because I'm sure I observed a sudden and strange movement o in the busishs pushed and as there is not the slightles" elightest breath of air I was suspicious. We must all keep wakeful and not allow ourselves to be caught unawares. We must all watch closely in every direction as we continue on, for I do not like the discovery. If our purpose for the expendition is known we'll have note of excitement I'm afraid, especially if we are in enemy terro territory."

When they had reached half way down the other side, they percieved a large glen, and before it tward a road, a column of troopers in gra; galloping out of sight, and starring just in time caught sight of a yellow flag with the words;

"Let the Christian dogs that sees this banner take head, That into glandelinian territory they do not go, Lost is heading not, and into here they spead, They'll regret meeting as a changerous foe."

200

This was indeed a startling surprise for starring and others who had seen this,,, and starring said;

"We are probably in the territory of the enemy already. This bet would be enough to make raw recruits aircle to continue on such an adventure. For my part I'm tempted to attack them. What you say Angeline pichese."

"It is ike like the saying or the wise"Baid shew the first attacker is generally the surpriser. But what time shall be given us to overtake them."

"I'll try." said gtarring, "I'd like to capture that insulting ring at lount."

So Starring issued an order for all to mount, and two of the party rushed off in two directions to intercept the Glandelinian cavarry while gtarring and the rest wont on shead. Starring was a strong powerful man, and so he and his followers were not afraid of a landelinian cavarry squadron of any size, and no one yet in his cand were ever gide to cring cobind, but were always the first to meet an enough, now as they came upon the readway where they had nown the clamacinian cavarry, they heard the noise of a fray, and knew that the other two parties had successfully intercepted the Glandelinians and was driving them forward tward his cand.

now halting his column Starring draw his sword, with intent to parricade the way of the glandelinians, in spite of the flores charge they might make as he was wished to capture their horses and what supplies they had and their samey flag... Then there appeared the foremost of the retreating glandelinian column.

Then said Starring. "Come forward boys, do not let the Glandelintum pannus, go into them nara. We are going on adventures but it is well for un to have a fray once in a while. I'll do us good. We have come forth to withstand these rebels and to that end will back our purpose."

No to say the truth by reason of the flerceness of these glandelinians, and of the grim carriage of their horses. Starring advised the girls for their own suke to go to the rear, as he did not wish them in the fray. The glandelinians came thundering on, panic stricken because of the sudden attack by the two columns, but gtarring and his men were ready for them and let go a resounding volley of pistols that staggered the Glandelinians, and they started retreating for the open spaces.

"Stop them" shouted gtarring. They are going through the gien, and this is the gq way they must not go, for if they do we won't obtain our wish."

Starrings men galloped forward. Then did the carbines and pictols of both sides roar so hadiously that the din excited the girls themselves, but the landelinians though three to one against the three attacking parties were routed in panic, Starring outrifing outriding their captian, and giving him a downright blow, knowing him off his horse, while a sta stray shot brought the horse down upon his knees. Some other soldier captured the yellor banner, and a revolver besides.

The loss on both sides, however was slight, being mostly in horses, Starring lost two killed, and five severely wounded, the Alandelinians Io killed, and one hundred wounded Leaving the Glandelinians to take care of their dead and wounded, Starring and his bands took off the captured horses, and plenty of weapons and ammunition and a few prisoners besides.

When the conflict was over Starring said;
"Come now, every one and follow me through the glen, and we can get out of side before the noise of the conflict bring sether glandelinians to the scene."

They galloped through the glen taking the prisoners with them, about fourty. About two hours later they came in eight of a small forest town, while on Investigation proved to be friendly, and they soon were riding into it with their prisoners, but they made the more haste after this to go thither, because of the glandclinians it is dangerous traveling in the daylight. So when they rode into the town there areas a hubbub among the people who came running out to see who were coming. They did not stop however untill they came to what Starring knew to be the Sheriffs office,, and he readily dismounted, and the sheriff before coming on the ouids oried ouid.

"Who is there pleaseo?"

But when Starring answered "It is I, the sheriff somehow or other seemed to know his voice and came out, for starring in his sarlier days had often come there for starring knew this town and many of the people. Then the sheriff came down from the upper prtion of portion of the hou. house, he opened the docor, and aceing starring with his large party said;

"How now general gtarring"What is your business here in this town at this time.?

I thought you was far away within the christian lines!"

"I am out on an advence adventure of a most important kinds answered starring. "I have brought my column of troopers, and three child scouts along. I had been here some time ago, had, not been tempted to attack a squadron of Glandelinians a little way down the road. But I and my troops captured their ammunition and a number of horses, since the region is teeming with plundelinians thought it best to come here and give you warning. You know there's no telling what they'll do if they come upon this town."

"I am glad you have come to warn us. 2 said the Sheriff: "Will you not go in and stay till morning."

"Not I " Baid Starring." I will return to my command immediately and guard the town till your population can retreat in safty taking what belongings they need to telling what might happen. The two girl and boy scouts may remain with you during the night however if they so wish."

"Oh sir, said the Sheriff "I know not how unusual you are so willing to leave our town in your possession, yet you are so faithful and loving to your own townsfolk , you have so often fought so stoutly for us, you have been so nearty in consecting of us, that we shall never forget your favor to s us. And we'd os foolien to fear hen when your column is here to protect the town."

"Then said Angeline Richaes, "Oh that we might have the company of your mon citizens to our journeys end How can such poor women and children in this town hold out in a exodus when the way is so full of troubles without the guardianship of our commands. You all need a friend and defender untill you are safe in a good strong hold."

Then said Rudeliffe;

"Pray Mr Sheriff, be persauded to go with us, because it will be better. We'll all soon have to leave as if the enemy comes at o in strong force we would have to go and they 11 burn the town. And the way is dangerous as it is and you going along without an escort is an sucide."

"How about it" asked the Sheriff of the Calverinian officer, for starring had

"I am at general general general general gaunders. "If he should allow us to be your guide quite through, I will willing wait upon you. I will tell him your desires to night. However at present , must withdraw, and so my good child scouts adine for the night."

Then the Sheriff, acked Jennie of her mission, and she said;

"I came from conoral Vivions command. We are after important information from the enemy."

"How said the Sheriff " are you after information." She told him then the whole story, and she then addied- "I and this girl here and the boy act is guides as we know the country and the lay of the land but the troopers and their officers do not. He (pointing to madeliffe) is the best of usecouts, and our favorite friend."

The boy blushed as she said this ... Then the Sheriff rans his b 11 for the maid, and there came to his response a young white uniformed girl. And to her the Sheriff suid;

"Go and prepare rooms for my three guests, and tell it to my wife, that three of general vivians famous child ecours have come to spend the night with me."

She obeyed the command, andow and what a noise for joy and gladnessthere was among the household, when the maid but did just saw the first few words . Every one came with the greatest haste to the front door, the Sheriffs wife and children also, for the three child scouts estill stood at the door talking to o e one of the towns policemen. Then said the Sheriffs wife.;

"Come in my friends, come in, you girl and boy scouts of that best of all christian generals, come in with all that are with you. Q"

So Jennie turmer led the way in, and they o followed the maid, who led them into a very large and most neatly furnished room, where they were viuuen to sit uown of which they obeyed obeyed. The sheriff then saluted them with a kies, for he really understood who that they were, and he said;

"Weo Welcome, ye servants of the greatest country, and ye vessels of the grace of our Blessed Lord, welcome to us."

However it was now somewhat late, it was growing dark outside, and because the two girl and boy ecouts were weary with their journey, and also overexcited at the sight of the second fight with the Glandelinians, they desired to make make preparations to go for rest as soon as possible.

"Nay" said the Sheriffs wife, "It is better for you to refresh yourselves with a supper, for we have suspected of your coming, knowing you were in our location being informed by a city constable, and therefore had had supper prepared for you half an hour ago.

They therefore had the supper which was prepared for them, and then when they had ended their grace after meals they desired to go to bed as they surely did feel tired and sleepy. So the Sheriffs wife led them up to a bed room prepared for the two girls, and the one for the two boys,,,. While they were at rest, Angeline and jennie for a few minutes talked about some things that suited their fan fancy...

"Little did , ever believe once, that when important things are needed to be learned that we would be selected as the party." said Jennie. "And I even as little thought of lying in one of the beds belonging to some of the Sheriffs children" said Jennie as we do now." "nd much lest tess did , ever think of scoing our adventure through so far without hinderunce, and yet now I believe we shall be successful in our undertak Ing.."

"Hark did you hear a noise!" taked Jennie .

. .7 / S

"Yes I believe it sounds to me like it is music from some band, maybe to calebrate our coming.

number can surely give wonderful musics said Angeline _ichees. I like music also in the house, but there should also be music in the heart, just us there is music in heaven when a sinner repents."

Thus they talked for a short time, and then they went to sleep.go in in the d following morning, when they had reawakened, Jennie said to Angeline gichee, inwhat was you saying in your sleep last night?! suppose you was in an exciting draum " was" said Angeline Biches "And an exciting dream it i was, but are you sure,,, was talking in my sleep. "Yes you spoke excitedly and loudly, but please tell me what your dream was like." "I was are dreaming, said Angeline, that was riding all along in a forested valley, and was bemcaning of the sufferings of our states, and of the news of the war progressing with favor for the foe. Now , had not ridden on my way attn long , when , became conecon conscious that many were gathering about me but in hiding probable to watch me, and to hear what it was that I was saying . As I realized that some unknown parties were evesdropping on me, I also heard sounds ad as if some werelaughing at me with that 1 sl; slyin slyly drew my pistols, in and advanced cuutiously tward the spot As I did so I happened to look in the other dire direction, and saw some one coming on me o tward me on horseback with such speed that the horse might as well had wings. He came directly to me and said;

"Angoline, what ails you. Do not go there. It's am ambush."

When he had heard me explain my suspicions, he took hold of my horses reins and said; "Angeline c'me follow me. "So he rode onward and I followed till we came to an open clearing. There he made some kind of a single, and in a moment I was currounded by Angelinium soldiers. So I awoke from my draum, but did I talk loudly

In my alcen. "You sure did" said rennie," and well you might tak talk in your sleep, to see yournelf get off no well when almost running into unseen danger. And you must give me leave to tell you that , believe it was a good dream, a good dream of warning. and as we might have almost find the first incidents alon almost like the dream so we must be cautious to the last. God speaks once, even twice sometimes a dozen times, and yet man does not percieve it. He sometimes speaks in a dream, or in a vison of the night, when we are in the deepest alsop. Cod has often visited muny when asleep, and god has spoken also to our hearts when asleep, either by words, by proverbs, by signs, warnings; as well as if one is arake."

"Well I am gind of my oream" said Angeline" but however you know we are not suppose to believe in aroums."

'I know that" and _mennie, but I think it is now time for us to rise; and to find what me must do. I see the enemy as yet has not come near the town. Thank God." "Pray if the town invites us all to stay for a while, let us willingly accept the offer, so we may rest long to be fit for the continuation of the journey. I am more willing to stuy a while here in this town." "We shall find out what they will do" said Angeline. "B t if the enemy does come we couldn't stay and the town would have to be abandoned.

They were up and ready in a few minutes, being fast in dressing, and then they came down. And the Sheriff anked them how they rested, and they both said it was very good, and as of the best nights I dging they had since they became girlp girlscouts in the arm m army.

Then said the Sheriff-"If you two girls will be persauded to stay here with your companies for a while, you and they will have what the house and the town can afford."

"We will be willing with a very good will." said Jennie. So they consented with a purpose o to stay there untill Starring and the Calveriniam officers desired to go on again. And because the sherff wished to see how Angeline Riches had profited by their adventure so far, he asked leave of her to questionthadtaid her and Jennie. Jennie rave free consent. Then he began at Angeline.

"Are you sure Miss Fich se, that no on one can tell who are responsible for the big disasters.!"

"It seems that way but I'm suspicious." enswered Angeline. "I'm sure though I connot give evidence yet that the Manleyo had all to do with it, bucked by the glandelinia

"Sood girl. And can you tell what really exploded. Were the explosion a volcanic as some believe or did the enemy do it?" "I firmly believe the enemy made the explosions of all disasters." "Good girl still. But how do you suspect that the enemy could be responsible!"

"By the nature of the glandeliniens."

"whom among the glundelinium cenerals do you suspect. !!!" "John, Manley, Huebaum Manley, His father Johnston ,acken ,anley, and their staff.

"And can you suspect who ordered their making /?"

The "The Three Purleys .. "

"But if that is the case do you suspect where the Harleys might have secured all the manitions for the making of all those explacions. It is proved the explacions or explosives could not be taken from our own side!"

"By manufacture in his own country." "How did i' be transported here. "?

"Ty slick methods unknown to us." "And who are really responsible do you think in another sense!"

"The Culverinian Government from overconfidence."

"And who could have saved Calverinia from this awful hell of devastation?" "The Calvarinian Covernment, back by those of other states if she had been more wary and and watchful. The Government did not think the enemy could go that fer, or dared."

"But how could our State Governments save her in time!"
"By fortifiying every point of such danger with troops and artillery, and keeping soldiers in strong numbers on the watch day and night."

"But how could this save Calverinia!"

"By also strengthening all river dikes,, and keeping away all persons from the territory that cannot give satisfactory answers, or show in the proper passports und passes."

"And how do you know that could save Calverinia, since the enemy also is crafty?" "By strengthening every such point of danger, where levees are, having all our standing armies not used on the fields of batte battle to guard every river levee and dike, to fortify dams and lakes, and to keep every one not known away if necessary by force."

Then said the Sheriff" You are to be commended for thus knowing and giving such good advice. I suppose I need not ask Jannie these questions, since she too would give me the same answers no doubt. I will therefore continue to apply my questions to you. That is the worse disaster do you believe happened?"

"It is much disputed" said Angeline. Yet either one of the disasters are unasual so made by the wicked landelinian Generals, but as many suid, and wrote, the Abbieunn and pengall State flood and explosion horror was the greatest."

"what do you suppose the Culverinian Government can do to save the rest of the stae state from such future disasters."!

"Why such future disasters if they come as great again as Abbicann or the others and result in so mighty a flood, than non none can pull out the state from the effects of the horrors as already known, wo ld need the assistance of every country around alo t us to pull us through, and therefore, think that none can pull us out of the clutches of gthese disuster makers but Our lessed Lord, and that God is so good and loving to man that $_{\rm I}$ know in the near future He'll help our Government find a way and means to pull Calverinia out of the quicksands of disaster, and aid Calverinia to recover from her miserable condition. """""

"What is supposed to be done by the Culverinium Government saving the state?" "We cannot tell yet but that glandelinia, who has brought calverinia into this state of suffering and ruin, and misery can also be made to atone."

"What would be your design in saving of palverinia from these disasters in the fuu future!"

"I have stated it before."

"How!"

"The strengthoning of every levee, to have them guarded by roops and artillery and fortifications, and to have scouts watching all approaches night andday night and day. This success woulf glorify our cause, and we then could Glorify Gods "ame all the more, ask more for His grace and Justice, and the overlasting protection of all the Calverinian creaturessesses"

"B t who are they that must do the work that will cause Calverinia to be saved from future disasters!"

"Those that accept to do the work in behalf of calverinia's Salvation."

"You are a good bright goil scout aANGELINE RICHEE, you have learned your mission well, and you have harkened good to ha what your teacherschave instructed to you in your girl scout school. But are you willing I should questen you further!"

"If the glandelinians are responsible for these disasters, what may her purpose be!" ""Violet, and her sisters o told me landelinia hopes to davastate Calverinia, so she'll have a clear way to carry on her war to success."

"What is your opinion?"

"That clandeliniak nowing that calverinia is a place, blessed by God, desires to devastate it to spite Him, because He dwells here in spirit in all our Holy atholic

"Thy is Calverinia now called" Hell", ??????

"Recause by these disasters she seems to have to in turned into a state, most wofefu wooful, because now it isthe dwetting place, of horror, fire, and death .. ? . "

"why would you desire to see the enemy,, driven out of galverinia.?" "That I may see her restored, that I my see her cities and towns a bar lack and her period to restored to a peace of mind and happiness, for they are the kind that desire to give god, and serve nim of the at well income, and leve him evertuaintly and therefore they do not decory all this."

"A very good saying, and which shows you have certainly learned well. I'll ack now if Blandelinia had been suspected before she started making these disasters, if she could have been able to carry out her foil plans."

"No, for then the Abbieunnium and all her state Governments would have been prepared, nor could standstinia had ever obtained passession of any leves of the rivers. Clandelinia certainly aid not warn us of her vile purpose, and therefore we could not be prepared.

"What do you think of Culverinia's future!"

"It will be the same or worse if hor Governments did not learn a lesson from the horrible disasters of the past."

"Is there nothing written therein in our histories of what you understand?" "Yes a great deal."

"If therev s is anything in a history that you do not understand what do you

2" I study it out and pray to God and ask His lessed Mother to ask Him to help me learn that winch which must or that He knows will be for my good."?
"Do you believe landelinia will ever be made to pay for all this?"

"I believe she shall, and dearly too, and if the war goes on in the future our own armies I'm sure will repay her in the same nature, though not of course with a ravengful method but as a punishment or ea means to bring the war to a speedy close. And I believe this upon a double account, first, because Emperor vivian has promished to do so, and secondly because he and his armies and or nation backing him up is able to perform all he threate.....

Then said the sheriff to the girls, You must still harken tothose who will teach you further, for they can learn you much Thene more You must also give ear to what all kinds of good inform formation you shall hear from others, for the sake of the good cause you will learn many important things. Observe als also also and that with carefulness, what even the heavens and the earth do teach you you for the good of the c ause, but especially be much in your mediation of what you are going to perform, for too that will be the cause f of our side winning this war to its proposer finish. I for my part my good girl scouts will teach you what I or my children who are also good scouts can while you are hear, and shall be glad if you and any of your followers will ask me questions, that tend to help ou you in your adventures. . Bbbbbbbbbbhat also ought to tend to godly edifying"

THEY HEAR SOME MORE STIRRING

STORIES.....

Now already these adventureres had been in this town for about nearly twenty four hours. During these hours the two girls had a strange t visitor that pretended some good will to them, but the man would not tell his name. He was aman of some unusual breeding, and that pretended he was a soldier and that he was also a christian spy, but by his action and b, by his speech and some vulgar language the two girls though they did o not say anything did not like him or trust him either. Hehad came twice during the days, first to Angeline Riches, and then to Jennie, and offered as it seemed service to her and her followers.

What made the girls feel somewhat uneasy was that they had been studying a map which was in the sheriffs office, and on this part cula particular day she was busying he self in looking carefully over the map which was that od of Calverinia, for she was always interested In maps, and therefore on this particular day she was tracing over the map, for she was desirous to look over somethingabout some of the flood and other disaster horrors.

And this man not knowing where or how she disposed of what she intended doing on the map for she did not take the map down from the wall but stul studied it where it hung, seemed to be greatly taken for that he found her or Angeline Richee never idle. Of course the two girls were downright suspicious suspicious, and she or they rather revealed the business to both the boyscouts enrod and Radellfr Radciffe, and inquired of the boys concerning this particular man, for thegirls felt sure the coys would have more suspicions than they and would have more time to watch him more carefully.....

The two boys shadowed him like a hidden gohst troop, and finally discovered that he also was a very busy man, and enrod told the two girls, that he was one that pret nded to be a friend, but was as a they feared, a spy trying to learn what they and Starring intended to do, and what they were journeying for.

b" B Now then said Angeline Hichee" will look no more on him for if he is a spy he will have to look out. I purpose never to have a glog on Calverinia" soil."

"Penrod then replied"There is no matter of greater discouragement to be given to him but that you and Jennie continue so as you had begu begun to do with the map, and then suddenly wheel on him with a drawn pistol and that will quickly cool his courage."

So the next day he came he found her at her old work, looking over the map and trying to draw or copy it also. Then said he "What, always at the same old map. Are you cruzy kids?"

"Yes "Said she "I am sty studying the map for my own use."

"And what can you do with such a map as that?"

"I do these things"Said she' "That I may be rich in my good efforts to lay up a store for a good foundation against the time to come that I myself might lay hold on eternallife whether others have a chanc chance to do so or not."

"2Why but what do you intend to do with the map steal it?"

"Why do unything as I please" said she.

"Your answers are silly and foolish..... "said he, he. "Well I might be.2" she answered.... "Are you a spy!!!"""she asked. At this question his countenance fell. and after this he did not come to her or her companion again... when he had left her The sherrif himself said it "Did I not tell you that when he was af aid of being discoe discovered that the man would wickly formuke thecese thee. Yea he will raise up and repot report us here to the enemy no doubt, for notwith notwithstanding his preterse of being a friend, and his seeming attention to you, yet he surely must have been a spy trying to learn why all of your force is here in the town.

"I might have been sha owed by many spice tofeny near said An allow tienes, though I did not speak of it thank me one, but they werk such as did not allows me any for I all aga kopt my a co ofen. I could have had many other girl and boy scouts come

"Ith me but they were much as either ild not like m, conditions of travel or rere comewhat afraid, though never ild may be of them find fault with m, intentions

tut otherwise I and they would not agree

"Woll for our own days everything is set by for the best" said Jennie" therefore the practice which is not for by thy conditions, there are but few that can abide, orpecially this Mind of adventure you are having."

" Well" said the Sherife wife-de-k-knife"I never worry if none of those are courageous to go with me or not in case went on sar oxpedition, but to my mimind they would go just the same or be branded as a spy-"

'If no one is nervy enough to go with use said Angeline, I will leave them behind for I connot change my plums , and to whave a follower who might get soured and run away in time of need, I purpose never to admit as long as I go out. I had a follower that had a companion a year ago, but either one of them couldn't agree, one was afraid, the other was brave to rashness, and bocause I was resulved to do as I beg n, therefore the one who was afraid disappeared before we knew he was gone. We have never seen him since." .

"And yet he was supposed to be a professional boy scout I'll warrant you." "No she was a girl scout, yet such a one as she was, and yet I hope there are fow like her she was a foriegner too, therefore I do not trust them unless I know them us well as my A.B.& C.s."

At this moment one of the officers of the adventurous party was brought in to the Sheriffs home seriously injured. He had been out scouting and was surprised by some of the enemy hidden in umbush, and he was the only survivor of thirteen Calverintan soldiers who had followed him-nis injuries indeed was severe, and he surfered wery muchee m pain, as if he was being burned there with a red h ot iron. Angeline midbagged the Sheriff to send o for a physciam, and within a few minutes he came le was led into the room, and after he had observed the injured officer, he concluded that his injury was more serious than supposed. Then he anid to Angeline secing she was dressed like a leader;

"How did this coldier come to be injured in this town?"

"ile went out scouting said she.

"Well" said the physican "this soldier was tempering with things he should not have done, without your knowing it. He must be operated on or he will die. The hullet must be removed."

"Then ""Baid Jennie" That was that that you had suspicion of in the bushes before we rode into this town. You know you observed something on the left Hand which you warned as all of, and would have advanced but Starring advised you not to!" "True" said Angeline"I did see such clous movements among the thick shrubbery and the bushes, and if , had gone forward I'd of been shot probably. I did suspinuspect something, and yet I would have advanced thereof."

"I felt sure he and his party had run into some amitush," said Jennie. "And that which you m might have seen Riches to wit, those suspicious things among the shrubs and brushwood was probably an umbush being prepared for us. We were or are in a outskirts section of the enemy territory. I do marval that no one warned us of it. Hardly no one has survived going past or through an ambush, and I m surprised we passed through unharmed."

Being airighted at the scene of the wounded man the sheriffs children began to cry, and Angeline Riches said" Oh such things to happen, and oh careless soldiers

, hat shall . do if the thing keeps on happening."

"Come do not be too much dejected" said the Sheirff," the officer may do well well again, but he must allow the bullet to be removed." "Pray sir" to the doctor" try the utmost of your skill with him, hatever i it costs.

"I'll be reasonable" said the physician. The operation was performed. The doctor then told the sheriff that the officer would have to remain in the town for quite a spell for he coud could not continue with the conpany now for a long, long, time. When the officer after recovering from the effects of the sleep potion heard this, he was loathe to hear such but news, and though term with pain as if he should be pulled in pieces he stormed and said he must go.

"Come, come"said the physician you must take it my advice."

"It goes against my duty." said the officer.

"I must have you remain here .2 said Angeline Riches . "You will not be in condition to travel for months now."

"What shall , do then if the enemy takes the town ." gaid the officer.
"Pray sir" said Jannie, to the Shariff" now does the situation stand for the town... hera.ls it strong. !!!"

"It has a good strong defense." said the sh f sherif,.

"Oh colonel Matthews" said Jennie. "If you love your cause, if you love even us you must make up your mind to remain here wrill you are able to come." So with much ado after a short prayer for the ble soing of God upon the town he took her advice, and decided to remain behind."

The chariff then ask d of the paperation of this soldier!"
"Bir, what will you charge for the operation of this soldier!" And he answered." Mothing. I'll take it out of my own pocket for the good of the

Taraba and the same of the sam

That is an unusual question, jet this town is inn good place so far, it is good against all the dangers that may lark out in the open, and when it is well prepared for and we have a . large clearing around it it will keep such things as worries of dangers out of our mind."

"Pray sir, for in case of necessity will you ask make me up thirtien boxes of cartridges, for if , can getthese I'll need never to fear an ambush.

"These cartridges you ask for, said the shorif, are good and handy in case of an unexpected stack attack from incomen food, as well as to use in case you or your followers want to make a surprise attack. Tou I dare to said it, and stand to it that if any one will but use these kind of careldges as he or she should, it they will surely come in handy. But my good girl scouts you must use them carefully and do not waste them, for otherwise you wo will not have enough to do any good in helping you fight your way through an ambush. And never use them but for thay that purpose only."

So he gave to the two cirls, and also the to boyscouts as many of these bullets and cartridges as he could spare seeing they fifth fitted their june perfectly, and bed Penrod in special to take heed how he uses them in case of necondity. The girls remembered that the Sheriff had told them,,, that if they desiredo unytime they could ask him or his wife and children questions that might be of profit for their adventure, and they would give satisfaction as far as it as in the possibilities. Jennie herself therefore was the first,, to pop the question

"hy Why sir do you think for the most part, did the Glandelinian aurthorities probably order the greater commissioned landelinian ,,generals to create these awful disasters. Some say if it is true they did it to try to destroy the lives of wielet, and her sisters for that p purpose...!!"

That is a difficult question." said the Sheriffs wife herself. "It is in some probabilities true maybe of what you suspect, but probably the effects also are of a carnal wicked purpose."

"May does Manley then, if the flood and disaster horrors might end in his own undoing some day, continue the horrors up and past those of Abbiann?"

"To show that the totat general hopes that when the disasters have progressed to a good extent, it would work effectually for his purpose, to desolate the land so he may gain possession of it. For look, what one disaster after to cities, the others do to the land. The worse in my own sight or more devastating probably is the gigantic forest fires."

"Then said Angeline Richee . "What should we ourselves learn by seeing the flames of fires consume our forests, by seeing ourselves a partoker in a small part of the Abbieann disaster, and hear so

"By SERING such fires, we are tagget to keep our eyes peeled for what the enemy might try to do next. for he has fervent and hot desires to wipe out the whole forested regions of Calverinia if he can. And by the experience you say you had in Abbieum, though it is a marvel you are here to tell it, we are taught to be careful were we are not to go through aich such localities if the enemy is in the neighbor hood, for it teaches us that no matter how far we might be from the enemy or the war zone, the enomy can reach far of and devastates where we least expect.?"

"Where do you think the enemy gets the mutition to make such explosions!" "Probably out of their own country by so secret transportation?. W "What may we learn from that?"

"That all efforts should be made to destroy even such railroads that are open to glandelinia, and her fortified orte and cities, that the Government such fetch means to stop such transportations."

"Why do the landel inlams be able to empty all these explosions into the holes made under ground to mine up so to make the explosions!"

"To show that our own government and officials and even armies are all est out of proportions for emprepardness for such tricks. This also shows that our govern

" government should give out all efforts to frustrate such work in the fature." "Why has the explosions shaken the whole country every time!"

"This shoes that what the enemy used is of terrific force. This shows that our suspicion of what the enemy can do in the future if we are not watchful can be confirmed to us in our past experience. The explosions made rivers and lakes empty themselves upon the earth, and that the cland linious secre by give out to their warthorities that they know of Calcorinia and her slater states, that their mi ministers fate fatch their important discoveries to their operals, and to show that what they discovered is confirmed by what they are show in detail ."

"As I hear why do the limid-limins try to position or stop up all the springs that the from the sea and underground rivers to se through the curtification." "To show that alched Manual Inia in bound to conquer on the ach fair means or

ماط بذ؟

"why do the glandelinians start such forest fires first on the top of the hills, and in the valleys valleys?"

"I suppose to show that the "Landelini as near it in purpose to make these places the starting points of the forest fires, and to make it a better means to devustate the country and drive out armies before them by means of these fires.."

"But why do they also make these fires grow so immensely that the whole country has no sunshine for days and months and the country for miles is an dark as if a hundred big volcanoss were always eru, ting violently. ?"

"my does the fire fasten u on the candle stick!" contradicted the Sherlff.

"Because a match lighted by friction was attatchedto it."

"Well that to the cause too of the fires. To show that the Lindeliniums wiw wish to have the biggest conflagrations spring p ever where, and to devastate the might lest of woods, us wall as to lay waste the whole country side. I believe it is their best plan to make an effort to win the war."

"why is all their time, effort, and strongth spent to make all the mines, and got all the fires, when there is danger of christian armies catching them in the act, when they know the polanty, possibly and also to spent and maltain maintain the disasters in their continuance when the result would be disaster in their own ide in the ending!"

"To show that the landelinians are more reckless than the world knows or thinks, and that all the clandelinian officials spent themselves to maintain the rugin; of the disasters, showing in truth their nature, and what the glandelinian cenerals and their officials can and will do."

"Way bef re these disasters occured did not the Calverinian devermment have means placed to prevent such disasters.?" ecuate no one had any idea that glandelinia would re resort to such droudful acts, and also thereby to show that alandelinia wished to make sport of her enomics as the cat does of a rat or mouse she captures."

"What may one learn by hearing and seeing the results of all these disasters?" Theurn to remember Glandelinia wicked sin and Abbie mias resentment. The results also shows that the day is coming on, when Glundelinia shall rue all si the did and that her pin punishment might be as bad as if the general Judgement came upon her. for know what we can do if our side wins the war, and that we will and MUST."

Yow about this time It was removed a farte force of the enemy was seen to be approaching tward the torm, wherefore general Saunders came up and signedled to the girl and boy scouts in the house that it was bost for them to be up and going and an explus of the town was to start, while Starring and the rest were to hold off the enemy as long as it was possible.

Then said Penrod with regret i-

"We have to go. Is it not convienement that you forget not to send the warning through the town, and warn everybody, and that we too can conduct the people out of the town. You knowelf the enemy comes he'll burn the town and the woods around." "Good boy" said Jennie Turmer. "' 1 al most forgot."

So she drew up an order, and asked the sheriff to send it through the town by some fit man, and he obeyed.

Then Jennie told the Sheriff she too and all the rest were to go for and with the people, they called the whole house together, to give thanks to God for sending to the towns help such profitable guests and loaders of so splendid a column of troops, which done the Sheriffs wife said to both Angeline and Jennie;;

"And before we to shall we not show you some part of the town, according as our custom is to friends and visitors, on which you and your friends may mediate, when you continue in your way!"

"If we have time, yes, said the girls. "But for your own safty do not take too long. Starring will have to wait for us and he won't like it." So they took the two girl and boy scouts, up to the roof of a four story building and showed them the scenery of the town its prinicpal streets, and asked them what they thought of the town.

Then sald Jennie;

"It is a beautiful town alright, and its a chame if the enemy captures and burns It. Starein and his followers hope to hold them off. "

At this answer the shariff held up his hands and wondered. Then he led them to a still caller building up on to the roof, and showed them a high hill thickly forested. Now at that time there as a force of mountain and forest rangers seen on the symuit. The girls looked surgrised to see them on so high a hill top, and so did the boys. Then the sheriff was going to show them semething else, but Penrod said; "Pray let's stay here a little while longer, for this is a carried Dient indeca." And so they remained there footing their eyes on this so measual a pros sea. At a After this they came man to the Charters be me, and they were brought into a room where langing on the wall was a number of cart i carte cartridge belts.

"These are the cartridges you have asked for." seld the Sheriff"You can take them with you, for it is of absolute necessity that you should, that you ma, be able to stand fast in case you should meet with glandelinians making surprise attacks.

They were glad to recieve these weapons, and they took them and placed the cartridges in their own belt. Then the Sheriff took the four child scouts and brought them to the highest building in the town which was not far away from the Sherlft's of lee, and showed them far off in the woods a tall and beautiful shrine, which was laced there for all travers to offer rayers for especially to ask our Blessed Lord to take care of them du ing their journeys. When the h d had seen this the, held up their hands and then they blessed themselves , and said_ " Oh what a Good God was our Blessed Lord that He Gave His own life for us."

after the, hand had showed them all these things, The Sheriff took them into his oan dining room, where they had breakfast, and while they ate breakfast, his alfe played upon an organ and the children sang some hymns. In about this time someone knocked at the door. After hesitating a moment the Sheriff opened the door, and behold both Walter Starring and general snungers of the Calverinian force stood the e there, and when he cwas invited in, there was great joy and excitement. For it had come from la their minds again how but a while ago they had had a fewfew brushes with the enemy. Starring himself said to the girls:

"I had secured for each of you some well worthy provisions, together with a number of pomegranates. I also have some figs and rusins to re fresh you and the rest in your way."

A Later Late

Then the, began to address themselves for the journey, and fearing the abbroach of the enemy the whole at town came out to follow them. While the, were starting. Angeline Richee asked Starring if any one of suspicion had gone by He said in answer-

"No one, but I and a me of my men went out acouting just about an hour ago, and we found that the enomy was advancing in force tward this town, and therefore I believe the people of the town will have to flet for their lives. The Glandelinians are committed a big raid not for from here on the highway of which road we will have to take." Then the Sheriffs children begun to be afraid, but the Sheriff

"grou need not be airaid, and fearnothing as long as this big force of christian soldiers are with us. And the two glrl scouts will be the conductor for mever tent us." obe of us"

Then said Angeline Richee to the Sheriff who of course looked worried-

"Sir I and the rest are much obliged to you and your family for all your kindness to us, since we were your guest, and also for tat that you have been so loving and kind to us. I know not how we can return your kindness, wherefore pray as a token of our respects and gratitude to you, accept this mite.

So she aput some money into his hand, and he made her a low and polite obelsance and said-

"Let your souls be always white, and be as brave as o you always wre were, and let not your good works be too few." And to the boys he said-

" Do what you can to aid them and follow them in every path they go and be as Godly as they, be as grave and as wise as the are too, so shall you then put gladness into the heart of the Countr, you are serving serving, and obt in praise of all the nation."

So they thanked the sheriff and the whole force continued on Now they continued onward untill the, were come to the brow of the hill on top of which they had so n the rangers, where Angeline Richee suddenly thinking to herself cried out

"Akas Alus I have forgotten what I intended to bestow upon the Sher iff's children.I will go back and fetch it."

And she urged her horse into another direction and in a few minutes minutes returned with what she went for. While she was gone, Jennie thought she heard in a grove at the foot of the hill a little wa, off to the right, a most curious sound somewhat melodious yet somewhat wr weird, and listening she grew suspicious.

"What is it that makes those curious sounds." Asked Radtliffe. "They are "Said she" some of the birds of the forest, or otherwise they are strange alguars from some hidden resource. If they are from the tirds I can often listen to them, and when I was home I used to go out into the woods to hear them, but never had a habit of keeling birds in a erge at home. They are very fine company for us when are melancholy

Also they make the woods, and groves and solitary places desirous to be in-put if suspicious churacers chuc characters are moking these noises."

By this this time Angeline Pichee had returned, and she said to the Sheriffs children an soon as she had come up to them;

"Look here I have brought you all som thing, that you have lest seen on the first street, upon which you may look when you find yourselves in four or in danger, and also for your additiontion and comfort. "And she she gaveceach of them a small gold crucifix.

Now they begun to climb up the hill with which purpose they desired to reach the top to see if the enemy was coming for it was Starrings purpose to defeat their purpose if possible and save the town. It was a steep hill and the way was somewhat alippery, but in climbing they were extremely carefuly end they got or protty woll. Then they were almost up to the top Angeline Ficheen said to genering,

"This is a good place where you could easily meet the enemy, but I hope we won't need to a e too dreadful a fight, as we don't cant to lose too many men. Eather keer out of it if necessary, I know your statement about the enemy engrouching the town is true but I hate the idea of a real bloody fight now. Adventuerers we are, and not in the army now you know. Its p to the army to come and clear these woodw of th the enemy."

"Fe of good cowage" a said Starring" as long as we are on the top of the hill we can have a good secure routtion, and we will all fare far much better than the enemy. Our rifles you know are long ranger charpshooters, and our whole force can root the enemy but I'll allow no one to charge them on this occasion unless it is extremely necessary."

Starring and the Calverinian leader, and the boy and girl acouts were forward in the ranks, for they were the gaides and therefore had to conduct the whole column nome 10,000 strong or more, o some or nearly all of the able bodied men citizens desired to fight the enemy for they had taken what arms, and ammunition they blue had. As they continued on Starring said again;

"We need not be afraid of having a fatal combat with the enemy while on the summit of this hill, for we can have a secure advantage, for here in no means for our force from being explosed while if the enemy should sight us and charge the chill lim sorry for them that is all. I decided to precure this hill to ownelves, to take Tosuencion with the purpose to mave the town, and I'll engage the Rangers to help we having there are many. Tie true we might have a charp engagement, maybe it will be n move combat, not knowing how strong the en my in in force, but if we are careful when the fray comes it will be all to our side. As long as we are in a portion of the enemy ter itory we have to look for fra a hore, especially if we want to either d fond the town or fight our way through to continue our adventure. The Sheriff rave we good weapons and gives and all his man foly of the town are evidently armed the same and the townefulk also are dragging up to the hill a number of good cannon as you easily see. For all townsfolk when they hear that some dreadful thong thing to threatening to befull their own, in such a wilderness, they are of the propion of intom they should thereelves so out and fight too, and therefore in this present althation I'm cortain it is the fruit of the enoughs a undoing if he comes within eight of up, or dures to so into the town, or attack our position. I'm hoping to avoid an engagemen but if necessary we must if possible save the town.

And this bill forested country of itself is a fruitful place, and I am ulso persauded if we could hit upon it we also might find hereabouts som where something that might give on an account why the enemy is in this woods at this location and that we might be so hard beset in this place to continue our progress through. But we have reliable wempons and we must fight through if we have to ourselves ortical every glandelinion column we apot first. They make such disasters, and by such diseasters such suffering and grief, that why should I fight them fair. I'11 not give any quarter either."

"Then said the Calveringen officer himself;;;;;

"I see y indoor a mode accidion for a part of my own troops, and on one of the trees it boke as if something was written thereon. Let us go and see what it is." It was quite a distance of however, but what ever was written there was in a I language which they could not make out."

"I. " and Anceline Fiches "I thought there was semothin hereabouts that would to in a starge strange language. For it that make one one one lelove. "Then turning to starring the cold;;;;;; "run there exemt no danger of our having a brush with the clandelinium for we are bish p now so we can see far, except what is hidden out of right by the weeds below. Of course it was be said it is easier going up than down this hill." I we connot so quickly less of ht of the town, and yet let Him that swells above want, that we fare no worse, when we come to be fried in some of most theilline carts of the adventure. This region appears to be the best and most fruitful section of the country patallest of it to the extreme east is flat gro nd ground, ad as and as you see from a hore consistes of wooded plains and grassy mentows, and as it is owner time new, we are able to delight weelves ownelves with these benetiful nights, for everything is delightful. Fehold how green every thing in. If the smoke of forests fires did not hide the sun as it does the et sight would be more beautiful still. The fields below is covered white with flowers. I have up this way at 1 be will be well"

New on they were still going laborously or this high hill, and having got up about two quarters of the way, they empled a boy in this dangerous territory feeding a hard of sheep. The boy was in the cloths of a clothes of a calverinian Shepard, and he had the fresh and well favored countenance of all Calverinians, and as he sate and by himself he locked in all directions. They who were nearest now the Foy was armed, with a rifle, pictol and slingshot, probably to defend his sheep from the Glandeliniens more than from wolves and other unimals.

"Hark" said General Sturring "I hear somothing."

They listened but they heard nothing."

THem said Starring 1;

"I'm afraid you must be a little deaf to day." Can't you hear nothing. II be leb believe the enemy is approaching. Yet I will dure to may that this boy whether he knowe ho's in dangerous territory or not lives a merrier life, than those that are clad in silk and velevet, but we must proceed in our discource which will make it seem not so long to reach the top. "In this region the Forest Pengers have their main camps and headquarters, afor they loved so much to be here, but , see they have all as it appears assembled in one camp on this hill. They have and do love to room about the woods, for the acen ry is so beautiful and the air so pleasant and so many birds abound, though just now I see nor hour not any Resides here a man shall be free from the noise of city, and buttle, for this war is sure full of unusual noise, and confusion. And here no one shall not be so unusually hindered in his hers contemplation as in other places they are out to be. This is a region that no body lives in but those who love a solitary of a life in the forest and country. And though we and the pangers and reople in forest villiages and towns may have the hard harto meet here with clandelinians, and to enter with them a brick encounter or two. yet I must tell you that we hope to meet anyhow with success here, and let us pray the forest fires will never touch the region. And we'll burn at the stake way one caught trying to make such fires here. D I say that I myself with my own parents had here in former days our own country house, and that we have loved to roum about there woods? I will also addd that in this place, and that to all the people and the Rangers that live and trace and inspect these crounds, they have left a yearly revenue to be faithfully paid them at a certain seasons for their maintainence by the way, and for their further stay and living in such a beautiful spot."

Now as they continued on up the hill t d still, Endeliffe said to Starring; "Sir I percieve in this beautiful forested region, the enemy and our force could do battle to the same advantgae for advantage for both sides, for the enemy could do many good movements for the country here is large and the foe could stretch their lines and do battle to a bad purpose. I can see that from this height."

"It does seem probable but we could see the enemy yonder and here, or any place except where he could hide in the forests, but yonder before us is a very narrow place or passage just beyond the green forest on these slopes. Yet this docs seem to be a most dangerous place to do battle with the Glandelinians,,,, especially in all these parts, for if any time we or the langers or others meets with any brunt the enemy probably is repulsed or driven back would try to rout us out by firing the forests. I did not think of that intill now. I know the enemy will do anything to force us out and that we must not forget. This is the place also were any one of us could be easily be pt hard to it hard put to it. But more more of the place and summit of this hill when we come to it, for I believe mysel myself that to this da; there could remain some sign of battle threatening to testify that the enemy we might have to confront or try to repulse might be more designrous than we could ever numbert. There with to be some sign of hat kind of landeliniums these are before we take such suchness of such chanches of a buttle to i fought."

"I think " said Angeline michee "We are as well off in this part of the country as we have been anywhere else in this journey since we left as we have the fire zone for good. This place suits my spirit. I love to be in such places, to travel through; for there is no sound of explosions, no local ruttling of millions of muskets per volley which I've heard during buttles, nor thundering of long lines of cannons. I think also one may in this place be without much molestation. Here also one may think, and breek at heart and melt in ones spirit. They that so vi hily and carefully through this region make it a paradize, the ra main that od sode sends down from heaven upon them that are here also makes the ri rivers and the lakes. This is the best of the stretches of the Mic-Hollester loods, and all that so through i it will never forget the sc r ry"

"This is the place where we could well defend the town also, and then we could continue our movement up the slopes if the enemy should come against us. And look did I not tell you, here is some of the Clandolinians appearing in the distance now, and a great horde of them. So See also how they are marching and delpoying and how they seem to beat the ground with their feet as t ey they tramp onward, and so now we'll have to make good our positions to resist them and defend the town first. Verily here we all can play the man, and give our resistance as stoutly as we can. If we happen to be beat we can make our retreat to the next ridge, or the sugmit of this one to which we shall soon come. ?"

When they were ready to start forward again they came at last within a hundred gards of the surmit, and now with sounds from far below it seemed as if the region wan atrangoly haunted with evil so rits. But Starring and all those with him were the better prepared, because they had the advantage,, the enemy could be seen and exposed, the defenders not,, and because Starring and saunders were their leaders, and the boy and irls scouts their conductors or guides. When they had got this far up to the summit they thought they heard a strange sound as the gor grouning of dying men or unimals, and they thought also they heard sours as of land lamentations as of some in extreme to ment. These things made them quake, and the women and children of the town looked pale and wan, but starring and his followers bid them to be of good comfort, declaring that the n ise was probably the freaks of the winds which was blowing kirkind of hard by this time, or maybe it came from the clandelinians down below.

They continued on apward, and there was a nother sound a booming rour, and they thought they felt the hill begin to shake under them, they heard also a kind of blacing as of corports, but nothing appeared, though the air began to get kind of bazv.

"ta; be a torn do" is approaching" suggested Jennie.

"Then said " Rate! life;

"Are we not at the samit of this hill yet .!"

"But " guld Angelin- plehee "be of cou good courage, and look well to your feet, on no one won't be stumb'ing. I believe the enemy is doing this. Their calls can going strange far below to tknow. Type they see us and are persuaing. We have to took carefully to our feet, so we wen't be taken into some anare."

Setting tired from such a long ascent they still continued on but more slowly, till that came to within one handred feet or so of the summit, and then Angeline Riches

"I famey I see something yonder apon the roadway to the right of as, but not on the slop but a little way down coming tward us dressed in such uniforms such as I have never seen and headway peculiar and terrible."

"Starming looked and observed and Penrod himself asked;

"I carnot toll" maid Ann Angeline" but they are awful ugly in their heads." But what are to ir heads like." said madeliffe. "I cannot see them now so good,." "I ea of call myself" said Angeline" but I know they are enemies nevertheless. They are coming up the masy slopes of this hill, and they are on horsebuck."

The strange column were a little way off.

"Well, wall" maid Starring. "Let a column of the troops quickly entrench umong rocks and boulders."

This was being my idle obeyed, but when it seemed a fight was inevitable, the strange columns of troppers vanioued behind a grove out of eight. They however this time do did not go on, for no moment had the t strange troopers disappeared from their sight, before Jennia looking before her, saw as one thought something like a sourried gray fan formation before her at the bast of the rise, and it seemed evident they came on up the sign at a gradual but swift pace, and some where else came a strance ratting and resuring, that made the forested country schoe, and the hearts of the aventurers to ache, cave the hearts of the soldiers and the two girls. They in gray continued to some in, and the soldiers who were called upon make preparationa while the son and we sen and children of the town went behind. The strange gray column come on apace. But when the abouted time naw it was determined that resistance should be made, and noticing the exposed nature of the ground, and not kno i knowing the numbers of those above, they draw back also out of sight, and came on no further for the ima,,, being. . They soon at arted onward again, and the four guides again went before them, and they had not gone about fourty steps,, a stringe mist and a trust darkness overshalowed them and the sky, so that they could not hardly see. The sky tooked like a black sawning cavorn roof so black to had become.

Jennia remor was alarmed, for the darkness of the sky seemed too black in color to be even by a rain or tornado cloud. Sie said;

"What shall we do, continue on or vait untill the darkness subsides."? "Fear not" said Starring," lets all remain still, and what untill it ends. We cannot proceed otherwise, for you know the forests are to "In thick here, and we dare not even light a candle for fearing of starting a forest fire of our own." They therefore remained there, for the darkness grow so intense that it appeared their ath way was a grad or blocked. They aren wondered what caused the in ense,,,,,,

"This is indeed like being in a Calverin without light, or like roins down into the deep, or like also being in the heart of the ann. and also like goin down to the bottom of the mountains. This darkness is so intense that it seems us if the earth has awallowed us up. But it is said!" bet them that walk in darkness four no avil for God is with them, so let us trust in the name of Our Blessed Lord, and berg the intercession of His Bleegard Bloosed Mother. "As I said before" said Anceline michae" I have cone often through this part of the country, and have been much harder harassed than I am now, and that is during this war too, and yet to see I am not ever injured. I would not boast, for I am not my own Savier, but if I we trust in God we shall have a good deliverance yet. Come let us wait a while and pray for light to our pleased Lord, for He can lighten our dark ness, and reboke at 1 the wickedness of a hell."

so they waited for some time and proped, and when half an hour passed it gradually began to grow lighter, for it was or had been so dark that it apparently seemed as if they had been stoped so stopped on the borders of the lost omless oft

As h wever the darkness threatened once more to settle down again, they saw no chances to go through with their ascent, so still they remained at the same apot and now to their utmost surprise, great stinks and losthesome smalls commenced to come to them, which was greatly to their annapance.

"So far" said Radeliffe himself" this does not soom to be such a pleasant place after all."

"Oh but, said Angeline Richee" whatever is causing this it is not so bad to go through here, the main thing wo ld be to star here for always, but maybe the durkness is caused by the sty being clouded up with thick smoke from those distant forest fires, and therefore that may be , one reason why we must continue to go through here, for who knows if the fires after all are not coming this way."

"Wellanid" Angeline"Quitott quoth Jennie, "You have probably spoken the truth. "This darkness is surely caused by smoke" said Endeliffe. "I know it. It cannot be 'dinputed."

"and if a ever get at of here" maid on one of the others,"I think I shall prize light and a good way better than this for all my life. This rection may be beautiful as is said, but not with forest fires threatening all parts of the forests."

"We shall be out by and by gold Angeline Riches." As the darkness did not increase to any prost intensity however, they started to " nture forward and after a while Penrod said:

"Are we not reaching the end of the hill to the tor yet?"

"Look to your feet every one" said Starring, "The rist of the hill seems full of dangerous pitfulls and snares which will be also to our advantage if the for attacks. But we must lok out."

As they continued on they kept their eyes open, and passed among the snares and pitfu pitfulls to advanture. While they were usend theme with, they can led some movements among the lower forests for to their right. Then said charring;

"Every one get ready. Form position. "hat is a column of clandellnians moving wainst us, they are coming this way, they have probably discovered a unaversames and have come up part way of the hill at the name time without our knowledge. "But pray" said Starring "Before we fall to it with the enemy let us understand what more we must flight for " (now the women and children of the town were in trambling and terror fleating to the rour, and knew not what to do) The town below sir is in danger from the fee and we believed we could frustrate their intention. With your Rangers here, and the man folk of the town we hope to be successful, even If we have to retreat in the end."

"You are right" onsered the Bunger, "The enemy rob the country, flood the people out of home and kill them by bir disasters, and devastate our States with the worse of catastrophes and thefts on records."

"These are but generala"" said starring," come to particulars man."

"Yes come to particulars, said the Rangers leader. "Well I will "The Glandelinian nation practices the craft of hells legion, they gathered up women and children from cuptured towns, and massacre them most brutally, and devastate the whole of southern Calverinia with the hope of weakening our cause. We must fight."

Then gtarring replied:

"We are all servants of Christ, my business was to go out on an important adventure looking for details of why the foe made these disasters, and by the Government and the Vivian Girls I am commanded to do my most endeavor to accomplish what , can but here the foe seem in the way, and if this be the ground of our quarr. I with them let us fall to it as soon as we can."

At this time a force of Alandelinians came up within sight, and the whole of the Cristian soldiers and adventurers , repared to meet them. They vithout more ado fell to their respective positions, and at the first volley the Clandelinians the had not expected it fell fack in confusion, surprised and terrified, for indeed they in coming up the hill really did not know a soul was ther . At this first volley the Clandelinian leaders horse was brought down on his front knees by a bullet, and at this the whole swame of rebels cried out.

The glandelinian leader though thrown recovered himself, and ordered the claudelinians to reform and charge, but a shot hit him and wounded him in the arm, and he was helped to a bank of ground which he could be placed without exponere. Then for an hour or more the conflict ranged to a high pitch of fury, both sides of course commaining in pattions and keeping a strick and fierce fire, to to no advantage of either side, but a lot of ammunition being wasted.

The "omen and children who were in the year cried and acreamed while the baddle rared.

Starring thought of a plan. He ordered a evenension of firing to trick the enemy into making an assault, when this law was obey a obeyed, the glandelinians who coused fixing firing, and then waited themselves. But the clandelinians were also wise, and assecting the acome respend their fire again.

""ay hold, said Starring."1'11 feel them. " Get the common ready." This order was comed, and a number of chells was harled among the clandelinians which exploded with tarriffic force. The explosion fetched a whole score of the Clandel intene to the ground. The other Clandel intune were driven to junic and occurried from cover, and the christians seeins that, would have charged them, but starring in the full heat of his can spirit ordered them to fire instead, to charge was danger, us, and this order was obeyed, the claudelinions retreating precipitatedly down the hill. At this sight the somen and children rejoiced, and Starring and all the rest praised God for the deliverance He had wrought. However expecting there might be another attack, they rested on the assault of the hill no one ventering even to get the consided of the Glandelinians whose loss it seemed was nearly two handred and fifty. Thile waiting they erected some works, and amongst it also exected a glaficle of a commettee linb, and holsted a flag. They then while assiting, second attack sto and drank. As they thus get and walted Angeline pichos acked Starring;

"Have we suffered ony loss in the fight."

"To, so far as I know" said Starring. "I was scratched a little on the arm though, by a billet, but that does not hinder me chy. Fut we might have another brush, They might return with awarer numbers. But so far at present they don't seem to come near the town, and I hape by this act or reward will be coming at last."

"For the war not afraid, good sir, when you see them come to suidenlo!" "I be afract" and Stanning, with a lough "Of course I do not that trust in my own ability, I have more reliance on Him that is stronger than all."

"But that did not think then near first ocean to bring them from cover did

"I cry you mercy then" said the other realizing the truth, "I feared you had been of the company of those who had some momenta ago did attack a party of troops on top of this hill, but now , look better about me, and I percieve you have repulsed the attackers. I thought they had won."

"May what could the defenders have done if we had been of the party of ascallents!" "Done" said the man justonished. "Not exacttly but he was a an that took after my own heart" said he." I knew him well however 'He was a man that a, they say had the root of the bravery in him, but to the enemy he was o e of one of the most troublesome officers to the enemy that ever I met with in all my days."

Inkn "From what you are saying I know you knew him, for you have given a right good character of him."

"Knew him" said the man whose name was Corner." I was a great companion of his, and I was with him to the last, and started with Him when he first commenced to think of what would come upon the christian cause when I was with him."

" Waht "hat was his name C?" asked Angeline Richee....

"Frank Hans."

"I was his guide from general Concentinians lines, to general Slanderlinias camp,,..... said Jennie Turmer.

"Then you knew him to be very troublsome to the enemy?" asked AStarring,.

x I sure did so, but I could very well be glad of it, for scouts of my calling are a often times entrusted by Violet, and her sisters, with the conduct such as he was."

. Well then pray let us hear a little of him, and how he did manage himself when you guided him from one christian camp the to the other as you suid "":":

" Why he was always afraid, ter ibly afraid, that because of the enemys strength the christian cause would come short of whether he had a desire it should. Every news of the disasters, ev ry news of a terrific bittle, every herror that he heard of, and the news of the devastation of the forests, the big floods and explosion disasters and so on frightened and angered him, and everything ecocerning the war that he ha heard people speak of also unerved him, at least those w who had the least appearan, appearance of opposition in it. I heard that he led a charge, one day, and alone held a force of rouring Glandelinians at bay for two months in a single sa shack and single handed, nor durst the glandelinians for all they saw go to the attack before venture forward any more, though their leaders, many of them offered any assument of reward to capture him let of course they would not go back again neither. The Christian dogs, said they would sure give them the la gh if they retreated before one man. Yet because of this one man they were dejected at every difficulty, and the moment one dared to expose himself he was shot down. Well after these Glandelinians had besieged the barn for those two months wondering how he was able to resist so long, how his ammunition held out so long, and how he succeeded in maintaining such a resistance without w food probably, one fogg foggy morning, I do not know how, they ventured, and made a headlong rush for the barn, and finally burst it down. He was gone. They would not believe it. He had I think outwitted the Glandelinians or he could not have escaped as he did.He finally came to general Concentinian Arronburgs lines, at a point, you gou know what I mean__ that stood at the head sentry line of the camp, and there he stood a while before he was able to proceed telling the corporal of the guard of his experience with the enemy.

When they permitted hij him to pass, he first gave place to the highest rank of officers, and would not roceed untill they went before him. Then the man went and told his story to some of the highest officers, telling how the GLundelinians stood shaking and shrinking, he claimed it would have paid anything to have seen them, nor would be leave out a detail.

At last he was brought before general Concentinins Arronburgs head quarters, and he was ushered in well after he had been entertained there a while and the general had heard his story, as you know how the manner is, he was bid to go to my part of the camp, and also told the way he should take.. so as I know he came to m, part of the camp, but unfortunatel, at the time I was out on a scouting tour, and he walted about for a long while, weiting that I would venture to return, for he wlaped therefore to se me and would not go back. And the days and nights were long and cold then The poor man o stood shaking and trembling, and I dare say it would have been a pity to see him, but he would not go back again for fear of missing his chances to see me. The guard seeing him waiting so long finally

At last he went to ever of the center, and quentioned his as her he would be able to see so and when I would return, for of course I happened to extend my stay for a week of which the poor man so patiently Lappened to wait. The build can not of course allowed to speak to no one while on duty but neverthel as he as moned enother soldier who happened to pass by and effected ordered him to interview the man, who did. The soldier sized him up for a moment as he total me nimesed and then speed:

"I see you are a stranger in these parts, a for isgner. That is your appose of your visit to liss Angeline Riches. "?

"The man cave his answer and his ar parrose, and the coldier wondered that he remained calting in the cold so long, so he said to him as he iked his bake seeing that the man was honest and good;

"I'm sorry sir, but she is gone out on a long distanced occuting tour, and wont be balack for days. But come into my tent and got carmed of an you are nearly faint.

You cannot stand this too long you know thy man its beio. zero."

With that he followed this soldier, and when he seated himself on a lounge the soldier brought him a bowl of hot coifee and some rolls. After he had been intertained by the soldier for a while, as you know how the manner is to strangers who are good ... he was bid to remain in the tent untill I should return. I had intended to remain out for ten days, but fortunately for him I returned sooner than a week... it was on a saturday when , was just returning to the camp with a party of soldiers and officers. and as he had a note of ecessity in his bosom to see me, and hearing that he wished an interview with me, I was willing to recieve him, and grant him the comfort of my tent, and also to allow him to accompany me in his mission. I came riding down the company street, and percieving a man to be walking up and down by my tent , rode up to him, and asked him what he wanted, who he was, and clad that I came the poor man had water in hi his eyes. He told me what he desired and wro had sent him to interview me... I went therefore into my tent, dismissed my retainers,, and then sent a guard to usher him in. Il me came in and he carried the conversation with me respectfully and almost Loving L There were a few stores in My tot tent , and some of it was laid on my table, and I advised him to cat supper with me before teling me his mission with ,eme. . me. Then after that he presented the note, and I looked it over carefully, haw it was signed by henoral Concentinian Aronhurg.... Then I said his desire should be granted as soon as it was possible to when he had remained in my tent for a veral hours, and to be a little corecwarm and comfortable., I advised him that I was better he should wait untill the warmer reather came before he should attempt his maventure of which he told me about. West when he had a si h wight of the many things of the camp, and when he grew tward spring, all the time of which he came visiting me, and was finally ready to go on his wayeto goneral viviane army, the officers gave him a bottle of spirits, and some comfortable things to eat and bid him good speed. Then we set forward, and I want along with tim him and now the man was but few words, only he would nigh aloud a times. When we came to a spot where threesClandelinian spies were hanged, he said that he doubted not but tall glandelinians should share the same fate also.

He seemed glad when he saw how large our came was mien we came to a difficult stretch of country dangerous to travel through, because of the enemy, bogs, and terrible steep ravines he made no backing out at that, nor did he fear the foe.bogs or ravines, for you know I have never for years met a man of the courage and also,,, endurance he had. I got him into a county home for shelter from a wild storm, and he became acquanited with the farmer and his wife and children while he was there,, but he was not just thin for mo much communy, he desired very much to be alone, yet he always loved good thrilling or intersting conversation, and often would listen or join in, and to be pendering them into his mind. Hertold me afterwards, that he loved to rescue a few child slaves and bring them up as his own children, but that he saw no op ortunity to try the a venture..... When we left the farmhouse, we headed for a valley and went down as well as any man bould, for he cared not how steep any thing was so that he might reach his station at last. Also I slieve there was a strong sympathy between and him and the cause he was fighting for, for I ever sa saw him better in all his a ventures than when he was with me. Then he would lie down to rest in the valley, and he would embrace a cruticif h crucifix he carried, and kiss the vory imagne on it. He would be up every sorning i force darbreak, to continue on the way But when he was one ay confronted by a torrible ration forcest fire contra down from the north, a quiely boliove, should have lost my sam, not of course that he had any inclination of going back, but that he was affected he as I was beened

And he made such a noise and outery update the Tlandelinians who have were responsible for the fires that if they had been around, and had had been would be no loude that they would have fullen means a like if era, it I task var prost office of,, that the residence for any western project, will we went through it, so I had never been it if fore, I say one construction a site of either so in this locality because of the confluention. If it would be too obtains to tell out all, we still investors nearly no for a characteristic and a confluence of the confluence of t of a party of cultured who were out rousing for forage despite the fired, I thought he would have fought with all of them single handed, and from the excitement, had to join the fight and use my guister a telling effect oth rwise we would have been set upon and destroyed, so het was their attack upon us for his foolish equabble. After this encounted he encounter he was more wakeful and watchful. But when the flames of the forest fire threatened to come our way, we were again in a trench and we feared we would never reach our destination but would have to retrace our steps. But that he would not hear of what I took notice of, the fire was being changed in its curage course by the wind, so we finally reached our destination that night. Then we parted, and, never saw him ma more."

"Then it seems he was well off at last."

"Yes, yes, I never had the slightest doubts about him, he was a man of a choice aptrit, only he was kipt very adventuresome, and made his life so burdensome to himself, and so trouble nome to the Clandellnians. He was above all olse, tender of sin, he was afraid of doing in juries to his own friends, and he also would do every thing for them, He never was injured or captured.

"But what should be the reason that such a good scout and soldier should be all his days out in adventure instead of fighting with the armies in the batlos

impore are two sorts of reasons for it, one is the wise all seeing God will have it so, some must work as fighters, some must applier scout or sook adventure, and for any part I care not at all for that profession that has no desire for adventure in it. I love adventure exciting and thrilling. God choses us for all so ts sorts of vocations."

"He was a zealous brave man" said the citizen. niffil difficulties and the like, dunger and fart furies he feared not at all, twas only sin death and hell that was to him a terror, because he had some deabts about other horrers othwel otherwise and besides the brave are compared to a party of heroes that do brave deeds for their ladies fair, and sing their sounds before the throne of ings."

"You may right" sold Starwing," those were the things that probably were his troubles and they as you well have observed, arose from his nerve thereabouts, not from desire or lat. I dare believe he could have bit a fire brund had it stood in his way but the things with whih he saw his belooved country opr seed p oppressed, no man could ever shows off with succe."

"This adventure of the man with no has done me a lot of good" said Angeline Richee. I thought never before could any man be ake him, but of course I have seen some resemblance with many others since. Many a soldier lays so hard about him that he is greath; feared, but nevertheless I love adventure more than many others do."

"If I might also speak my part said" Jannie, I must say that something of the desires of the Vivian Sivia have always been in measor I have been more afraid of seeing the cause of the country we are fighting for than any one close so far and the less of the war altogether, than I have been of the less of other things. O thought I may I have the hapliness some day of seeing everything peaceful again, though I'd cart with all the world for it."

"FPFTAR of the christian side lesing was one thing that made me think that Angelinia and her sister states were far from he having the success so ardently desired" said Penrod, but 2" but if we can obtain the class we are after, may it not also so will with our cause in the end?"

"No fears, no offerts" said Jennis. "You feared for my outty that day and sacrificed to save me from cupture when those spice questioned you. Though there is not always home were there is fear of disaster, yet to be sule sure there is no hope of success where we do not depend on the help of God also."

"Yell ould Jennie" said Penred, "you have hit the mark, for the fear and the trust

"Well cold Jennie" and Penred, "you have hit the mark, for the fear and the trust in God is the berinning of wisdom, and to be sure those that want to see a country succeed in a holy cause, never sive up in any purpose for it, no matter how enomies nay meddle or try to end the thinns we do. But we will here conclude our discource of thet man adventuer. For I know enother man who was a soldier but self willed and forlish. He pretended to be the greatest here in the eyes of all he knew and saw and showed off before women, firle, and even children, but presented my wealf the never wenter a daring advanture, and when taked to account on the enemy one day notested to be sick."

"Had son any convergation with him about it?"

"Yes note that once or take, but he would divers be the bimself, severe a deself willed. We not there execute for compenionable, or area and, not get example, what his mind prompted bim-to do he did it, and nothing also could any one get him to do. Brave indeed he was, and good too, but a man who is rackless, and regards or disregards the advice of others. We almost came to his adding for it too. Those who are rackless partish."

"Yea" he always bes like imself self willed the does not care for mything,, and "Pray" saked Starring," what printe the die he hold, for I suppose either you or Angoline can tell?"

"He hold that a man who backs out just because an adventure is extremely dangerous connot get any where at all, and that if he risked all no matter how dangerous it was the country cause can only then be saved."

"How. Asked the Calverinian officer. "If he said, it is possible for a person to accomplish a deed no matter how sucidal, how could be exc en expect to be successful, even for the cause that he would be fighting for. It might as well be possible to be guilty of cowardice, as well as to partake of the virtues of a hero or heroine, but then either as way he could be blumed, for indeed were are exme exempted from no vices of cowardice, or recklessness, but on condition that while dur doing work of dangerous kind we are careful, and watch and strive in the proper way aut this I perciove on his part was not the thing out if I understand you right your meaning is that he was of the opinion that a man can be as reckless as possible and yet go through the advanture without fatal results."

"Ay, ay no _ menn" anid pedeliffe, for that is what he bolieved and also practiced once or twice Almost to his end."

"nut what ground had he for so a saying and doing?" asked Starrin.

"Thy he said that any one who is slightly afraid cannot succeed on a exciting missi mission at all He argued that even there was such worlding in the Sacred Scriptures

"That seems stranger said Jennie, " but it is true,"

"Well Jonnie present us with a few particul particulars." "so - will" said Jonnie, "He said that many do many dangerous stants, and that there her been records of such in the bible and other mod books, that dangerous at the stunt was David fought a huge giant, took his chances with the dangerous and income king saul, and so he believeed he could go through such adventures and pi pull through saftly too. He said that many men have practiced dangrous atunts and succeeded even to rashness. He said that the Apostles went at the bidding of Our pleased pord and preached the Sounds Commel to the people and to the dangerous jews at untold of risks and he claims that was racklossness too, and therefore why not could be do the same thing. He said that St Paul accomplished lots in the face of record breaking difficulties and perils, and therefore he could do so too."

"High base indeed " said Starring." a und you are sure he is of this opinion. " "I have heard him plead for it" said Angeline piches, bring scripture for it, bring argument for it, and say he can give proofs".

"Such of an opinion is not fit to be, with an allowance in the world" said Starring. "Am an like that must be crazy."

"Yes" but you must inderstand me rightly " said Jennie. "He did not say that any num dight be able to do this, but that he alone could do the same."

"Indeed such a conclusion is recklesoness in itself. For this is as much as to say, that because a man wants to be a hero, therefore he can run through a much bog sink down to the bottom and live. Or because he sees a big fire will throw himself in expecting to live. Who could of thought that any one could be so far blinded as to think such foolish things. I suppose he tried to lie live up to his word?"

"Yos he did." "but what more false than such a conclusion Jen.! For again this is as much as to vi say that because good soldiers and apies hereto have succeeded in their desperate undertaking, therefore they have an allowance to do it of a more presuntious and wilful mind.Or because a child, that had burned itself might willingly lie down on the fire and he borned again. These kind of men of whom you speak of might have loat his reason. His surrosing that ager may have the heros virtue, who addict themselv themselves to such viscs of ricklessness, is also a deliaion. It is just to try any adventure even if it is perilous because we go out on great and exciting adventures ourselves occassionally, a though of course this one has not been so awfully stirring so far, not thinking of what the future might be. But to live up to recklesomens is like eating up the aims of gods people, whi would never have any other virtue, and therefore perion in hell with them. Hor can , believe that one that is of this opinion can at present have real hopes of living a very long life. But I know you have made 'tron; objections against him, what can he say for himself?"

"Why" said Jennie" he says to do this by way of his opinion seems abundance more honest than to give back and out it and not it, and get comme come so far as to hold contrary to the opinion."

"A very cruzy unawer, for though to get lovee such things while our opinions as are against such timing is very an even to sin and ploud a televation so to do is worse stilll, the one stumbles beholders accidentally, the other pleads them into the ename. "

"There may be many of this mans mind" said Endeliffe, that might not yet dare to make a try at it, and that makes going on adventure of so little esteem as it is."
"You have said the truth,," said Starring," and it is to be lamented, but he that implie the love careful will come of the revile precathed.....22"""""

"There are many strange of inions in the world world" soid Starring, "" by ht as well say I'm not roing to repent of my sine till I um about to die' to may that no matter how denderous it is I'm going through the adventure just the come..."

"And such one not overview said Joinie, such a man would hab have been laothe might be have to die and see himself as he really is. Yet many of them thank count themselves as scouts and spies, and agents and military police indeed do these thinse, and therefore often needs a doctors care for months afterwards, or are beyond a dectors care... I em no you ove only a little wirl of course, but have been a traylor in this locality many a day before the war started with my parents and friends, and now during the war have taken notice of many things. I have seen some spice that have set out a as if they would drive all the world and the hole of blandelinia,,... before them, who get in a few days, died in the w 1 wildern see either in begs, now or at the hunds of the enemy, and so never succee a succeeded in their undertaking. I have seen some that proved almost nothing and somewhat commended on and the start and in first medting out to be epied or scoute, and that one would have thought could not have lived a day through an adventure of this cort, and yet have proved mon good spies and socuts. I have seen some that have run hastily forward into the adventur ad e adventure, that again have after a little time on ran as fast back again. I have seen some who have spoke very well of the work and doings of a spy at first, that after a while have groken against it as rash and fole feeligh and a sucide. I have heard some, when they first set out on a scouting or seying adventure, or tryint trying to go from one christian army to another, say post; say positively that it absolutely cannot be done, and who when almost there have come back again afraid and said an adventure within enemy territory is a sucidal act ... I have cheare some I have heard some waint what they would do in case they should have an encounter with the enemy, that have even at a false alarm fled like a frightened lamb."

ow as they were still remaining there watching whether the energy would recume, the attack or no, there came a man running of to meet them, and said;"

"General, and all your followers, if you , love life, shift for yourselves, for a big forest fire is before you. It's coming this way like the wind."

Then said starring""We are ready for them." and so they prepared for the second engagement with them. "ow the scouts sent to mark their advance to ked at covery turning wherean attack should be made, but the claudel inions however did not come. Asfor the fire they did not worry about that, believing that it would not really come their ways though they now realized what caused the outbreak of such sudden and awful darkness in the skies, It was the emoke of the fires. Nevertheless the girl sccuts believing also the energy had been driven away by the approach of the fire believed that the adventureres would be more safer in the clearing on the top of the bill should the fire come up, and also they wished for a resting place as they v were weary and tired, and also hungry. Then said it the rangers,;;;;;

"We have a ! large cleaving on this hill for the safty of our camps, where you can share our rations or eat what you have.....

So they all a concluded to the in thither and the rather, because the langer leader gave such a good report about his cump. so when they reached the camp which they observed was somewhat fortified, they went in and the Ranger cailed one of his assistant chiefs and he came to e.e. They asked also if they might remain in the came for the night ...

"You are permitted to as no gentionen" cald the Ranger," for my camp is for mone but christians. Then was the girl and boy scouts the more grade, for that the Ranger was a lover of the christian causee, They were shown tends, a tent for the girls to be together, and the same for the coye,,, and as many as could be spaced for the rest, and where there were none, others were let up. then said Starring,,,,,, to the leader of the Rangers;;;;;

numbers, good sir," that have have you for a oper to night,," for we have come all of us from a long distance and are wear and hanger ."

"It is surely la e late" said the panger," so we cannot 40 out to selk provisions for a more convienent convienient capper, but such as we have it, you she shall re welcome to if you can be con ented an your force dies not cut as our of house and

"We will be content with what you have in the camp for we too have a lot of our own rations, for as much as I have proved to these to thee, we campers are never in want of anything, of which is convenient to us all in the time of need."

While supper was being per prepaired for all in the camp, the ranger leader said,

" Come my good friends, you are welcome to me, and we are all glad that we have a tent or a camp to give you rest and shelter in and have a beautiful place to intertain you in, so while supper is being made ready let us intertain one another eith some good conver sation.

Starring sal : " I am willing."

5 m Then whose two children are these girls scouts, and whose sons are these two boy scoutsu ?"

" These children "Asald Starring, are probably far away from g home ncw, but they do not want anything about them or their parents and relatives to be known just now. The boys no doubt have no parents now. But they are the leading coyscouts and girl scouts under the Vivian Girl Princesses. The boys are some of their new friends, each one whom they sent to guide me on this adventure. The boys do everythi everything for the sake of the cause and take after their own father no doubt. Yea if they do but see any one in peril, they like soldiers go to their rescue.

"So they are the secuts of the Vivian Girl Princesses eh, and are these all your followers? I knew the Vivian Girls father and tother, and also his fathers father. Many have been good of this generation, their ancestors dwelth first in northern Abbieannia and they have also been worth, rulers. They have above any that I know orknew showed themselves not only men of heroisn out also of great virtue and courage for their country, and took part with those that lived the right path. I have heard of many of Emperor Vivians relations that have stood all kinds of trilas for the sake of holiness and to build up the nation as it is to day. Ki g King Stephen Vivian that was one of the first of the families of Vivian Emperors from whence Emperor Robert Vivian sprang, brought his country through a long war i with a far distant wicked nation. Emperor Jams James another of this generation, was slain in battle. To say nothing nothing of Paul and Peter Vivian, who builded up the nation and invented the means that made Vivian Wickey the strength it is. There was Ignatius, who saved the country from a disaster. "Would be impossible to count up all of that family that have suffered injuries and death for the love of their country and home. Nor can I but be glad to see that Emperor Robert Vivian has left behind him two good sons, and seven beautiful daughters such as they are. They do a goo deal to keep up and ear up bear up with their fathers name and thread in their fathers footsteps, and comes to their fathers

8""Indeed sir... Said Stamring ," They are likely lads and unusual little girls,, they surely do choose heartilly their fathers waya. now his daughters could have stand stayed home where it is safe, but they chosed to show their mettle by serving their country too as far as it is in their power."

" That is just what I said, wherefore imperor and the holy fame of his daughters is likely to spread all o er the earth. Therefore let all those who serve the princesses themsel es do all they should for them, so that their own names may never be forgotien in the

" tis a pity" said one of the Rangers" that those princesses should come into the world just in time to see this most awful of wars, and that there is such danger of the cause of the country being lost, that Calverinia should fall, and probably be e sooner 1 or later a country of the past."

"Fall Calverinia must not" said Starring" but if such things keep on badly and sadly diminished it may, but let all of our friends and all of the followers of Violet, and her sisters take my advice, not to give up hope, and Heaven will help the cause to be withheld. And as to these two girl scouts I am glad to see them together with the tw two boys and acting as my guides. And may I advise, if they would contunie the adventure so we can uphold the cause."

"I i will now speak on the behalf of the vivian Girls, to take away the regrouth often given that little girls arec a ally afraid of taings. For as there is always directof perils in this war, jet they faced it and went through Yea to show how much they went throughwould take a long story . I will say that many boys rejuiced in what they accomplished. The Vivian Girls therefore are highly favored,,,,,, and show by these thinks that they can be and are sharers lith as in the v.ry paces of 1 fe."

They are something like saints " said Angeline bick e. "I read not that ever any one ever wept at the storie of the Cri Crucifixion as they sometimes do, and of their desire to have had the clance to follow him on the road to calvery, and to sit by his His a pulchre when He was buried. They wished they had I am the women first with mim at that piret paster coming,, and that they could have been the first to bring the tidings of wis resurrection to his wis arcstols. Let of course they regret that they were not born at His _ime...."

Now for all of them the supper was already about reay, for the builes sounded the call for the mass said Penrod himselff.

"The sight of this whole cum, preparing the supper, puts me in mind of being with general vivians army once more."

ec supper started and first every one began their acals with the Grace first. It seemed too that every body had the some no different. They even particle of wine , butter and honey, dried meat, and bbl: beams beams and apples and all kinds of fruits and so forth. The child scouts however refused the wine but ate a disk of milk well crimbled, and the fruit and some of the beens.

The Ranger seeing the child scoups refusing the wine said;;;

"Drink freely, this is juice of true wine, it is not strong enough either to make any one drunk so do not be afraid of it."

"be never drink wine, cannot tolerate it" said An eline richee. "Fur we like the fruit, especially the wales."

While they were thus talking they were presented with aother another dish with ze apple pie. Then were they very merry, and sat eating alovely for a long time,,, talking of many things, of adventure, of the progress of the war, the rature of all the catastrophes since the war began., and Ange'ire lichee stated;

"As Forbidden fruit makes a jerson lose his soul so Glandelinia has eaten forbidden fruit in devasting alverinia. , landeli ia would revile our ewn Lords dish, and instead of refesing the evil, and choose the good she chosers the lorge. Therefore Clandel inia is the sEcond Eve."

"Calverinia made the scruple, because her government did not watch the conditions of givian wickey before her capture by the enemy, said menrod. "I Yes but half of the garrison ton turned traitor that is how Vivian Nickey came to becaptured." said Endeliffe. "Then said starring to the Leading sanger "If you please can you answer this question/////imm

"That is the question may ask if you share!"

"Because of all the great disasters that have been caused by the clandelinions, and beca se of the ature of the nature of the war itself, many nations count,, that clad clandelinia, is la mad like a rabid dog. that is your i opinion of this!!!!"

Then they all gave good heed, contering that the chief of the forest pangers would sa , but he sat at ill a whole, probably a few minutes, and then he regiled,,,..;; "A nation there was, whom many did count wad, enjetcally like landelinia, for I have heard such statements also, but I believe the more the does on that case of which you mention the more it will come back to her. Those that devastate countries just for mere sport during war, shall have as ach again in return, and ten times more, whether Glandelinia is and I as not anow, but I believe that now of their of her generals must have taken satisfies, and stated him our out of his one own home, they are no wicked. But seventheless History will slyage account that Clandelinia is a mad nation."

"I have ear wir" said Radeliffe, "I lid not think you could have take ouch a good answer. I have been trained I in er and a gar most cir, and it has not taken any thing like a great hile to do it either ... of thin has teached me rore than experience, I have learned from the vivian Girl Prince were to be us as out if as a hack, jet to be kind in the right var, and have also found from experience that I have gained thereby. Andelfi hatting a start of the field and a confit in this can be demonstrated in the start, with a start of the conful distance, but has nothing for ner paint, she is in damper o of making herself poor, and * our own cause m st win out in the end .. "

Then Jennie mu mer which ered to Angeline "icheed and said;;;

"The langer has a very good spirit, let us have him accompany us on our journey and let us all be reinforced as possible, for it will help us through the more f dangerous territory the better."

The Runger however havened to everhear this and he said:

"With a very good will hims gurmer."

After the most was finished the chilascours ussized to refire us they fait tied Tirtired and elsepysteery, and they were very weary with traveling. Fo they letired , but meet of the others sat up all night, for the Pancers and the soldiers were such good company, that they did not like to part just them. Then after such alk much talk over the advent re, about themselves, and the situation of the nation In in the war , Starring himself began to nod. Then said the Chief Ranger,

"That general, you are beginning to be drowey, come make up here to a question for you."

"Lets hear it"!Domanded Starring,

"Than guid the Eunger:

"May do the enemy devastate our forests by fire!"

"Ha" mall Sturring," that is a hard question, difficult to answer, and harder to frustrate. But come general Saunders of the Calve n Calverinian force," said he," though I can answer it, I will first leave my part to you, do you expound it, and see if my o n answer will be right. Let me hear what you will say."

"I compation asser it, as I do not know" said general Saunders. That is a puzzling question. It vis get to you, and therefore we will have to ask you to answer it."

Then said Starring;;

"To drive us all our of Calverinia. Alandelinia cannot hin her battle by fair means so she tries foul."

"You are witht" said the namer. "ratchfulness and experience teaches this por first untill the results displays itself and brings everything to light, it is altogether without any good results to the enem in the end, saides is this is wholly almidelinias pay one, hos should we expect to see our nation of and by and let it go unheeded. for will any that has a either reason or trace believe that a sch a nation, can ever face the world without shame and distrace, when it is a clave to such wicked incliniations. And now it comes in m mind, I will tell you semething worth the hearing. There were two men some time uso who went on the case quest that you are doing , the one who was pownjer took the north cost route, the other coing west straight. The nouncer one had great dangers and difficulties to grapple with, the olderione also. The young our reached as far as the arrays lines, but was frustrated in his purpose as he could succeed in no effort to Lorns the enouge secret, while the older one lost marvo at night of the anemys lines and we went lack, therefore who of the two ware the briviat/ !"

"The counter wan" said Standing. For the went through the greatest perils and linch ing, and in the face of greater opposition, and therefore he care the best deconstration that he can the strangered. nor succeed is another."

Of the branch of the month of the first post of the proof of the THE CHARACTER AS THE HOW TO BEACH THE PLACE CAPTLY. OF PUTCHE OF SINERE TWEED A HTH THE FIRE TAT DIREJS THE BITORY.

THUS they sat bulking for the time untill the brook of by was approaching. Now when the rost of the camp was up again, glarring bid. Endeliffe to read the long letter he had found to the Chief Ranger which he did and the Ranger aur rised maid; "thy is it that this can should write to eneral Vivian and, a long letter of his adventure to such an extent of time, and then allow it to be so carelessly

"In an opinion" said staring, "It must be only a daylicate letter. He night have been attacked nome where by the enemy and if not injured at least are forced to throw away the duplicate, and the enemy wight of known him graphs purpose and tried his best to frustrate him. I also say the latter was written in ar strong thrilling words as if it was a stor story in itself, and because he wanted general Vivian to see what the disaster of the explosions themselves was like, therefore the judge of the nature of the diameter can me be made up for tent. Also to find whether the explosions have the force of which the discovery shows."

Though the forest fire did not come up that way, there was however signs that the energy had increased in strength, for a great force was discovered authored near the hi hill.

"Well" endd the Runger" ow that we are here, and since I know we are strong in force, and the on citizens of the town have also good weapons, after we have refreshed ourselves, we will engage them again and see if we can do some good this this time and takecooms prisoners and force them to tell something. About a mile from here is a good avenue of speedy escape if we have to be overchalmed or worsted. I know where such a safe retreat is, but if possible we should clear this region of the enemy. Let's great on ready as it looks like they are coming to some an affack knowing we are still here."

At Starrings consend all sers immediately assubled, and they soon found in the enemy in stronger numbers coming stowly and cutto sale a the bill.

"We careful not to expass carestron any & your Starring wormed."He re is a chance to avence the awful disasters in a way."

The energy came on now more entitly, and this time did not take to cavet as supposed, but charged on a the rise of ground . Hing as they did. The buttle then started as before, but this this raied three hours before the cross finally even only took to cover, and to most to take wind. Then Starring asked the poor child how he hap, ened to fall Into the hands of these wicked Glandelinians, ...

The little lad however did not or could not remember. He was a pretty looking child but sickly, and looked as if his health had been ruined for life by his slaver,, and what he might have went through while under the power of these Glandellnians. Therefore Starring did not regret that he had taken himself to the life of an adventuerer and scout, and was glad that he had traveled hither from general Vivians lines. The little lad appeared as if he reall, did not have no stren strength at all, of body, Starring felt so rt for the lad, and did not object to his weakly looks, but gave him such things as were were necessary for him.

All of those round about treated the lad with kindness, so that the lad finally felt at home here. The soldiers bid him good cheer and said that it was the will of their chief leader that comfort should be gilen to him. A little after this, there was signs of another encounter, for the enemy appeared to prepare again to assault the hill, and other brunts Starring and his men also looked for, for it also seemed evident the fee intended to start fires around the hill to cover their purpose, but als also their efforts were feeble according to the purpose of Starring, for as fast as a torch bearer mosed forward to start a fire he was shot down. Starring decided that no enemy was going to out do him under any conditions, for he had heard that if the enem, succeeded in starting another fire at this location there would be no escape for him and his whole force on the summit of the hill.

Second that the enemy document in his purpose Starring using a magazine made of stiff paper shouted down to the enemy, that he would kill every one of his prisoners if they started a fire down belowand also that no one below either would recieve any quarter. Dangerous of c urse the situation seemed to be, and dangerous it sure was, but Starring was determined to escape with all his force. Others efforts to frustrate the enemy he looked for, but this main purpose he resolved on, to wit, to run the enemy out when he can, to have a r safe retreat when he cannot, and to resist to the last man when

As to the main purpose, his position was fixed to advantage, the way was clear before him, his mind w s beyond the open glen of escape and therefore he was determined to defeat all the purposes of the enemy. While watching and preventing the movements of the enemy, and frustrating his efforts to start another fire, by a continual fire of musketry and cannon, the Calverintan general asked of Starring: " Have you not long ago been acquainted with one known as general

Jack Ambrose Evans, known as the Guardian of the Vivian Girls.o. " Acquiainted with him. ?. Why yes. He belongs generally to any com and, . leads armies of his own occas ionally. We were well known to each other, for indeed he is one of my best friends, but he I believes thinks I can only speak english for while I was injured and waiting for my recovery in Concentinian Arronbu: gs camps he spoke to me in broken english and warned me that my mission was inclined to be ve y dangerous, and it seems he opposed it very much we are much of the same complexion,." " I percieved you knew him, and I was apt to believe that you knew him a long time, and once sus ected that you were related to one another, for you have his appearance, a look like his with your eye, you are powerfully tuilt, and your spech is much alike."

. ilany have said so who chave known us both, but were are not an any relation so far as I know, but I would not regret having him for my brother. But we can be of good h cheer, you are all welcome to acc ompany me if you desire, and what you have a mind for call for freely, and what you would have my soldiers do for you and your force of rangers, they will do it with a ready mind. You have rendered us an unexpected favor. But let us keep our eye on those Glandelinians down below. "

Now while the, were in this talk, there came a scout running up the hill, and stopped before Sturring, and that and told that about a mile and a quarter from there, the enemy was moving off to make a flank attack upon the hill, and also a force of them was coming with toruches.

" Is that so"? demanded Starring " are tyou sure?"
" Yos sir. I h have seen them".

" We will have to stop this before it gets too serious " said

This order was choyed, with the fore force went on neigre, and soon the whole colling was on the retreat. As they continued on the chief ranger said to starring; "Pray sir, now we are on the retreat, tell us some profitable things that you may know ot."

"With a good will" said Starring. I surges you have heard now, we are respectively under the residence of the codernine of an enderly function in a most furious battle, and now he and general purpose after the discord had also hard work to fight through the forest fires that came up from the south to make a chance of advance against puries where deamy. "Suy you so!" said the Calverinian general."I dare say it will be a hard

"It is so for sure, but we have encouraging means anyway and have the trees by which our whole force can fire behind. But despite it all I hope all of our force is full of lion hearted men, for in this situation we must set our faces like filmt. Don't you remember how undanated they all were, when we stood before the fee on the hill top? Well that trial is not so severe as having to meet the ene y down here."

"Well we all have to bravely suffer if we desire to accomplish the mission you are about to perform."

"So we have, but we can succeed."

"And the girl scouts bravely suffer with us." said the Cav Calverinian general.
"So they do, and besides yielet, and her sisters I have never seen any braver mirls then they and their other girl scout leaders."

"Well pray go on, for , see you are well acquainted with things."

"Ablve all above all spies I do not however believe any one went through more terrible experiences that the vivian Cirl princesses, and especially with the glandelinians under general John Manley and the other Manleys.",,,,,,,

"that kind of men are those chief [lendelinian generals!"

"Vary arch enemies of our cause, and more wicked than the devile themselves. They can be every ected of every horror that v we hear of, as they are downright accountedle, they have been the originators of the worse of assucres of children, and if they did not order it themselves have at lean least appr vpaproved of it or refund to interfere. And they are no cumning that they would not either lose or suffer for it. They have made their mode of wars o horrors at every fresh occasion and their staff generals are as good at the horrible crimes as the maleys are. Manley and the others would turn at change and change from opinion to opinion, and never give up in doing so either but so far I can learn, many of his followers have already come to an ill end."

move by this time they had come within sight of another large clearing, and they were surprised by seeing a large camp with with a Glandelinian flag floating above it, and glandelinian soldiers on guard. So-ing this Starring and his followers consulted each other, how they should pass through the camp, and some said as thing one thing and some another. At last general Saunders said:

"I am for making a swift attack upon the camp and capturing it if possible, for we are asquainted with the lay of the land at this pe ptpoint. If you think the plan is good we will make the attempt."

"Better lets have a meeting of it first." said Starring. "If every one agrees then it may be so."

So all the officers were called together; and then said Starring first;;

"Does any one know how big the camp is!"

"One who had scouted said;"It is quite a size, and the members are about over 23,000 strong, and they have a number of field game and machine game, and a strong line of works."

"for have discovered quite a lot" said starring, you "You may be very wear so sit down."

"Then said general Saunders" Well what shall we do.!! dare say the camp is stronger than we supposed. Shall we attack it, or pass around."!

"I mm also of the opinion of attacking it, said one of the Rungers. "They are strong but a suddent data accomplish wonders, and whatever we capture we can use for our journey and have more and better tents. Probably we can then pose as a glandelinian army by using the graph and no one will be the i wiser."

"But in that case then we'll chance an attack by the Christians."

"Not in this territory." said gtarring . "Who else decides!"

"Well" said another" will we secure the whole camp in our possession or might not the enoung set fire to it when he se s he is worshid."

"That might be too, but we can try to prevent it."

"We can try."

So Starring and his officers had the different parts of the force of men placed in different respective positions, and while every men was so shown himsown place Starring asked the Calvarinian general, if there might not be any prisoners or more child slaves in the Starrial incomp!"

"I will send name assute to inventigate and see" said he" and whatever else you want to find out, so do but any, and we will do but do what we can to get the information for you."

"Our great want, ends granting," is who are the Claudelinians belonging to what command they came from or main army, and hope we have the tail end of Manleys army for I'm Itching to strike that a good blow."

"That will be done " said the general, and a number of men were dispatched to scout. He maid to their 1 leader," to you tell ten of your companions to discover that they can. We'll hold of the attack untill you return."

So the rin wont to do his bidding, and then said Starring to the Calverinians,

The rest writed now while the scouts should return . rinelly one of them returned saying, "The others are remaining behind a little. We are emazed. We little thought to one rich a size for a camp, and for the tents and their make it is a very comfortable comfortable surprise, and sir also an easy prize." The generals then asked him if the climdelinium soldiers belonged to any portion of hunleys array and if he was any where near by." And the he told him they did, the generals both si suid; "Good discovery. I win wish the others would harry. hat posture is the camp

"You may be sure it is in a strong position, but very weak and unguarded in the rear. The camp otherwise is in a cumbered position. The other scout we sent has gone of off further to see whether there are any other forces of the foe anywhere near who might come to the aid of the attacked. We who yo through such a place as this has to face such porils as we have, therefore all of us sir must take head, every mon moment of the attack we make."

"But how are the Glimieliniums for artillery."

"They are much more moderate than we thought. We can use the given to good a wentabe if we capture them. We can secure a good houl for there are vagons loaded with provieton provisions near by."

finally one of the other ten came in, and Starring asked of him: "Pray how fureth it with you in your occuting work How stends the camp in its position. !"

He told the same story, but added, there is a large number of child slaves with them being driven by the lash to work."

"It happens that we have a good discovery" said the Panger Leader. "Ve need a chance in on this, as you know sometimes our way has been up hill and down bill, we are soldom at a certainity, and in capturing and using the camp we can surprise the plandelinians more when we come to them again. Of course the wind is not always on our backs, nor is every one a friend in this ter flory that we meet with in the a way. We have met with some notable encounter a already, and what are yet to come we know not, but for the most part,,, we find it true that has been talked, of old;" a good cause must nuffer trouble and disaster before it can win!"

"Talking of encounters, what encounters have we met with pray!"

"We have a been beset by the forest fires, by the enemy three or four giant alr my, first we encountered a body of Gargoylian cavarly on a road, and we routed them, then we fought with some other glandel inlines and drove them over a hill. and thus afterwards when we reached a rise of ground beyond a town, we repulled on a track by Glandelinians from below. They charged us several times and fought as for two days. Now we say have another if we attack this case one in flore one no doubt."

"Said the scout" I found this camp here strong, and we might have quite a severe fight before we can take it."

"Yes but there are two things" said Starring that we use d to have to go on this mission, and that is courage, and an unspotted life. If we have not courage, so can never hold in our way, and therefore we must have courage. I know this caution is not meeded among us. But truely there are many that go upon the road for adventure that rather declare themselves strangers to us."

" is true" said general gassiders," they a dither have the adventurers means not his courage, they probably go not unrightly, but shirk all dangers small or large one shoe goes inward another goes outward, and their socks out behind, there is a a rag and a rent, to a disapragment of our cause,"

"These things"said two other officers together "We all should look out for" or no one can expect success in any undertaking as they desire, within the way is cleared of sch spots and blemidies."

Thus they stood talking waiting for the return of the other scouts. Other portions of the troop was not in rosition for the attack yet but they were soon showed also their place. Thile they lay there the other guides came back, and goe also good information. The guiden attack was the efore made from three sites. The attack was unusually successful, and for a time no non-among the Gladelinians in the brunt of the camp so much as dured face the attacking soldiers, but their movie at she stricken, even when they board the noise of their coming. The floring landelinion in the courtried to five the neurost tests but were brought down by a volley.

The "landelinions in the rear towayer cointained a print receivence, and tooked men the attachers will creat disdain, but they could be not prostible, that those claudelinions also had to make a natural "the claudelinions however, relied and m do a few fierco attempts to value a the comp, but they were continually repelled with creat success, and soon what were left of the "Jundeliniums fled to save thomse solves from soon thatton. The attack are seen into the words will the local linears were forced to defend themselves flercely behind trees, rocks,, and bushes While the christians lay waiting for the enemy to come out and exp se expose themselves or retreat, there suddenly to Starrings surprise and dismay came a monsterous column of soldiers in gray out of the woods, and opened a fire that slew man, of the Rangers and a number of Starrings men, a d about a hundred of the Calverinians and seriously wounded the Calverinian general himself.

These Giandelinians before could not have been located and yet they had appeared so sundenly that it seemed as if they had actually sprangup out of the ground. These Glandelinians for a time then after driving the christians who survived to cover kept up a fierce fire of musketry for a long time, while others would c carry away brush and high grass with which it seemed possible they were going to fire the woods to drive Starring and his men from cover. The sudden counter attack of these Glandelinians had made great havoc among Starrings brave bands, and Starring was enraged.

Star ing therefore entered into unother meeting with his officers and it was proposed to go and charge these Glandelinians even at the risk of losing more men if perhaps they might drive the foe back for fair. Most of his officers noticing that the enemy was under cover thought it sucide, but nevertheless Starring was dtermined not to retreat under any conditions. He must pash through, even in the faces of such dangers. Starring decided to try it, and that take the chances and lead in person. He gave the orders, telling the officers that the men must not rush out into the open but to advance from tree to

Now at this the Glandelinians became very ramp at rampant and resisted the christian attack with wild fury, but the christian so drove at them, and inflicted such cruel loss upon the Galandelinians, that the enemy made a quick tretrat retreat also from tree to tree.

The Glandelinians from sounds unusual in different u quarters of the woods believed a whole christian army was coming and therefore willingly gave up the conflict and fled, taking their wounded with them but leaving their dead behind Starring had flually captured the camp and defeated the Glandelinians but the conflict had been more severe than he had expected or even wished it to be, and he did not know whether he could dare push on inthe same direction again. While he finally moved on, taking his wounded with him, after the burial of his four hundred dead, the Glandelinians,,,, you must know had at times came on again here and there,, to make desperate attempts to check Starrings advance, and therefore for a week day and night there was continually hot fighti g in ambush style, but every time these valuar vanient christian soldiers watch for the attacks they expected to come, and continually resisted the assaults, or ade made assaults thmselves themselves, in so much that in a weeks time, the Glandelinias because of their own and n unusla and heavy losses became not only discouraged but frightened, and though attacks still came, they were not so frequent as before. Very important pape papers were tha taken from some of the Glandelinians taken prisoners cut instead of taking the erisoners with them the soldiers would tie them almost Insecurely to trees and leave them to get free if they could... Many of the Glandelinians died of their wounds, and Starring himself recleved several wounds. In all he lost two thousand men while the enemys loss though unknown looked much more greater.

This victory however in the face of great odds, made Starring famous among his followers, and therefore they had a reverent esteem for him. Upon this account therefore they were willing more than ever to follow him. True there were some that at first saw reckleson as in this sort of conflict, but they got over it. Starring was in full possession of the camp, plenty of ammunition, firearms and fifteen pieces of artillery.

All the time of the fight they continually set forward on their way. This time because of danger of so many petty attacks from unexpected places the child scouts were kept in the center of the column for perfect safty. Time and again when a dangerous conflict seemed threatening, Starring would send for his officers, he would conferred confer with them, with the purpose of committing the girls and the two boys to bet er protection. The two girls howeverwere braver than than any one could have su posed. After this when they had come to another open country or claring, they came ui kly quickly to the place where many more Glandelinians were seen in hiding. They prepared again to make a stand, while Starring thanked God for enabling them to get so far in the journey despite all the resistance from the enemy, and the rather because they now found that the had a benefit by such a manly herosion as this was. They now slowly went on, going a good way fargther, the enemy of course retreating as slow as they advanced firing occasionally but that was all. They soon came alon a rise of ground, where the Glandelinians had gathered in ever increasing numbers, and upon which to attack would cause great great loss of life. Starring however prepared to attack, even though he marveled, that men like these desperate Glandelinians, who had that knowledge and ripeness of wit, should be so blinded as to offer battle here. Only starring as also consider considered again, that if he was careful his troop would not be affected by the harms of une funequal battles again, therefore he decided not to charge.

une munequal battles again, therefore he decided not to charge.

Instead he ordered his force on, and they continued on untill they came to the rier river, where fine trees grew on both sides, where there were bea tiful glens and forest plains.

ry this river side, in a small measow, there were folf folds and cotes for sheep sheep, and a house built for the nourishing and bringing up of those lambs, nd other mild animals, but no such animal was in sight. Starring had to be more careful here however even though he did not see a sign of the enemy, for he had now to his care the number of child slaves ressued during the attack upon the camp, and he had sometimes gathered some of these children, and carr ed them in his bosom.

Now to care for these little ones in case of an attack from the enemy Starring admonished the to two girl and boy scouts, and that by these waters they might be temporarily camped, and that none of them night be tacking in roper frien.ship. And the guards were to watch and if an, of them should go astray, they must bring thm thm them back again, and the guar s premished they would die before one of those trusted to his care should be lost.

Besides here the whole force were to take a temporary rest from their long journey and continued fighting, and that is a favor of no small account. Here everywhere was delecate waters, pleasant meadows in the cleaking, dainty flowers, variety of trees, mostly left lefty pin s and fir.

After such a long rest they went on, and saw again a force of the enemy gathering to resist their advance, therefore they made preparations and the and the officers consulted what was best to be done, for they still were so strong, and such a had such a good man as starring, and such good little guardians as the girl and boy. scouts, whether whether they had best made an attempt again upon the enemy or not.

One officer said one thing, and another said the contrary. One questioned if it was safe and lawful to go forward and start a discord upon such beautiful ground, another said they might, rovided their end wasgood, but starring said finally:

"Thigh Though that assertion offer d last cannot be i universally true yet we all have a commandment to resist the enemy as stoughly as we must resist sin, to overcome the evil forces and to fight the good fight for our countrys cause. These Glandelinians bar our way tward where we imish to go, and therefore I pray with whom should I fight this good fight if not with these Glandelinians again. &? I will therefore attempt to take these Glandelinians by surprise, and demolish their lines. The will go with me?"

Every one yelled ME".

So they prepared for the coming battle. First Starring went forward to secut, and found out that the Gladelinians were astanished at knowing that Starring and his followers were so hardy to kee keep on following and pressing through the woods in the face of all this opposition. The Glandelinians were gathered so strong now that they celleved a force four times that of Starring could not evercome them in a week, and again thought they, since we have made a conqust of other christian forces, shall this band made us afraid. So they rushed down to attack, and Starrings men opened fire, while another section of his force beset the enemy on the rear, and flank, and cut the Glandelinian column to pleeds at one blow. Then the the men of both sides literally fought for their very lives, but the foe though loath to retreat could do nothing else for the, were sleughter ed on awful numbers.

The next third for the forces under Starring was to make move forward to carry the Lill, and therefore the artillery which had been captured in the camp, with those added by the game of the reagent, covered this attack, powever the clandelinions thouch defected below, and because there was plenty of cover on the hill still believed that Starrings force could be worsteded they accured themselves in their position under cover of their own game. Bix columns of the range moved around to the reat and flamk of the hill, while Starring, and the calveriniums made the assault from the other side. The attackers rushed up from all directions completely currending the hill, and they made fireresty at the Glandeliniums, attacking from from every direction, and when a battery of machine game were broat brought forward to mow them down, the gamers could not set the cartridge belts inserted in time and the game were captured at one rush, and the blandeliniums in the way mowed down at one discharce in scores.

Theg_landeliniems seeing themselves surrounded fought for their very wives, and two of their leaders were shot soon. In this situation the clandel inions were very loath to give up or retreat, but straigled hard,, but they finally could no hold longer, and fled janic stricken from the scene, a great number being forced to throw away their arms in their haste. Then the christian christian persuers fell to demolishing the retreating columns, and then with an addition of equipage thus captured presend on, but they were seven days in joing shoad, and attacked and realstal every hour and stap of the way. It was stronge to see during those days the many dead bodies of so many claudelinians that lay here and there, showing the good ascaracy of the firing of the ad adventuerers, who keeping always to cover sup suffered little lost loss to themselves in killed, though a number were wounded. Starring however begin to observe by this that he was going to have a difficult time getting through this region. During the fight fight he had captured two officers prisoners, and they kept them this time as well as the others. They took the prisoners with them during their coward progress, then the Pungers so saw how the result was a i believing the woods was full of glandel things for the firing hardle never ceased, they were very apprehensive. Starring himself could do scouting work to a good profession, and therefore climbed a high tree to see the law of the and land and how full of glandelinin glandelining the region was.

Several times Starring had been doest tempted to starr a forest fire of his own to rout out the Claudelinians, a since they were so many and such a plan we all also be degeneral, be formal to take the chance. It and his force however forced their a convard, but no one for a time land to all at right for fear of being without in the dark, puring one lith, when compalled to however, the comp was creeted on a high rocky hill, a formed good for a strong defence. Wen this was done come of the officers felt nore marrier, but guards were placed to keep the enemy area. Wen all these things were accomplished, eneral Starring had the princers placed in front of the compour under the strongest guards, to take heed that the for would not attach too authorly when they saw the man of their own kind.

Starring who 'd hourd and r as a lots about the Attisann disaster was told or sked to tell the Pangers what he know of all the reports he hid head. At first Laving so many plandeling a jeconome about him, and in the samp starring was somewhat re, reduction, but he was beeged untill he finally conserted, but not untill the relicence wave placed out f of hearing. He them said:

" As for as I can mumber boys, the great disaster began at about the first day of nime but at midnight. The rections of calverinia, and Angel inic tuto terribly offected by the disaster had not been able to hear of the news for months, for they knew not what caused the shocks and the floods, and all the weekage, but nevertheless alouth ne the news had traveled like wild fire, and at first the mole civilized world was shocked by the first reports which were manger and of fel graphic and n to ger origin. I learned asso from International peports, which I secured that at first the rearle or other nations, really laughed and joked about it as great fin, not that they told it as finny, but that they believed some crazy people hard put for som thing to do, had set up such reports to give the world a good scare, and therefore ro one telleved the reports at all. The first report I recieved boys from a telegraph operator was that a portion of the city of Abbiesana, in south Central Calverinia, in pengail State had been destroyed by a sudden eruption of volcenoes opening from the ground,, ency and that a great flood was ensuring because of the explosions. As by all other disasters before, and forest fires raging elsewhere all telegraphic and other commitmications elsewhere had been wiped out, I could not get any real detail of the terrible supposed volunic upheaval, and therefore also believed that the story was caused by some one gone and by the horrors of war and entrefore writing and publicating these reports in his fits of insanity.

Therefore I must confide the state and L lambed good heartly, and so did the moddiers and the generals themselves, and even be eval given said;

"That will theme note write next. What has become of all our equipmels. They are needed now to which a sill those note."

the was however in the modeling of the tenth of June, that the horrible news were continued, not once with the installations and theorem reports that the fixed was a surpling the whole country, our also by letters received by the vivide Girls, our also by letters received by the vivide Girls, our trivials whose code.

On the next day, many in the army began also to rective detailed rejects, showing that the entire country had been blown up, and that the whole country had had been divantated by the explications in a wider area than the flood, and that probably hundred of thousands had periched percent of mud, had been carried down by the flood, and the explosion had harled hot clouds and fierce—flaming wreckage—percent of towns like some great blanket of death, and had destroyed whole regions in fifteen or twenty minutes. As the disasters caught most of the people at night, there had been no time for panic, for there was one moment of agony and then all was over. Yet still though I believed these reports I still thought however that they were much exaggerated, but because no real strong news could come of the disaster, as no telegraph lines had been restored, though later additional news was recieved, that the explosions had caused great landslides, that the whole nation had felt the tremors, and that the whole nation was in a state of panic because of the strange underground and explosive erustions.

Governor Gamen whe ruled Abbicannia state with his splendid judgement and magnificent enthusiasn laid before his Tribunal immediately in a special message the demands to have the reports investigated to see if they were true or not.

Therefore a week after the first report of the disaster, reporters came to him telling him the investigators could not reach the scene because of a terribly devues devuesting flood raging over the country. This seemed to confirmed the reports, and therefore the Tribunal passed a bill spyropriating means to navagitate the flood zone, to see that nature the disaster had. An objection in the ritual caused a delay from Monday till vednesday, but the Tribunal heads, promptly rebulked or rebuked the objector, and the expedition was made. From the have ever been heard from since, and that had Coverner James sannon Procile worried and he tried to send a message from purpor vivian, or to him, but the telegram came back with the report of not being able to pass through the disaster zone as everything is down.

This news was indeed more shocking, and surprising... surprising.... General Dargur the great Head of the Gemini, who is the loader of one of the greatest societies of christian spies in the world, said to be that he could have divided the great disaster into general classes::

The explosions that make floods and devantation more slowly.

The explosions that destroy most rapidly and cause overwhelming floods, and fires. The latter kind he told me are the most dangerous to our country and all human live, and the physical face of the country. Floods that are caused by natural results are periodical wellings over of waters from a swollen river, comparatively harmless in our country with the strongly proc protecting levees. But when levees are blasting by the explosions, terrific disasters such as already happened takes place.. It is the same cause that makes a dam burst. Many have made very interesting descriptions, showing that the famous and now ill fated city of Abbieann was founded on the islands between branches of the Mic-Hollester River, and that some explosive force from somewhere finally produced a flood which destroyed the city... The distance from the scene of the greatest explosions of all to the city is fifty miles. Several hills and ravines and a forest are epread between the city, and the scenes of the explosions of greatest force, which had no c flood resulted after the explosions, the death list probably would not have been quadrupled. The vast torrents of water let loose by the explosions from some unknown source were for four hours after the explosions held back by one of the long levees of the river which of course flowed over in many places from recieving such a volume of water. Some party of the town of Hidie's junction reported nearly two ou hours before the outburst, that a levee some where near Adeleheid city had or was strangely holding back an ernormous volume of water coming from no one knows. If this levee would have held the disaster would not have been increased. Before the pressure of the ever increasing volume the levce weakened. Soon the flood became of such an intensity that it was impossible to concieve its awful force, and the levee was unable to withstand the strain. The flood first sought another outlet by going through a long time break in the levees near Lake Selicia, which it filled up, and gave water faster than it could run out of the break still remaining, starring a flood over the other former devastated territory again. Then the whole length of that levee crashed and was washed away. The sound they saw was like the side of a mountain blowing out. At long as it takes a projectile to shoot through the air, just so long it took the fierce torrent to fall upon Abbieann and all towns and villiages elsewhere in its path.

The city of course was washed partly away. The consequent igniting of towns and villiages nearest the explosions must have generated posionous basis, that resulted in the centh of many victims. They inhalation of the strange hot air was almost instantly fatalled and vegetable life survived any of these disasters, and yet many say it is quite certain that the jeeple had some kind of wurnings in cufficient time to escape if the disasters had occured later in the day when every one had not been in bedalfere than a month before, there were sounds of exclusions near the city of Alriann. There explacions produced to more a vicient translings of the earth as if there were earthque one cuck conficutations usually pre-ede the tragic climix of volcanic activity of dangerous kind, but as Dargar says that he had taken in all the scene of the explosion region and swears that they were not volcanic eruntions but explosions of other source. Had they been strange volcanic activity from the ground, then we could not and would not suspect the enemy. The destruction of Abbicann maken to calverinia a terrible loss, because the city, was the largest city, and the main only commercial center left open of all our country, being well built, prop prosperous, and with hundreds of railroads running in and out, and with great and magnificent eleveated tradh lines. Its populat ion was considered about six to seven million. There were hundreds of national canks in the city, ernormous factories, mills, and even big gas we works, transportation companies, and Commercial banks linked with every banking cooperation of the nations of the world. The blow therefore to our country is terribly severe, as even from the banks hundreds or billions of actions had been swopt away in currency and silver by the flood, probably never to be recovered. The city was like vivian Ficke; comprising different sections, about ten sections, but the upper section is said to be the only one left. to which I am going to obde observe to find clues as to the disaster.

Its extreme length was about fourty five miles to the or from the north-ast,, to the southwest,,, and the main part of it was shaped more like a starfish, with rough edges for a readom towns, its greathest width being about seventeen miles.

The mountanous interior of this section had been torn and gashed or ruined by a landslides caused the the by the violence of the explosions, and perpendicular alleges, deep clefts and garges were ruined by the shocks. The total population of Abbicann, which was included by two hundred and seventy five thousand foring foriegner foriegners, were said to have been destroyed by explosions horri horror, or being caught asleep in their failing buildings and drowned in the ensite nousing floods. Abticann is said to have interesting claims, in that puperor Vivien and his wife and prombs were born there.

The region of Abbierna became a suspicious point just some weeks before the disaster. The nows arived that a force of men acting suspiciously had been soon near lake St Ann. At this some rivor craft armed ith gams and force of soldiers arived at Abbierna, and started for the locality. So suchis supplies a moderate could be seen.

of course by these explosions, and by all other disasters of the past year the hubitations of all the Calvorinians of the south have been leveled or flood event, or burned by forest fires, or buried by explosions, and the number of human bring killed in galvorinia lone in this way can pass comprehension.

"Yes" said the head Ranger."I've heard a whole lot about it all and learned more than any one knows and can prove it too. They were some of the most frightful explosions of all onrecord, and many other witnesses tell me that in the north branch of the Vivian mills the concussions caused a secondary earthquake of terrible force which vibrated the hills so much, that they sent down eight to ten thousand feet the most terrific avalanches on record, that overwhelmed every town and small or hig city in the valleys or on the hillsides. It has happened since last June as we all know but even now no one has ever been able to determine how many lives were actually lost by these landelides, but it may run into the scores of thousands.

Every surviver in the neighborhood though some volcanoes had blown themselves up, and near the town of postellio a hillsilide produced by the concussion produced or so sent II6,000,000 yards of rock and eart, earth, stones and fragments of trees into the valley beneath, the avlanche traveling at the rate of sixty five miles an hour and was one hundred and fifty feet or more deep. Hear four thousand five hundred sixty persons lost,, their lives."

"The biggest explosions actually occur" asked one of Starrings followers.

"The biggest explosions is said to have occured, on a big river is land between the city of Abbieann and Adeleishdi, and Heidi Junction" said the Leading Renger.

"I found the evidence myself when I went with Dargar, and know the places well. The greatest explosion known of a mountain long age called Asama, IT Krakutea which occured between Jama and Javan and Sumatra was but that of a fire cracker compared to this tremendous upheaval. We all know that since October or earlier of 1912 these awful disastirs have commenced, flood fire, and explesions massucre and the like, but the great Abbieann g horror did not come until the midnight of June the first as recorded by the reports. I have heard reports that the flames or flushes of the explosions that night could be seen about one hundred and twenty miles as as I believe you also have heard that these unsual explosions truching so loudly cet in motion air waves that is claimed to "ave traveltd around the world twelve times one way, and elx times the other, and shock the whole nation to one degree or enother. Every self r recording barometer in the world was said to have been most viclently disturbed, a score of times by this blos a. These veres traveled at the rate of one hundred and five alles as hour at the farthest a achie, and at the nearest at a rate of probably one thousand one hundred miles on hour. I whe then on a visit at Angeline Junction in Morthern Angelinia State, 5,678 miles away, and we heard the noise of this explosion. It was said to have been felt in northern Clandelinia, and southern Abbiechnia, each 10,000 miles away, and at Pundora porthern Abbiecomia, 16,100 miles distunce. The explosions of the loadest was heard over a confounded sound zone covering one quarter of the earths curface.

Even though the sea was far from the scene, vaves were created on the seas on both the west and east cousts, which destroyed all lighthouses along the two shores. Destroyed all the towns and villiages, on the southwest shores of Culverinia, and northeast shores of same state, and partly of northern Angelinia on the northwest, and southeast. Destroyed thousands of vessels shipping there. and drowned nearly too hundred thousand people. Faired a tidal waren ear near Calverinie a hundred and eighty five feet high-Covered five hundred thousand against miles of country with debris and dust several inches thick so that many people though it was a mighty volcanic when on uphenval Submerged or sunk a whole country side near the rivers, one hundred and six miles againe, and seven hundred feet high, in depth of o water six to eight hundred feet. Created a record treaking flood that destroyed thousands of villiagen, cities and towns, and uprooted whole forests, and started new forests fires of its own."

""Yes" said Starring, and untill avidence proved the real facts, the survivors of ruined towns and cities which did not suffer from fleed, believed the shocks and explorions to be the most disanterous eroptions and earthquaken of all time. The shock was felt with disasterous effects as wel we all know as far south as Angelinia Agathia, Even in Francis Atlanta, before the flood came there, all the houses of the northern part of the city were either overtirmed by the concession or blown in , fifty thousand of the inhabatants were killed or injured, and while streets more buried, so that the rest of the city than ecountry could not for a time aid the so those in debris.

The cities, of Francis Anna, Hildred graenburg,, Coimbra, Operto junction, Braga Crossroads, and Santa Ubes, and Martinian, were partly destroyed to a severe or lass degree, by explosion force and flood, and the city of North Pandor I may Largely reduced to ruins. One half of Calverine on the northeast side, was destroyed and over fourteen thousand people killed. The Island of Constantine was laid waste. and the ruin extended to towns and cities in northern Calverinia,, where half of the number of towns were laid low ... "

"I have here a list" said granting, producing an enveloped," which I captured from one of the prisoners will shows he knew the names of the prinicial towns and villiages, harribly destroyed by the explosion, and yet not touched by the flood. This shows my dear friends and companions that the quality satastrophe which visited culverints in pongul giato and other some of the name time, which resulted in the descriction of Abbiecam and man bother towns and cities, and an unknown number of lives is accurally caused by the enemy, and which surely herrified the world to an extreme. "hough the whole world chaddens at every natural culamity which results in the sudden death of the am numbers of coule, not the chole world was still more shocked and terrified at this one caused by the enemy. These terrible explosions coming so suddenly in the night, ove wheemed these doomed cities listed here without the slightest warning, catching every one asleep in their beds, and in the breif space of fifteen minutes, turned the whole of mengal state into an unparalled scome of de vastation, and then later in the morning start at floods which quadrupled the destruction. In all towns and cities within the explosion area, very few persons escured this most horrible of fates, that exact a wast country side of multitudes to their deaths. by blust, fire and frood.

This list astonished me. Even out of the mouth of the treacherous craters of our own or volcances of other countries never has such a disaster sprung, and even such havor is nothing compared to this. Now this list boys shows somety i something o of suspicion for why should the enemy keep these if they did not want to hide semething. As I read in a description which I found of a long letter, strange noises had been heard for two weeks in the region of these explosions. Then at midnight the explosions occured, and all these cities and towns listed here were no doubt enveloped, and every one destroyed. This list was pul published by a printer printer in the city of Angelinia Agat i Agataia, and how this landelinian got hold of this is a mystery . Ever it bollo here that with sight time without, the true is a mostery . Ever it follower that with the inpliction of the flow, the toward of sheating flows from the explicions and force fine a. . gtarring continued; The first report that was accepted of this great cultumity, came by a courier on a fast gasoline launch from the city of & John, and though believed at first or not was printed throughout the city of Angelinia Agathir, on the morning of June the 30th the day the first news came in. The report only so far made this small announcement, which know almost by heart,.

*It is said the city is of abbieaun, the principal river boart and railway and Commercial center of Calverinia was destroyed, with all its inhabitants at the midnight hour of June the First, by either a mysterious Mind of kind of volcunic eruptions from the ground of unusual force. The number of lives lost is believed to exceed five mittion, and may be as great as sevenmentilion seven million . The whole country side around or near Abbiedan was reported to have srupted into the air. For more than fifteen m inutes, debris and wreckage through up by the uphonval poured down upon the doomed city. The panicetricken population who survived the crash, and heat of flame fled to the river side, but in wain a sudden flood engl engulfed them. All the ships in the river harbors were destroyed by the crash and the people who fled to the wharves were soon caught in the awful flood that resuled and drowned, while the city in the Borth was consumed by fire. At 1 the subrubs of the city of Abbisams on the north within a full radius of many miles were completely descroyed. All communications with the explosion area, with the whole nation and world in general was interrupted for good probably, He River at: steamer within the region of explusion escaped.

The investigators reported that in the city of St Abbienum and suburem all the population had perioned, either under the rulie, or when overwhelmed from the finshes of the explosions, or from the flood that came so statemly afterwards. Those on board a fiver Steamer called the costellio polores, belonging to the Abbisannia Northern st camehip company, who had not slept that night, with fourty sight sailors, and twenty Calverinian women and children as paneongers had been a with ness of the catastrophe, as well as fifteen sailors of the Abbiennian pational Passenger steamer, which by suddenly slipping her anchor, escaped from the narbot of the southern part of the city, a few minutes before the city was so standardy these incidents to one another for about three hours or more they recontinued their retreat, after a having again bravely resisted some petty attacks from hidden parties of the enemy, and therefore they went onward untill they came to what looked like to them a branch of the great Vivien Hills, densel, forested, but strangely there was the smell of was water in the air, not like that of a river but that of a swamp, However they m came across some more rangers there, who welcomed them, as they had been expect ing the urival of these forces and hoping for them for these Rangers seeing so great a train of soldiers, and men following general starring, (for with him they were well asquainted, they said when greating him;;;

"Good evening general Starring, you sure have minrge force of followers for your adventursome movement. Pray how did you gather all these! Making a new army for your own purpose to crush the for yourself. ?"

Then said general starring;

"Yes. They will be a great help to me in case in my investigations I might be be attacked. I hear the region of abbienm is now in possession of the fos."
"Tou sure have a strong and most comfortable company" said the gamper in charges and rangers also with you rou are welcome to us, for we need even your bun protection as this is now the abbisant Territory you are in, and the ros are all about ima"

This news surprised starring, but he said;

"This day see that luck does come to us, and that the grace of god does the chine in all or facesm a and that you may if you wish be some of my reinfer reinforcements, for then we can push on through the enemy ter i territory for we can make the Glandelinians to leave us our unwonted liberty to go through where we please. "

So all of the force went up to the camps on these hills, and starring and the rest did follows when they were all settled down for a nights rest, one of the migers said to the children themselves;

"What do you two girls and boys want for supper."

Angeline the told her desire, and the others too, and so the Rangers made a feat feast for the whole company, the which when they had recieved, they went to their sleeping quarters, which the guards went to their proper places. When morning was come and because these mountains were g high, and the day not so smoky though the sky still yellow and because it was the custom of the rangers to show to vii visitors, before their ownward march, some unusual and rare sight, therefore after guarring, and his girl scout and hoy scout guide s were ready, and the whole force had refreshed them. selves, the nungers led them all to the summit of the highest of the nearest of the hills, and showed them something unusual far off. It looked like a vast stretch of water with trees bobbing up from its surface. Then they took them up a little higher show them something more new. The first was poined out as apart of Heidi Junction but it was of such a distance and there was such a hars, that no matter where they Ilooked they could not see much of anything. They maked the Ranger want the view could be, and they told Starring that the ruins was a part of Heidl's Junction, or whose almost total destruction he must have heard , in the first of the recorded news, and that the scenes confronting themm shows what difficulties they would meet in trying to find out any clueve as to the cause of the catastrophe. "I know all about that town" said Starring. "It is a city destroyed worse than

THE STREET OF THE PARTY OF THE

many. H

Then the tanger pointed out another place or section viewed from such a height, and there with the help of powerful field glasses Starring, saw a mass of water to the right, all covered still with slowly moving wreckage, and further off two tward the north, they saw a high rolling and towering cloud all white, and very heavy, and lights ever and anon flashing up and down through the clouds. Now behold this scene would every once in a while change a little, and the cloud would change shape, look thicker and darker, or thinner and lighter. Starring Makedi; "What is that. !"

"That is one of the forest fires a smouldering ha after destroying the forest" said the ranger. "The cloud shows of a great smouther from the leveled forest debris. That fire is caused by the explosions Now the diamedinians who were responsible for all this, are such as hate all phristianity and Him who made us all, but as o you see, this flood fire, and scene of rule is a full syldence against dlandelinia. Who ever they be that had been mean shough to do all this, yet labored all in vain, for Glandelinia will fail in her efforts, and ded, when a little time is spent, will cause that Calverinia shall rise better and more beautiful. Then they faced more to the southwest , where they showed them far off a vast refusee camp.

"How far can this piace be" asked Angeline Richse." "About ten mileswihle is to show you, that those who have a heart for our cause imbor ardently for the poor homeless refugees in the face of all perile, and they sure shall never want. As the saying is, those that give a cup of water shall have it re-

Then said Jennie;

"I wondervif it could be, if ; with my glasses could see any trace of the city of Heid! Junction from here: And she looked hard and long atte the hardly could not see a thing as the haze obscured most of the views Now when they had seen all these things, they returned slowly to the camp, and here they were intertained, but while they were thus having it right, they heard from afar some one shout; "Cursed be clauded inte for laying waste to calverinta, Oh that I had been torm in pieces before I had to even save my life, seen such a sight." This cry made the two girls turn while white and Jennie said;

"Blessed were they who secaped safe from this disaster."

Tet all this while she and Starring longed to see the chance to discover who were really responsible for the catastrophe, and finally she said to starring; "There was one chance when I was with Viciet and her sisters in the Clandelinian camp to secure some information, of which I cannot take my mind, and therefore because of my failure I had miscarried.

"My not mention your loss to Starring"! Asked Angeline.

"Nay Angeline, of course it is no shame but a virtue to long for such a thing as yhis this, but sometimes ; feel ashamed that ; and they failed, even though the fires Prustrated all our efforte: "

Hir you could spring your information to starring, maybe that will give us a better chames to succeed now" said Radel iffes

Now this secret of hers was indeed one of a thousand. She was pure if it could be followed out when in Municysclines it could prove who were guilty of the disasters eithout without the least difficulty. She claimed she had talked with many glandelinian soldiers who could tell if they wanted to, and they have said, not suspecting who she was that they have seen the very ducuments signed that was to pass the degree for the making of the disasters, and they have also seen the very orde orders written. Yes such an excent excellency was there in her secret, that she sure hoped for success if she could only reveal it without detection. Jennie therefore went to Starring, and said to thinks we will all miscarry, if she does not think you can work it through. "Call her" said starring" she shall assuredly have all the aid we can give her for guiding us so well.

she then came to starring and he neked; "What is it you wish to tell me. "! "??????

Then she said "I've a great secret, and" and she told it to him in a whisper. He non nodded and said"; 1'11 do what | can. "Then she bowed her head and gas gave thunks, and said;

"By this I know we all have gained favor in the eyes of Med."

ARIVINGS WITHIN THE FLOOD ZONE. BTO IES OF BOME BURY IVORS.

When they were determined to go onward, the majority of the Pangers prepared to rein force gtarring, and also gave advice and caution, even though gtarring and his girl scout guiden were well acquainted with thing things, and so dould recieve the cautious warnings more sensonably to wit. we even when the danger s was approaching, no onward tward the scene they went. When they had gone onwards quite a ways , they quickly rame to the place where gharring in the early time of the war met with a for gner who had turned away from the christlen cause and through his own fault perished in the big disserter..... Of this man starring reminded as many of his fellowers who were where more I commot recall,, who carried with him the character of his unusual desert---ion and treason at the very doors of our gountry. And this is what I have to say con-corning thin man, he would harken to no council, but once a failing, persaulon could, not atop him when he came to the armics under general Arronburg, he did meet with those the tried to personde him from his foolish and wicked course, but he only refused to harken gnashed his teeth, and stamped and shook his fists in their faces and and he was resolved to go back to his own country. And after all our country had done for him. Before he left the cumb, he w met with jack grane, who offered to lay hunde on him, to turn him into the right way again. But this fool resisted him, and go having done much despite unto so good a men, he got away and desited us wholly but later periahed in the flood, so they tell meale done this because it is said a prayer for a particular thing seemed to be or was not answered. A crasy reason to denert our cause."

They had continued on for several miles now, as a end when they reached a nort of girm, gtarrings fords wasconfronted suddenly by a hords of Ashdelinians Strong in the bornerirst the disoletinian teader desired to partey with carring, and to speak with him, and after some short consideration graining decided to allow the grandelinian commander to come forward without molestation. Then the grandelinian commander standing about ten paces from starring as he would not come nearer demanded;

"Who are you sir, and what force have you theret"

"Betarring made and waiter Bearrings You may show therefore who , am, what my pumpose is, and therefore need not tell you where , am goings"

"Well" said the Glandelinian leader, "I'il let you offmore easier if you will either, turn aside from your course, or become one of us, or go back tward the place from where you came. If you refuse to do so you and your whole force will die upon this spot as you will recieve no quarter."

"Starring laughed as he answered; "I have been a true man to my cause for all these years, and therefore do you jack-"I have been a true man to my cause for all these years, and therefore do you jackasses think or expect that will dust in my lot with you fees of dod! The places from

I'm going to attack."

At this the dlandelinian commander hastened back to his command. Starring was the first to attack,, and he surprised the miandelinians by the violence of the assault and though the diamdelinian force was six to his one, he finally carried all beforem him narrowly capturing the Ulandelinian leader, and destroying half his commend. The survivors hid behind trees and bushes after this, and kept up a neavy fire for fully three hours, hoping the sound of firing would bring help, but no one appeared, and gtarrings men working around got the glandelinians finally in the rear and their retreat was a precipiated rout. It was certainly an unequal fight indeed against great odds, Starring likeing licking a force six to his one. After this to try to stay his purpose a whole host encomped against Starring and his little band, but he did not fear. Tet during the conflict Starring was surprised that the for had not oried out, that some other force might not have come to its succor. He had read in some records, that one man fought an army, that agampson slew a thousand men with the bone of an ass, and therefore was astonished at his own victory against no experior a force, and with little loss to his own side... Bearing knowing how to deploy his force resumed the conflict against this alandslinian hors encamped against him, fighting all day, driving even this force out of the woods and destroying a part of their camp. All of gtarrings force worthily behaved themnelves, all fighting a great while, as fieros as a gaint resisting unto blood, striving against sin. All the time of the struggle starring prayed to God, who he knew could hear, and an afford invisible help, and that he knew was sufficient for him. He himself had a good strong aword, and any man who happened to have one of these blades, with a good hand at expert awardsmoundip, and great skill to use it, may venture upon a demon with it. Starring did not need to fear any enemy wity with this sword, for he knew how to lay it on He even fought against Clandelinian officers, witill the sword did almost cleave to bis bend, and when the flood almost ren through his fingers he continued on-The glandatinian lusaes was awful, but after this conflict, Starrings hand was beaut onew day and night, during him a advance, and firing hardly never command news

Angeline miches, and jounte washed his wounds, and ga gave mtorring what they had to refresh him. They then went onward, in the face of all the fleroest opposition, because Observing was determined beyond all means to make progress, he was delighted in this exciting part of the adventure, even though the shota sounded as loud one as frequent and as fraquent as the loudest and wildest Fourtrof ,uly, and because there was nomething inspiring to it all, and became there were many leaders of his band as good as himself, and therefore he questioned one of the mangers during one of the halts and conflicts.

"what country men are you sirit"

"I am of northern Calverinia, for there in the city of malcio I was born, and there my mother and father, and wife and children are still far from the war sone." "The city of Baldio" said Starring," does that not be in on of the localities of the big Abbienn disaster. "?

"No 1 do not think so Now that caused me to become a ranger was my denire to fight the forest fires. And we had one friend whose name is Jack Turop come to visit me, and he told me all what the enemy had done since last November, the year of 1912 up to now, and how he was going to join the army and betake himself to a soldiers life to help his country crush the mandelinians. It was also confidently reported how he had killed a glandelinian discovered raiding his home, and how he got through to where he was goingalt was also told with what welcome he had in entering the ranks of the Abbigunnian army, he was recieved with sound drum and trumpet ,by accompany of offic ers and soldiers. He told it also how all the bands in the army did play pieces for joy at his reception, and what other things I shall forbear to relate. In a word that man so told the story of his travels since he entered the army,, that my heart fell into a burning haste to be gone after him, no could father or mother or wife or children stay me, so I got from them, and am come thus far on my way."

"You came in through general Arrenburgs army did you notfillill"
"Yes, yes, for the same man also told us, that all would be nothing if we did not begin to enter at Arrenburge camp first."

"Look" said Starring to Angeline sionee, "The results of these stateters, is bein. being spread auroad lar and near,

"Wiy is this one of the famous Vivian Girl Princesses with you?" "Miy no" said gtarring. "(mly one of their great girl scouts, and the other three the girl and the two boys are her companions...w What, and going on the same mission as you are too!"

"Yes, verily, or at least they are going as my guides as they know the downty country while I don't. "It makes me giad to hear it. The many good Christian e generals. How joyful they will be when they shall see them that succeed in this mission bring the guilt of diandelinia to exposure beforevthe win1 whole world." "Without doubt it will be a comfort to the whole nation, for next to the joy of finding out who the gulity ones are, it will be a juy to find means to prevent all much dianaters in the future." "But now you are upon that, pray let me hear your opinion of it. Some make a question, whether I shall succeed in my mission or not. The Vivian Girls are great you know, and a forest fire frustrated them.

"All right "Baid the Ranger I will. Do they also think every one who tries such an adventure shall fail, or shall they rejules to see themselves in that bliss of winning such wonderful victories. And if they think they shall know and do these things successfully in the end, why not others, and rejoice in their welfare also? Again if our cause is so good,, yet why not should you be successful in the end prividing providing you place your trust in God. Y ?"

"That is a strange question, but I percieve whereabouts you are as to this... I never cease praying?"

"Have you any more things to ask me the reason why I came out here as a war

"Yes " said gtarrig, gtarring.. W"Was your father and mother, and wife and childener willing, that you should in such awful times become a war Ferest Rangerfillian "I should may they were not, and at first for fear of my sufty, they used all means imaginable to personale me to remain at home...

"Thy what could they say against it, knowing you was doing your duty for your country, and itscause and its cause.. "?

"They said it was not a very good life, and If I myself were inclined to go through a life of danger and hardships, I would never chance a Rangers job."

"And what also did they say!"

"Why they told me sir, that it was a dangerous sort of life, a Forest Rangers, especially at this time, yes the most dangerous way of all in the world, which the Rangers and the soldiers live."

"Did they prove to you wherein it is so dangerous?"

"Yes, and that in many particulars." "Name nome of them" said Starring."

"Thry told me of the flarcosness of the forest fires, where many perished in fighting them. They told me that Glandelinians reamed the country everywhere, or stand ing roudy bohind trees and bushes to shoot them that would enter their territory. They also told mo of the perils of fighting fires in dark mountain woods, of the difficult hills, and also of the perils of explosions and the life, and of ambuses, snares and traps and every vile peril. They said moreover, there were foul Glandelinians every where you go. They told me the whole region is a " valley of the shadow of death", where the Glundelinians are more dangerous than the hobgoblins of hell are, where every mile of the way is full of dangerous n snares, pits, ravines, traps and gins. They told me also of the speed of the advancing fires, and of the ruin every one m sets that goes through such a dangerous territory. Further they said I must go over the flood zone, which unloss I know the country was the most dangerous of all. And after all this, I should find still greater perils, and that the flood lie between me and escape from foes."

"And was this all!"
"Ho, they also told me the way was full of decievers, and of persons that lay in hd hiding there to turn all men out of the way!"

"But how did they make that out?"

"They told me that Glandelinians disguised as Christians did lie at any place a waiting to decieve. They also said there were persons who would trick you, or catch you in their snare, or with that of other energy, I would presume to go head on into a more dangerous zone, which might as well taking the chances of going to the by way of hell.

"This adoud sounds discouraging, but did they and here,?"

"No, they told me of thousands of had tried many important missions, and that they they had gone a great way therein, to see if they could find semething of the glory there for those who succeed, which so many have talked about so often, and how they came back, and befooled themselves terribly for setting out on se dangerous a journey to the satisfactory results of course for Glandelinias nursuse purpose. And they named many that did so, who they said had gone so far to see if they could find what they were sent after, but not one of them found so much advantage by going, as ammounted as much as a feather. !"

"Said they anything more to discourage you?"

"Yes they told me of one, who was a spy, and how he found his work and his journey so solitary, that he never had a comfortable hour, also that many times to hide from the enomy who were looking for him he ulmost faced starvation and danger of death from the enemy and thirst and fires, and that he almost was drowned when fleeing he stepped into the flood near Heidi Junction, however what really happened to him was"snothered up but he never returned."

"alind did none of these things make you feel discouraged?"

"No, they seemed to be as so many nothing but megear reports to me."

"How came that about?"

"Why I still believed what my sl soldier friend told me, andwhich and which carried me boyond them all."

"Then this was your victory, even your faith in the success of your purpose?" "It was so, I believed, and therefore came out, got into the way, foughtall that set themselves against me, and therefore succeeded in becoming a Ranger, and obtained a hardy body of followers as you see with me."

By this time they had reached where a part of the Abbieann flood had raged, where where theair was sultry, smelled of water and the odor of wet wood and other debris and all that a swamp would boast of And here the region was covered with wreckage of broken trees, boards and timbers, excepting here and there a small stretch of muldy water, a sign of a past disaster, where many who were caught in it, never shall rise or wake again in this world again. For now they were out of the forest, but beyond there appeared a forest of debris, and now knowing where they were Starring went before, for that he was the leader, and the troops came behind, for fear lest preadventure, a horde of Clandelinians, should fall upon their rear in the open countrt country, so and so do mischief.

They went on here each man ready for they knew it was a dangerous place. They were more and more into the heart of the enemys territory, a place where the enemy would try his best to prevent all investigations of the flood zone. Also they cheered U 363 up one another as well as they could. Angeline Richae, and her girl and two boy com- $\frac{1}{2}$ anions, Starring commanded should keep close with the band now, and the others were under the eye of their leaders, the Rangers taking up the rear. However they had not traveled about one fourth of a mile, when which surprised them greatly a strange and intolerable darkness fell upon them all, so that they could hardly for an hourvor hour or so, see even each other. They suspected a terrific storm, but the darkness was followed by a strange dark mist, and therefore as they went on more slowly they were forced to feel for one another by a contant conversation, for they could not see a thing ahead of them.

A nyhow any one should think, that for even the strongest of them all there was difficult hardships for their going, and yet how much worse, for the four child scouts, who were still of feet quite tender. Yet every one encouraged each other as they might , xand also through the encouraging words of the leaders of the expedition in front, and of those that brought up the rear, they made it pretty good nevertheless, and there,, was no complaints heard from any quarter. Any time however they felt the circumstances would become worse, because now they were in a edge of the disaster flood zone, which which flood though had receded had not gone off altogether, and therefore their tramping was becoming wearinsome and tiresome, through dirt and mud, clamboing over piles of shattered rubbish, abatic of trees left by the swirl of water, mud deep enough to make you think it is a bog and so on-And even there was never within easy sight such a thing as a whole house of any kind, and therefore they went on, grunting, puffing, and sighing, then some would stumble over a bush, or walk headlong in the dark against some obstructi obstruction and do much against his will an acrobatic stunt, another cticks first in the dirt and believes he is in a bog and yells for help, and the four scouts lose their very shoes in a real bog, narrowly escaping as it is.

Some one tha then cries out"I am down in a hole, " and enother, "He where are you!" and a third," Hey look where you are going, don, t ram me in the eye, cush" and at that still enother" I am caught in some tangle of br bushes, and I cannot get out, some one pull m3 me out."

Then they came within sight of some glare far in the distance, and this you must think was all the more exciting, for all of them began to be badly foiled with the roughness of the way, but there was not one of them, that ever thought of stopping without the command of their leaders. They all also continually ; paid good heed to the advices of their leaders, and the little guides, and they did so faithfully tell them of the many dangers, and of the nature of the dangers they were facing in all this strange darkness, that usually when they were nearest to them, they did most pluck up their spirits, and hearten one another to be prepared. This part of the country was the extreme southeastern part of engall state, though they knew it not. They went onward slowly and carefully, till they came to a more smelly place and as the darkness grew more intense they feared they might lose their way. They wondered no rain fell, or that there was no wind, whor thunder or lightning... ven when it is light Angeline Riches could tell well enough how to miss the ways through this region that led into danger, but now in such darkness she was put at a stand, and she advised starring to halt the column, which he finally did. Angeline pichoe had in her pock a map of all ways leading through the region of Rengall State, therefore she ligh lit her flashlight lamp, and loked over the map which was in it a little book the gook . And indeed if she had not been a little careful to look in this map , they all would for certain have been smothered in the mud, for just a little way before them, formed by the seeping waters of the receding floods, a large pit full of mud, mud a hundred and fifty feet deep, and even the ground around the bog its self was as soft as cotton or a sponge.

It is sure evident that those who go through advantures in any part of calverinia must have one of these maps about heem, so that he or she may look when at a stand, so they could discover which way it should be they must take. They continued on then, but in another direction as the way tward the bog was utterly impassable. However they were trembling to go forward, only they felt lke taking some of the debris of softer material and of making torches by which they could light their way, and this was readily agreed to as the darkness was great.

And every one began to be sorely weary weary, and therefore they all cried out unto Our Blessed Lord, asking Him to make their way more comfortable. owever when they had traveled several miles farther, a wid wind arose that drove away the smoke fog which came from a big forest fire a distance away, so the air became more clearer but it still remained dark, though the darkness was becoming relieved somewhat by the glow of the racing flames. As they thus got somewhat relieved some of those in the van percieved a sound of some scleme kind, as of one who was in grief, and much concerned for some h something he di desired very much. so they continued on faster and looked carefully before and behind and to either sidd side of them, and soon they observed a man upon his knees, wity hands and eyes lifted up, and speaking or praying loudly. and clearly. The van of the party drew nigh, but they could not tell what nature the prayer was, so they felt softly onward untill he had finished. hen he ceased praying he arose to his feet and and began to 2 walk southward. Then Starring called after him and said.

"Hey my my friend, let us have your company."

The man stopped at his bidding, and they came up to him. As soon as one of the nearest of the rangers came up t him he whispered to gtarring; ; ;;;;

"General am sure I know this man."
"sho is it."!
"He is a victim of the flood. He prays every day for aid from Heaven for his country. He wants to go and fight, but he is rejected because of his age. He comes from the city of El Verso, and he certainly is a right goood man." So the Ranger and the man came up to one another, and presently the man said to the

Ranger .:

"Oh is that you seorge!"

"Ay, said the ranger" that is who I am, as sure as you are Mike."

"Right glad I am to see you" said the man whose name was Michal Staring. "I am glad that we have come together once more."

"and I am sure glad too," said the other," that I observed you upon your kness."

Then wike blushed and said; "Did you reallly see mo?"

"Tes I did said the other, and my heart was very glad at the slight."

W" WEll what did you think." said Mike.

"Think" said the Ranger! "What do you think I should be thingnig thinking. I thought We had a good man upon the road, and therefore should have his company by and by. "If you thought of no other way, how happy , am then. But if , be not as desired, I must alone bear it."

"That is true" said the Ranger," but your fear further confirms me that things are right between us and you.

Then said walter starring himself;

"Would you mind tolling us, what caused you to be upon your knees untill we came up to you? Was it that something unusual was happening or how?"

Wike looked at him and said;

"Sir, you see we are in a part of the disaster zone, and as I was coming along I was musing with myself of what a dangerous location this was just now, and how many that have come so far on an investigation of the region, have here been stopped by the enemy or destroyed. I thought also of the manner of the death, which this great disaster had destroyed such a f a awful numbers. Those that died here, died suddenly, died violently.

As I was thus musing, I met with one of very pleasent attire, that presented "Wall what then?" himself to me, and offered me three things, to wit, a lot of money, honor and glory if I would leave the r gion regionand not say anythint to any one-Now the truth is , was very weary and sleepy, I am also very poor having lost all in the flood, and that perhaps the man who ever he was knew. Well I repulsed him once or twice, but he put by my repulses and continued to beset me. Then I began to be angry, but he did not make nothing of that at all, but made offers again and said if , would abide by his wishes, he would make me a rich man. "For" said he" I am famous the world over, and I have lots of money to give way. "

hen I asked him his name, but he refused to tell me, and therefore this set me further from him, but he still followed me with enticements. Then I betook me as you observed to my knees, and with hands lited up, prayed to our plessed Lord for help. Just as you came up this strange gentleman went his way. Then I gave thanks to Him for my deliverance, for I verily believed he intended no good at all, but rather sought to stop me in my own work. You see sir I am a guide in these parts, and show people around the disaster zone,

"Without doubts his designs were bad" said Angeline Riches herself. "But now you talk of him, I believe I have one either seen him, or have read something of him."

"P erhaps you have done both" said Mike.

"Starring said. "So the fellow would not tell you his name. Was he tall, comely, and something of a swarthy complexion .. / ?"

"You have hit it right sir, he is just as you say."

"Did he not speak very smoothly, and always give a smile at the end of a

"you guessed it right again, for these were his very actions."

"Did he have very much money in his pocket, and was not his hand very often fingering her money, as if it was his heart s delight."

"Yes. Had he stood by all this while, cou you could not have more amply have set him forth before me, nor have better described his features .. "

"This men said Starring is" is a dangerous spy of some sort, and it is by virtue of his efforts, that this ground is watched by Clandelinian hordes, and who ever does follow his advice, might as well lay his head down on a block to have it cho chopped of, and he is sure one of the sworn enemies of ar our lessed Lord. This is he that maintains in their splendor all those that do all they can to frustrate the Christian cause. He is a great gi gossiper, he is always both he and his followers, at one persons heels or another, now commending, and promishing riches to those who will give in to his desires. He is a bold and impudent agent of the onemy, and he will talk with any one he knows is coming for on an investigatioj o on of this place. He highly commends the Glandalinian cause, and if there be one cunning enough to get information from the christians for him, he will speak well of him from camp to camp. He hasegiven it out in some places that he is a professional Glandelinian agent, and therefore many Glandelinian generals have great confident in him. He has his times for open places of cheating for the sake of his cause, and he will say and try to prove it, that none can show as much tarlent as he can le promishes to help the Menleys out in everything possible, and he will ca cast at of his purse gold like dust to those who help him gain the information he desires to learn. A person like nim is dengerous."

"Oh what a mercy it is that , did resist him" said wike, "For what might he have done to me?"

"What he might do" said starring, " no one but God knows. But to be sure he would have caused to to give up your useful life to the benefit of the enemys cause. Was this man who set germania vivian against his gather amperor Vivian, and the Manleys to take the main lead orb of the landelinian armies. It was he who persauded the garrisons of Vivian Wickey before the war broke out to take possession of the fortifications and turn traitor, and prevailed with them to forsake the Christian life, and become enemies of the Abbicannian cause. He is dangerous. If I could spot him I'd bring him down right good too. wherefor my good man, you have done right in repelling him."

After this they came a little into a better section of country, and here because they were more weary than before, they were comep compelled to rest themselves. This locality he had once been a perfect paradize before the disaster had occured. Orchards and vineyards had existed here in numerous stretches, bells of beautiful churches had rang, and all sounds of melodious kinds had frequently sounded, and nce all now all was desolation. As there was no telling what might happen no one of the parties dared to sleep without grong g strong guards being placed. The

The guards would walk to and fro, but how sometimes their ears were filled with startling and rotten noises. And horrid visons visions. In this land they heard nothing,, felt nothing, smelled nothing, that tasted to their sa satisfaction, and when attempting to drink some of the more placid parts of remaining flood waters, it tasted it quite bitter. Starring had kept a record of the places the Rangers desired him to visit and investigate, so that he could also if pssible start a history of this greatest of all disasters ever known in story writing.

It was here also much discoursed, how the flood waters had to some, had had its violent courses, and how long it had taken for it to go off. Beautiful once this part of the country had been, and the children of the towns towns and villiages used to go into the fields and woods and gather nose gays and all manner of flowers for each other, friends and for alters,, and bring to each other much love and arfection. Here also had grown plants that campohr is made from, besides spikenard saffron, cala mus, and cinnamon, and with all kinds of beautiful plants and trees and the like ... with these many houses had been perfumed, and now what could be seen, desolation, and nothing else...

Now while they remained here for rest, there came riding up from the other direction on a horse a messenger wi h matter of great importance to one of the Chief mangers. Inquiry was made for him, and when he was located the messengers presented him with a m letter of which no one but he could read. When the Ranger had read the letter, the messenger gave him a sure token, that he was a true messenger and not a disguised foe, and who had come to advise him in his way of guiding Starring and his followers tyrough through the danger zone while the investigation of the flooded regions was under way. The token was a star, and a letter from the Vivian Girls themselves. when he realized this was true the Ranger called for thethree the the four child scouts, and told them how matters were ... The Girls themselves told him they were heartily glad of the news, and could have been glad had the messenger came for them. Then he asked them to give him advice, of how all things should be prepared for hi chis effort so he too could conduct the party,, through the danger zonec without mishap. So Angeline pichees said,;

"You must do as be too bid you as we know all the country from coast to coast, and no boasting either. Then she called ctarring, and the officers of the expedition about her, to give the whole tribe their blessig, and told them that she recieved with comfort the news that they were soon to go through the first main m part of the advanture. Then she said to starring;

"Sir you have in all places, showed yourself true hearted, therefore now when we go shead, be faithful in your course unto death even if need be, and we will probably discover some clue whether it was an eruption that did this, or whether the enemy was responsible. I would also entreat you, to have an eye and ear for everything you see and hear,, and if anybtime to see something unusual keep track of it and we will help you we will we must have a fair day when we set out from this section, and that we must keep our eyes open so the enemy won't surprise us in ambush among ruins. We now long to accomplish the mission, yet however the weather is we can accomplish it if we try."

Our travels have been with some difficulty, but that will make our success all the sweeter. But let us all watch and be ready, for at any hour or minute when we think not the enemy might surprise us. We can also be thankful for our present deliverance from the forest fires, our successful engagements with parties of the enemy, and that we have reached so far in safty. But yet we must be watchful, and hope for our success in the end. We cwere so tar delivered from our worse t enemy the forest fires, therefore we can hope for the best. We can all be thankful that we were delivered from the fatal perils met in these now dangerous forests, that we at least might live long enough to the adventure through, or even the full end of the big war, and see it come out as victorours for the christian cause aswe hope it will be. Only I advise others to repent of their actness to fear and doubt of the outcome of our adventure before we came to its ending, lest those who do shall be forced to a stand before our generals and ...iolet . and her sisters for that fault with blushing and shame, and facing the names of those on the disgrace discharge list, or the firing squads ... """

Then she called for Penrod himself and Radcliffe also, and told them as follows; "We have recieved the message to push our adventure through, at this point, and then go no where else but where we can seek the information. If we succeed all will be well." The roadway here was lined up with all the troops and men under starring, ready to march on for La Polama the first destination for the investigation, for they must hear the stories from Survivors as directed and write them down before going to view what i : is left of abbicann. The banks of the river also were full of horses and men also as most of the rangers are all mounted always. Angeline Riches the guide came forth and entered the river first, beco c beckening to those on horseback to follow first, and the others were to follow next as they all of course had to swim across.

Most of the otherws were thrilled with excitement over this new part of the great undertaking, and those assigned to do so formed to their respective places like all soldiers do.

Inn In process of time those all on horseback got across, but found the water much deeper than at first expected. Therefore a messenger was sent across, who said to the leader of the Rangers;

"I have been sent to you by Angeline Richee, to tell you that many of your men whil will have to take some of the others on your horses and make repeated trips as the stream is too doep, and the current too strong for swimming. Wherefore lets start so all can get across in no time."

At this the Runger called to all his followers and said;

"We will have to take the rest on our horses too and go over with them several times untiil all are over."

So he desired all the officers of the unmounted men to go forward on their horses first, and they addressed themselves for the journey. When the Ranger came to the brink of the river he said:

"Now every one of you be careful and do not slip off." nd they all started across." One of those who were still waiting said;

"Since we have nothing else to do but wait, to what purpose will this end I wonder. As for this territory, that we will soon be into into the dangerous part, therefore we must all look well to ourselives, and keep our eyes and ears peeled. You know what we all have been in the forests, and how troublesome we have behaved ourselves to every party of the enemy who appeared . My hope is that our efforts will be more than successful from the very day we enter La Polama, for I know that we will interview survivors there if they know enything about of the explosions. For to be plain with you all, there are many who went to La Polama from the explosion region after the flood horrors had passed, the which we can intertain, when we first enter the town, and could learn much which General ctarring wishes v very much to find out before he goes to Abbieann as he so far believes all descriptions of the explosions have been immeasureably exaggerand. And we can walk about and seek intertainment of the surv wrs survivors of that town but for our sakes, and their own, do not any one of you bungle up the game, and be careful we do not converse with secret enemies. """"

When the time came for them to depart, they went to the brink of the river. Whice they were riding across the leader who led said;

"We are all commanded to be ready for any emergency on the other side as Angeline Richee suggested to general starring, for there is something suspicious at one place. As for what it is she yet does not know, but we might nevertheless meetwith some difficulty .We must all lookto the good loading of ail our weapons. for it may be a force of the enemy is forming to reppe repell us... Although it was my luck to be much in your good company, yet since the time being all have been very profitable to me. We must all prepare for a summons, we must prepare for any change on the other side, for Starring is not willing that we should be surprised by the enemy. You need not need not doubt the tr & truth of my message, for you'll see plain enough when we are across. I supposse suppose most of us when we came from home left behind wives and children Mothers and fathers, and sons and daughters, or brothers and sisters, so let me entroat you for I know that we must all go through it now in hopes that you and T may yet be a conductor for other soldiers and adventuerers if we survive, and when we have a chance We cansend to our families, and let them be all acquainted with all that hath and shall happen to us rell them also of our art arival to the disaster zone, and of the present condition the places still are in. Tell them also of general starring, and and child scout guides and how they did a lot for all of us. Tell them also of what a happy end we are expecting, and tward where we are going. We have nothing so far to send to our familes families, ex except it pe prayers and tears for the "

"Another said," no doubt this ficod has been a terror to many, yea the thought of of it have often frightened meanut now since we see it has gone to a good extent to or at last t on this location we need no fear. I see myself and others near to the best goal of this adventure, and toilsome days to come."

A third man said;

"I hope to see in Lapolma my own father and mother for I observed in the papers they must have survive survived as their names were not in either the death or missing list. I have formerly lived in Pandora before the catastrophe, but now we have lived in La Polama, and when we get there I hope I shall be with them for a short time, and maybe they too can tell us a lot of things for the countrys good. My little sister too was there. I loved to hear the pieces she just used to speak, and wherever I had seen the print of her shoes, there I knew she had played. Her name has been as sweet as a civet box, yea sweeter than all perfumes. Her voice has been most sweet, and her con countenance I have desired more than others. And my mother has held me and I long to see them all again. He did as we will know also do a lot for me, that is my father."

Now while he was thus in discource, they all were across the stream, and it was glorous to see the open region filled with horses and men led by two beautiful girl scout children. As for the impending attack, itdid not come after all, for it was apparent that the foe might have been too small in numbers or, that the imposing size of the party scured the enemy so he changed his mind.

The appailing war catastrophe which visited the whole middle and southern parts of Calverinia down on from the city of Abbieann and the explosion area and elsewhere throughout the whole of engall county and tate, resulting in the destruction of as many towns and cities as might be in the whole whited tates, and outh America combined, and nearly fifteen million lives, and rendering more than 256,000,000 homeless, was for the first part brought to view of its aftermath when starring reached within sight of his first goal of La Polama city where nearly fifty thousand lives or more had been lost. The city respectfully was still in its appearance after the disaster, the inhabatnats haveing no means to rebuild, and the heart of every one of the av adventurers shuddered at every section of this calamity which resule resulted in the sudden deaths of so many unknown numbers of people first, by blast and concussion and then by an ir estible irrestible flood that left even its effects untill now.

The first part of the party onnthe afternoon of August the Fifteenth went near the suburbs of the city. Here one citizen on being questioned estimated the loss of life at fourty thousand including the Mayor of the city, the general commanding the city garrison, and two hundred and fifty soldiers who were armed before the disaster to pacify the panic stricken people during the outrageous floo , and prevent Locting after the disasters. Here the adventuerers saw huge trees that had been torn up by their roots and laid flat by the force of the waters, not one being left standing, and other indications showed the sea of flood waters had passed about the city at extreme tidal wave velocity. Here and many other places gtarring was to views the scenes following after the deadly explosions and flood horrors, to hear stories of the frantic efforts of the people to escape the death horror, the present appearance of the ruined cities not entirely swept away, and a full description of what they see of the great wreck jam at Mildred greenburg and Big Girl Knool.

Starring found many in La Polama city who knew all about the scenes of Abbieannm and one of these was the new Mayor of the city, whom gtarring interviewed and while they conversed Angeline Riches wrote down all that was said by the Mayor, while

Jennie wrote down Starrings words. The Mayor said thus;

"So far as can be known general, no one is believed to have been saved of all those who were at Abbieann when the explosions and floods occurred at least of the population. The commanders of armies sent to investigate as soon as the force of the flood had gone down reported by one colock on the eighteenth of june, that the entire country side was wrapped in flames raging in its forests. They endeavored to save persons fleeing from towns, more or less burned. His officers went ashore in small boats, seeking for refugees, but were unable to penetrate the region so int n intense was the heat. when approaching the north side of Abbiemn they saw heaps of charred bodies upon the river wharves, therefore it is believed that not a single person in the town at the time escaped both explosion and flood .. "

"That still seems to be exaggerated" said Starring. "But how about the shipping in the city's river harbors. Did any escape.?"

"Maybe the only vessel to escape from the danger zone sir was a foriegn steamer which arived at gacramento, Abbicannia six days after. She got out of the river harvor harbor by slipping her cables by the time of the explosions but lost all ty the crew. Her captian and two mates were seriously injured, and was placed in the hospil hospital at Sactamento. All of his own officers, and engineers and a great number or of passengers wwere dead or dying. All of the orew is dead. Many jumped overboard and were lost. Of the many other hundreds of vessels which were destroyed in the harbor and river near by all are said to be Abbieannians and Calverinians. The Pandora Steamship Companys Steumer called the Salso was among those destroyed also. Even some of the survivors claim it was a mile off from the biggest of the explosions. Others told me she was wrecked by a most terrible and strange upheavel of land and river caused by the concuccion of the explosions. All of ner crew, and two hundred passengers were lost. Most of her passengers were among the persons en route from Francis Atlanta, to Pandora...

The Mayors wife then a said; "I was on the Calverinian schooner called the Mic-Hollester Run Traveler, which arived at Meldorn at three cclock in the afternoon of June the 2th. We had been compelled to floe from the vinicity of the flood by taking other streams going westward, in consequ n consequence of a heavy sea of waters swarming all over the land. The ship I rode tried to reach Calverine, but the effects of the calamity prevented from from her from doing so. I had seen or heard some of the explosion too. The steamer had arived opposite of Abbieum on the early night of May the 3Ith. While about ten miles off from the city, we thought from the noise a number of volcances had blown themselves to pieces, and rushing to the decks we ream a rain of flery something sweeping down upon the whole town of AdeleHeid destroying the city and shipping there, including the big dredges, and also observed where Abbiecan should be was a heavy dense cloud which obscured everything from view. There was a flash there too, and afterwards we were hidding from each other on deck by a thick fog of smoke and strang strange dust that was falling upon us. We desired to have the captian go up there and see what happened, when after a pause again came such awful eruptions, and an immense mass of what looked like fire enveloped southern Appleann and a part of Adeleheid. This repeated for fifteen minutes and the noise and shock was territic. we are not know what had really occurred but we feared the entire population of either city had perished. We brought back some of the survivors from Adoleichd Adoleheid city. All the shipping in that harbor about a hundred craft of all kinds has been destroyed by a rain of debris and fire. The flood of horror continued.

Fearing of a dire consequence the captian ordered the ship to return to Pandora with all the speed possible, and to forward details of the disaster to the first post we could arive at. It was feared that the population of both si cities had perished and when alater we found it at least happened at Abbieann you cannot imagine our feelings. We had tried to reach Abbieann but could not as a sudden torrent barred our way and fortunately we were not caught in it."

"There is one thing that surprised me" said Starring."I recieved at six oclock on theafternoon of the fourth day of June, two telegram messages from the straight west from the Secretary general of the Government headquarters of Bengall State, George H. Turpo, sont respectfully, at 10 A.M., and II,30 P.M. The earlier c telegram reported that there had been some astonishing " ERUPTIONS" between Adelsheied and Abbieann, but it was added in view of reports that the eruption of a whole country side had wiped out the whole of Abbieann, all shipping available for the river cruises, and started a flood which cut off all means to giving aid to ay number of refugees, which if needed could have been dispatched to assist the surviving inhabitants of those places if there were any. I really showed the letter to the Vivian Girl Princesses, laughing and telling them that some man out of hi his head had sent it to me. Yet however the second dispatch confirmed the reports of the destruction of abbien Abbieannn, and all the country all about and far beyond, and thousands of river shipping, by a rain of fire and "lava" and said it was supposed that the whole population of Abbisann had been annihilated, with the exception of those of the city which had been away elsewhere at the time and who returned to find their city under a flood .. "

"Why did you ridicule these dispatches. ?"

"Simply because at first I did not believe them. But the two came from different persons. One came from a party I never knew. The other confirmed itto me because I knew the hand writing and w could not thendoubt it. It came from Gertrude Angeline. She wrote that a crazed storm of fire, smoke, debris, and fire enveloped the north part of the city, and a concussion lasting fifteen minutes with a series of crasy shakes like an earthquake overthrow a good part of the city killing all who in their beds at the time. She said she could never figure the death list but only those who escaped with their lives were not in the city at the time. She said all the vessels within the city on the rivers were broken up or burned and sunk with all on board, mostly all Calverinian ships, . The Mayor of the city andthe Governer of Abyssinkile gtate were reported among the victims. I therefore thought it strange because she would not write anything like that just to start any excitement. She explained her experience there with her girl and boy scout friends and how they escaped the great flood. It was a fact that the Abyssij Abyysinkilian Governor lost his life. He was born in Abyssinkile, and was appointed from Abbieannian Governmental Aurthorities to be Governer of Abyesinkile. He went to Abbieann to visit some relatives there, his father and mother no doubt. Other dispatches recieved by general Vivian gave the details of the Abbieann disaster and said that many hundreds of thousands were killed, but there had been no time for even a panic. The explosions began at two minutes after Twelve. At first all the wild reports were that there were earthquakes and volcanic eruptions from the ground, and that Abbieann had been swallowed into the bowels of the earth. What made somany believe that is because the whole country around Abbieann had been enveloped in a strange fog. Investigations are or had been trying to prove that the eruptions were too scattered to be of a volcanic eruption even f of such force lasting fifteen minutes. Itnat That is why violet and her sisters want me to investigate and also go within Manleys lines to find out who and what caused the disaster. At the time in the island of Plato a volcano was active and that led to the conviction that the catastrophe was caused by a volcanic disturbance. I know that as soon as the disaster has known our Covernments as far as possible immediately took measures for the relief of the sufferers from the disaster of Bengall State. River cruisers and strong boats were ordered to proceed to the region without delay, to investigate and report upon the situation and extend aid to the survivors. These boats since then were never heard from."

"That was the strangest part of the situation" said the Mayor. "The action of our Covernment was endorsed and supplemented by the Emperor himself, who passed immediately a bill giving for aid of the distressed mabitants of Calverinia more than nine hundred million dollars. This Bill went through the Main Tribunal with the same impressive promptness as had been in other catastrophes. Even the first day of the news they say was an anxious day for Emperor Vivian. He was herrified by the disaster, but every thing was so cut off that no one could furnish him with any information and the flood itself swept evon Angelinia Agathia. Count De Biff suggested that he be permitted to proceed as far as Heidi Junction, and this permission was granted. The Count could not go as far as Big Girl Knool because of the wild nature of the flood. He sailed on on a ship which was carrying supplies to the stricken.

B"But there was some hopecelsewhere." said Starring. "The Tribunal at Dorothy Gale had been notified on June 3th in the late evening that just then the situation at Lucillie Ricksen City was more orderly, and that the Official there called upon the relief station at at La Polama with the purpose to suggest that ships there we losaed i with provisions be sent to the place, and thatbthe river tugs and other boats could also proceed to Big Girl Knool. The Official got this message,

"Communication with La Polama broken. City believed wiped out as is surrounded by a torrent of water. Render such assistance for La Polama as possible. Use your decretion and report t by Cable when practibable as all communication is destroyed on land. Newspaper correspond ints can come if you are willing." And yet no aid could be sent." "Our Country" said the Mayor " in all our disasters led in the caring for the stricken in Calverinia, "Even in time of need elsewhere Calverinia herself and all her people never have under any conditions failed yet to be moved by the cry of distress, which had come up from other lands and our own. So we did all we could to extend our sympathy and aid for our unfortunate States, and tried to send abundant stores, of means necessary to succor those upon whom the enemy had so suddenly hurled a sudden and most overwhelming calamity. Yet little could be done as the flood barred all means of sending provisions and rescue as fast as desired.

Even Emperor Vivian thought the reports of the disaster might have been exaggerated. But the fact of so much communication being destroyed with Angelinia Agathia and all parts of the country began to make him believe the disaster was far more immeasureable than the worst of reports could confirm."

"But it seemed unusual" said Starring "That the supplies could not reach the region by boat. They could have been dispatched to the distressed people by boats, even if the distance to the destination prevented the supplies comingvery soon."

"But no boar boat or ship could live out the flood, the only passage way then." said the Mayor."I Learned that from dozens of neighboring cities nearest the flood zone, all craft were prepared to be rushed to the relief of the stricken region, and to even sucor the survivors of the stricken cities and towns, if any were left to tell the tale. The city of Cuningdan was only twelve miles away from the flood, and the ships were hurried to La P lama, and should have reached there within an hour from their departure. Even from the cities of Guadeloupe junction, St Lucia, St Vincent De Paul, and St Thomas and Peter, relief expeditions were sent, and none of these were heard from untill four weeks they returned with no success in their trip and badly battered and wrecked."

"Since I was in the army I had heard lots about the great disastor " said Starring. "Speculation had been very anxious as to the fate of neighboring cities and towns. There were hundreds of villiages and towns with a total population of over 12,000,000 within the circle of explosion destruction. Many of these were much nearer to the supposed eruptions than was Abbieann or Adeleheid. The city of San Salvador, a place of about 100,000 people was closest to the biggest explosion. Lying elsewhere, directly to the north of Abbieann, were many others, including the city of San Pellic, Perfecto Junction, and claim. Gertainly all c who could have must have fled before the flood broke loos. Loose. The whole country of Calverinia is thickly populated as wel all we all know, and the south is filled with people. All these then not su seperated from the north bythe by the war drama got their provisions mainly and only from Abbieann and Adeleheid, and with the destruction of these big cities, there sure must have been serious trouble if not famine, among the people. We cannot tell what is going on now as little communication as yet has been restored. Abbisann was the chief commercial town of the whole of Abbieann in Abbieannia in general, not only of the Calverinia State but of all our Abbieannian States and Provinces and big sea islands along the coast and elsewhere. Therefore our country or State was indeed paralyzed.

"inhen I lived at Abbieann" said the Mayor, " even though other great disasters occured elsewhere, no one ever thought of having the least fear of a great disaster in thosecparts, those parts. During the eight months of the war I was there there was never the slightest sign of a coming disaster, or any other indication that the enemy was ever around. There had been early in the war a battle there of course, but no one worried as long as it turned a christian vit victory."

We could see a terrible rage of the forest fire to our left, and though it was fully twenty miles away, it looked looked so big in the smoke clouds as to be only a mile, and could see the flames issueing from the clouds or through the clouds with t rrific stretches. The whole country side through which we were running was dark, and clouds of smoke heavy as thunderclouds had been over our heads for all the time we were on the train and in Abbieann before the disaster. The Smell of burning trees was so strong that horses in the streets of towns stopped and snorted, and many of the people were obliged to wear wet handker i handkerchiefs over their faces to protect them from the strong fumes of the smoke. I wonder if the forest fires struck something and started off those ernormous explosions, or did the enemy take advantage of the conflagration and lay off hud mines in its path. ????

"That is hard to say" said the Mayor, but it is "but it is likely. But as I learned afterwards horror over the calamity had been the controlling feeling of the whole nation, and also came the sense of sympathy for residents here, whose hearts were breaking under the strain of waiting for d finite news of loved ones in the stricken region. Indeed as we all know the magnitude of the catastrophe in Bengall State, State not counting the flood was such as to appall everybody. It came with the suddeness of a thunderclap ff from a clear sky. The reading world itself did not know that such a thing could have occured, and believed that after showing signs of action a volcano of mighty force had devastated the landscape, not knowing that secretly in that neighborhood the enemy had been showing signs of action. Even when the first news of the disaster was broadcasted by telegram and courier there was an immediate thought among all the people who first b heard of the horror of giving forth relief and succorr to the surviving victims of the calamity, but when they heard also that most of all the towns inthe explosion and flood area could not be communicated with or were wiped out with all their population then the whole nation was afraid. This caused immediate measures to be taken. Did did out novernment in other states act prop p promptly, but strong Committees, were formed in every part of the Abbiemnnian country, for the purpose of collecting money and supplies, and also sent investigators to learn the through nature of the disaster, so that it can be found out if the news were not exaggerated or not ... Knowing the places around Abbieannia as I do, I myself had little doubts that the disaster could be worse than described, but it was, and my anxiety for the fate of my parents and other relations and wife and children who we were in that city was great as they had been in Abbieann. It was fortunate , found them here, having come a month before the disaster. There had been several eruptive explosions and awful floods elsewhere throughout Calverinia as we all know, but who could ever had expected such a a terrible catastrophe as that which occured during June, besides many otys others elsewhere elsewhere the same month..It has been seen by now from many investigations that none of the reports could have been exaggerated. The real horror never will be told. Undoubted ly when the christians have been so victorious up here and some where else, the people of these towns and cities, though there would be no disaster, and therefore when the fatal explosions came, and the floods also all were caught asleep in their homes, victims of the false security, engendered by previous reports of great christian victories here and therd.. there. My sister who lived in grancis Atlanta at the time was terribly prostrated over the news of the terrible disaster, as her parents, and mine too had resided had resided in Abbieann. On learning of the supposed volcanic eruption from the ground and of the population of the city being wiped out by the disuster, she swooned and was in a serious condition for ays adays . My parents and others all were believed to have been killed. I too was greatly worried and my wife also. It was three weeks before we learned they were not at Abbieunn being away at tye the time, and lived, but it was a long time before my sister recovered from the first shock.

I also had a friend in Adeleheid, whose whose bridge of less than three years was als also completely prostrated and in addition was in a delicate condition. With her were her mother father, and two daughters each one and two years of ago, her parents vainly trying to cheer her with what were feared to be false hopes. They feared also she would not survive her coming ordeal h if reports were brought that her husband was dead. Her husba Her husband, who had been in the gtae four years, was an tive of worthern Abbieannia where his father, a wealthy man still lives. In Abbieunn he met his wife, and about three years before the disaster he married her. They settled in a flat, and later he was called for by the covernment to be interviewed about the war, he being a count. The poor wife sat surro nd surrounded by friends, and every time the door bell rang she started. Of course she was not permitted to answer the summons, but anxiously asked if there was any news. Fortunately for this poor woman her husband was being interviewed over some important matter with Emperor Vivian at the time of the disaster, and hearing of it, and fearing his wifes grief over his supposed death, hastened to her, but because of conditions was not able to reach her in grancis Atlanta untill a week after the flood and found her in a prostrated condition. Many others of course did not fare

Some time later gtarring and his followers roumed about the town and taking in some of the sights, reviewing some of the still remaining remaining rules, and points where the floods had swept. After thus rouming around for a full day Angeline Richee herself came upon a caption of a ship, and she after showing him her identification asked him if he had had any experience of the flood and other disasters near Abbisann, and its vinicity.....

"I saw nothing much of much of the flood, and thank god for that!" gaid the captian. But I had an experience which I'll nover forgot all my life. puring the afternoon of the last day of May I was directing my steamer the BeeBee which had left Pandora the midnight before for Abbicann with a large number of passengers. I reached the Pover Docks by the River some distance northeast of the city of Abbiann Abbienn, and I was giving orders to the First Mate, when we heard a terrible thunder noise that threw us flat on our faces from the shock, and an ernormous cloud of smoke and dust and glowing debris rushed upward and forward with terrific velocity over the city and river docks completely enveloping in an instant the whole scene before us in a sheet of flame and clouds and raiti raining debris and flaming objects on board the ship. My second mate who had been on shore had jet tim just time to climb on board whon his boat disappeared. Many of my s crew even in their bunks in the forecastle were mysteriously scorched to death. owever my little girl, by most superhuman efforts, having steam still up full strength the anchor was drawn suddenly, and the steamer backed away from the shore,, and nine hours later managed to reach Pandora, my ship beyond recognition, covered with mud, dust, wreck age of ground and trees, and her rigging dismantled, and the awnings hanging abouid, torn and charred and two smokestacks gone. Twen'y five of the Beebees crew were lying dead when we got into pandora, all of them contoreted contorted, and entirely burned out of human semblance, among the broken black cinders of r burned wreckage which covered the ships decks to nearly threece three feet. After we reached Pendors three more of the crew died. I will have to say that the surviving crew were loud in their praises of the heroic conduct of our First Mate, who steered his vessel out of the danger with his own hands, which were burned badly by the rain of fire, which kept falling on the ship for miles after she got under way as other terrific eruptions or blasts continued one after another. Beyond burns all of his body, the Mate was safe, as also was the first Mate, though he is awfully scorched.""

As Starring himself learned afterwards, in La Polama itself during the flood all the the shipping was utterly destroyed, being swept away or standed on ground not deep enough for the vessels to float. Also at Abbiean all the shipping was destroyed by the explosions, and after the crash, the Abbieunnian war cruiser, reported standing off off shore fifteen miles down the river, sounding her whistles and sending up sky rockets. The whole country side was blazing for scores of miles according to the report from the crew, and also the whole county seemed to be blown up in the air by eruptions of a strange and most terrible kind. During a lull in the uproar the war ship sent a few boats ashore but they could not land on account of the terrific terrific heat, the strunge hackward flow of the river, and by other disasters accompanied by loud ear splitting explosions. Not a living soul appeared ashore, after the boats had waited for two hours, even when the river seemed to turned ointo a lake. During one of the eruptions fire and debris fell over this steamer also

The first mate of the Steamer Rose Marie, also in Abbidann at the time of the disaster, which was lost in the h River Harbor at Abbieann in the south,, thus described the disaster to Starring;

"Between Twelve, and rifteen after twelve oclock, at midnight rather, with June Ith just beginning to arive, there came without the slightest warning a noise as if the whole State itself was going to fly up to the stars, and a dreadful cloud of smoke and flame came upon us in whirlwind fashion, suddenly also sweeping dlw down upon the north part of the city, and before the concussion the highest houses fell to ruin the convulsion being like an earthquake. The crushes came again, each uproar increasing in noise and force, and within my sight in the harbor with mine were ahoored about a hundred and fif teen vessels. Because of the concussion and force of the eruntions all of the vessels except the one was on turned over on their sides or bursted into flame. Other boats sank instantly and at the same moment, and there seemed to be a commotion in the river, and the sky itself appeared as if on fire. Every house during those fifteen minutes were utterly hisheken down. I sent an officer ashorecafter to the uproar had ceased and he only found a few buildings standing, and streets literally filled with corps and corpses and the city in the lower section seemed to have sunk down into the river, and a flood was beginning......

"Starring then said; "My first throught when T read of the destruction of Abbieann, and the whole country around by explosion, and the awful flood and other conglomeration of disasters occurring was that it was simply the history of other former disasters repeate d but on a hundred fold greater scale. We should have known that if it is the Glandelinians who can be suspacted that we should have been prepared, for the morals of the population of wicked Clandelinian generals and their followers are so bad, that they make the worse of fiends and lost soulse souls compare to innocent children to them. Good sensitive and human generals were the exception among the clandelinians. Such few could be known as Leonia Meldonia Fig. Fignell, Izner Mylstze, and others. No one could to save his life picture the vice, cruelty and immerality of the Glandelinians vividly enough. They have to be fully known to be understood. Therefore they are bad enough to cause any such disaster like this. In Abbicant and othercities and towns, the people were simply like rats in a trup when asleep, and had to way to turn, he ever thought of believing the disasters to be cruptions proceeding from the surface of the ground over such an extent. Thu birnest crater caused by the explosion as I have been told lays about fourty two miles to the north and west of Adeleheid. And could be reached after hard work. It was very steep with precipitous sides and rough rocks and sarth and debris. The smallest crater is said to be about two hundred varie in diameter, and eighty feet deep or more. At each crater is found a lake, probably the holes having been either filled up by the floods, or the water had cozed up ff from below. All kinds of investigations were made of these craters but no one over succeeded in finding proofs that they were formed by sruptions from under the ground an declared in the first reports. While I was in my younger days in Abbieann I secured a pleasant little place on top of a high fertile hill covered with flowers and woods behind the city, where it was cooler in summer, and colder in winter. The city in samer was excessively hot, there being little breeze in that section of the country, and any breezes from the sust was cut off entirely by the mountains mountains in that direction.

The inhabitants of Abbieann were very or unusually righteous,, charitable, loving respectable, and excitable. I remember that during my stay, the two big disaster further south occured. The explosion at Lake Selicia shook Abbieann, and everything shook and rattled, and the people ran out into the streets and began praying and cryig crying. The women acreamed and fan fainted, the children cried, and altogether excitement prevailed supremo. Then they recovered and learned of the disasters southward they all pitched in ro to give what the could and to aid in every way possible. I cite this to give an idea of what must have occured when the disaster overtook the city and destroyed it and all the people within without a moments warning. It is believed if the catastrophe had occured during the day time the loss of life would not have been so severe. .

Another man a said when interviewed by Starring;

"The whole country country side as we first believed sir, had been in a state of the most violent "eruption " on all record for fifteen minutes. The midnight hour came upon us in the town of El Verso with what we thought heavy thunder following the worse of lightning flashes, which for fifteen minutes chans changed into a continuous most tremendous roar, followed and concluded by four horrible bangs that sounded to me as if the mountains of Calverinia and the country in general was being blown to the the sun-I rose from my bed, and went outside to see what was wrong as terrific con cussions followed and the house had ewayed and my windows went out. I saw vast clouds of smoke r se over the northern horizon, becoming denser and denser, and even at our town stones and debris of earth fell, and even pon all the near by estates, destroying a vast ammount of property. The ground shock violently at ten minutes after twelve, but still more violently after the four main crashes. Twenty four hours later our city was enveloped in a mighty flood and we sure lif lived long days and nights of terror and suffering. The storm of noise roused about Abbieann they say all those fifteen minutes without intermission but after fifteen minutes it became intermittent and fainter. As I heard a report from Mildred Greenburg, and also from St Marie sayy says that even on the early and late morning of June First the sky was heavily overcast, the heat was excessive, and that during the night there was a distant sound of loud rolling thunder, with the last booms very loud. The flood came there too. The Mayor of Francis Atlanta still further away, declared of hearing at midnight and later loud reports resembling the firing of ernormous cannons. All morning there was darkness and the smell of powder, accompanied by a strong downpour of fine dust which continued for several minutes. The people of Francis Atlanta wondered what had occured."

Although Calverinia is an earthly paradize it had been since the war began as well as parts of Angelinia and other states saij subjected to the wildest convulsions of the awful war. The first of the Christian armics moving in to drive the fee from the land were told of the florce plandelinion armies which would descend upon them at unexpected times and the christian argies soon learned that their strongest numbers was indes or indispensable against the Glandelinian hordes. But disasters they never expected. The great hurricane of fire which earlier in the war destroyed Irientown and other places, struck places further north, and was at first believed to have caused the ernormous explosions by striking ernormous munition plants in the vinicity of Abbaeann-It was the first forest fire that Starring ever observed and it made an impross lon on his mind. He did a rescue act fit for the Movies too for he enatched a little fugitive gi 1 gil girl frm from a creek into which she thought she could seek refuge and rode away on horseback with her, just as the full fury of the storm burst upon them and their only refuge was in a large opening in the side of a low hill, where other refugees had sought shelter. Scarcely had Sturring entered with the terrified child than the hurricane of wind, and searing flames was upon them in all its fury .

The whole forest writhed, and bent beneath the screaming typhoon, the trees were quickly stripped of their branches or forcibly worooted, and hurled through the air or to the ground. The flames finally came p like a wave following the tempest, the hill was surrounded in a " world afire", and the air within became hot to suffocation and smoke invaded, means and cries arosed from the terrified refugees, but the little, girl rescue rescued by Starring uttered not a word. Close clasping him around his necks with her little arms, she lay quiet and caml calm. The hours passed slowly, and soon it was quiet without, but all vas smoke and still leaping flames. The darkness that accompanied the advance of the fire storm, caused by the dense clouds of smoke, had been despelled by the fires main passage, but the air was still smokey and very hot. The wind had died away to a moan, exhausted nature in all her forests within view lay prostrate, burning and smouldering like a volcanic furnace.

Not a single tree was left standing, huge pines, cedars, firs and hemlocks and spruce had been burned to the ground and a dosolation of smouldering ruins of the forest was before their view .. They had to remain in the cave for two days untill everything cooled down.

The most mournful spectacle was the small town on the edge of the forest just about singed by the fire, for in place of beautiful and stately buildings, were mant many smouldering ruine. The houses of the refugees, were almost entirely destroyed, and soon hundreds of despairing beings were grouping in their smoking ruins. But the crowning desolution of all as Starring said was the total destruction of the towns only church. Only a brick factory, a six story affair and two blocks long remained standing of all the buildings of the town . To this structure the homeless families had to direct their steps. Its walls were of stone, some three week in thickness, irs its flooring heavy, the doorways were broad with granite lintels. The beams supporting the floor were sound and strong and the floors themselves intact, and there the refuges took up their abode. The people never rebuilt the unfortunate town, and thus fate or fortune willed that the refugees should know no other place of residence untill the war storm should spent itself. Starring however doubted the forest fire set off such explosions, even though as stated where the floods did not touch the forest fires were infernal regions of Calverinia. When Starring was intorviewed by the Mayor of La Polama again, the Mayor said;

"I am very thankful sir for the profound sympathy you have showed us because of the appalling calamity which has come upon our state, and which has cost the lives of as nearly as many persons as all the battles of both sides combined so far have done. You have by your visit and the purpose of your visit broughtbme consolation in the name of the Calverinian people to c show your pity for us in the awful catastrophe and we all will join in thanks. Your investigations shows your sympathy, and may the Almighty and His Plessed Mother and all the Saints in Heaven not only comfort the hearts of those who still weep for their most irreparable vlosses but aid you and your followers to find out first the real nature, of the disaster, and then if possible whether clandelini: was responsible or not. I beg you therefore general to accept my warm thanks, and also the gratifude of all the surviving victims, whom you propose to aid in this way. If you wish to reach Abbieann on your way from here,, I have recieved announcement from the Commerical Landunderground cable company that slight river commo communication with Abbieann, is open, via, La Polama, and Francis Atlanta, and thence from Mildregreen and to mildred treaburg, and then straight for Abbleaun.
If sir you get a fast boat, it will take you only four days to reach the spot.

Even now the important jovernment work up north is still partly suspended so that ships with supplies might be disputched ormp promptly. If you can engage the use of one of these ships for your trip you will get there quicker. You can therefore be able to investigate the true nature of this greatest of calamities that had befallen our state. The Governor of Calverinia has telegraphed by cable from Pandora, stating that the disaster is complete, that the city of Abbieum has ceased to exist, and that it is true the whole population has perished. He is informed that in Adeleheid city also that thirty five thousand to fourty thousand po people had lost there lives, and of same city one hundred thousand are homeless and hungry, that there is need of all kinds of information, and that the visit of ships for the work of supply and rescue is imperatively required. If you go there sir maybe you'll hear much details of the expinsions from the survivors.

The Government of Calverinia, while expressing their thanks for the shows of sympathy informs us that Calverinia are still mole threatened by the fires. They therefore had requested that for the purpose of rescueing the po people were were in such deady peril and threatened with starration, the government of the Abbicannian state my send, as soon as the conditions of the floo will flood will allow, the means of transporting them from the stricken regions. This had been attempted but , have not yet heard anything of the results. The whole northern part of the state of Angelinia had also been seriously menuiced for weeks by the same flood camality calamity which has taken so appalling a form in calverinia. As I read in the papers the Emperor directed the Departments of the Treasury of war and the navy to take also such m asures for the relief of these strick on people as lie within the executive discretion. The flood seemed to have frustrated this too, and maybe also the enemy. I know that throughout the nation most enerous contributions had been made by the people throughout the States of ABbieannia, and every day the ammount had been increased, and which had been believed to be sufficient for the present. Prompt action was necessary as we all n know if the people to be affected were to relieved and rescued at all, but the flood prevented this to a terrible degree, if not also the enemy. S m Some of the Aurtohorities of the Abbieannian Covernment expressed as I heard a great deal of objections t to the proposedlegis proposed legislations, because they feared that no efforts to rescue could be accomplished on account of the nature of the flood. The suffering people victime of the worse of all disasters were suvjects of the great and powerful Kingdom of Abbieannia, a nation whose proud boast i it ha chad been alwaysthat it was able to take care of itself and its own people. Therefore this time the situation was different. Abbieannia could ke help itself it is true, but not its suffering states.

Count De miff told wielst and her sisters, when he interviewed them on the flood situation that he was clad the people of Abbieania were more willing that their covernments should not only express their sorrow for the suffering, but that they were willing that the government should extend the relief as far as prossive possible, but that because of the situation of such a flood, he did not then see how it could be done. Yet many tn things were done by the Emperor and his assistants to show how throughly throughly they sympathies had been enlisted by the distress of the stricken states, and that many ships, including the two warships of the River nic-nollester was ordered to sail imediately from calverine wi with relief supplies, millions of dollars worth of food was to be sent by river transports. five hundred thousand dollars worth of medicine, and an immeasurpable ammount of clothing, but just then no army surgeons and doctors could be spared, because of the woeful numbers of frightfully injured from the battles,, yet other boats were ordered to load with stores, at Prumia,, Albruhambrui, Heidi Turn, and Francis ity and proceed for the disuster zone, river craft of all kind in the north and extreme osouth and east were ordered to get ready for carrying fresh water to the sufferers, and transport steamers were ordered for carrying sun; supplies ory to take away the survivors, and all other boats were asked to co-operate, but all efforts proved fruitless, as the flood took such an extent and had such a force that to navigate the flood rivers and the main floods was sucide.

From this result it will be seen in mayor that the peror Vivium was worried exceedingly day and night for days. Not on nee once did he escaped a busy day... It was indeed so I was informed by Violet, and her sisters that those days were very to busy for All members of every state Government in continuing the good work they had begin in trying to get relief and rescue sent to the destricte of the flood and explosion disaster, and still working to succor those of the part disasters. Count De Diff himself continued also the goo work good work he had begin in ordering all surviving boats to the disaster zone, authoriging the commanders at San ruan city to send the fleet of workships from Francis Atlanta, and directing that the ships in grancis Anna be made ready for the expedition also . The Secretary of war Hanson Turmer,, find also directed the Commissary general, The Quarter Master General and others to order the full concentration of supplies at the calverinian giver Yrads for shipment on the vessels there and to be sent to the Disaster gone. The Secretary of the Treasury sent notices to the proper offices of his Departments to get revenue cutters and coast survey vessels for remainess for instant s service. Even when puperor Hanson Vivian went to His pulace the morning after the disaster occured, and he had learned of it he had made up his mind personally to supertend superintend the at arrangements for furnishing assistance to the people of the flood and explosion zone, and the first thing he did was to direct all of his Royal Cam Cabinet that hewanted done. The relief measures was not only restricted to Calverinia but to all points, and it was understood that if Abyssinkile and other stricken communities needed assistance it also was to be furnaced. In dact the instructions to ever every one needed permitted them to call at any of the disaster zones where relief may b necessary.

But when either one of the paperors learned that, the Mayors of thirteen cities had lost their lives, that hundreds of cit cities were swept away, and that the loss of live was to crible terrible beyond figuring and would never be known, and that for works no relief could reach the sufferers rease of the flood, they were at a loss of what to do. The main news came to Emeror Vivian from The Vivian Girl Princeacs themselves who samily learned all of the bossible details, and yield herself wrote that the decaster was complete, cities with a out, flood all over the country, and that the loss of live vials and relief and live million had perioded and rifty million were homeless and starving. The suggested that some of the Fed Cross be withdrawn from the armies, or se asked to send provisions as quickly as possible. It took three weeks for her message to reach him. Feeling confident that the Government would not neglect his appeal for authority to render assistance to the sufferers of the flooded states, amperor Vivian and also hisbrother, ordered the immediate selection from all stores of supplies, to the ammount of $900.000.000 that being the sum requested. All shipping captians were ordered to get these supplies ready, and soon the relief vessels were well u on the way.

The first discouraging news which mperor Hunson himself had, was that the first ship, called the "Key of leavon" had gone on the way to El Verso, and two days later was wrecked by the flood. The War Department also got a Telegram from outside the flood zone, reporting that the relief expedition could make no headway because of the raging floods, that to nav navigate the flood was impossible. This if true sure caused intense suffering among the refugees, who also because of the flood would suffer terribly from want of good water. Naturally the flood waters would be strongly impregnated with all the filth caused by the flood, and therefore not fit for drinking purpose. A good mater burge that had a capacity of eight hundred gallons ready for use, and proceeding from Mildred Greenburg before the flood reached there, was towned by a river steamer to a locality selected for refugees, and this of course was swept off and away by the flood rendering the situation worse. Therefore the Royal Members reported that arrangements were being made for a special meeting of the two Kings to devise means for sending the provisions and relief in spite of the flood. I myself had recieved from some one a dispatch, that told of the inciner ation and burying of the dead in the cities after the flood had receded, but which work was going on under the greatest difficulties. The only men engaged in it were the surviving citizens, and that the atmosphere of all places were so gaturated with the "stench that many of the curial parties were mane ill by it. The wen could only work for a short time at a stretch. There was one silver lining in the cloud of horror. The condition of the disaster and flood made it so that no Glandelinian vandals on this occassion penetrated any of the stricken places, and that there was no one found ri robbing the dead or digging in the ruins for treasures.. And over the whole scene from forest fires raging elsewhere ha hung the great clouds of smoke. The flood they said took a month to dimish dimish its force. I also had recieved a despatch from Calverine, that said the disaster was still in full force elsewhere . Even now we all fear further disasters."

"I had one strange undo queer experience but that was afterthe after the explosion and when the flood was on" said a middle sized man. I was on a rive ri river boat dispatched for Murcann, and because we could make no headway against the flood which we tried to do we took some chances anyway and cruised along its shores, keeping out of reach of the current. As we sped on sir, we encountered encountered a very dark looking cloud of black smoke ad as it was from a forest fire we were obliged to go far out of our couse to avoid the smoke ad and the heat.. while we were on to the town of Murchann we picked up a small open boat in which were five children and one man. They were refugees. We made an enghty five mile journey from Murchann to Guadeeloupe to where we arived after a two day trip with the kids or heard. The sky no matter no matter how long we journeyed was shraded in a strange brownish and wielst colored haze, which extended over the whole sky like a heavy thunder cloud. Far in the distance the haze shaped like a wall of giant mushroom clouds, where when it was catching the slight light of the sum piercing the haze showed a beautiful amber tint. All during our trip the flooded country side was strewn with wreckage. Many corpses were seen floating. We then reached the town of El Perfecto a few miles north of Murchann, and we observed that the place after being wrecked by the flood had been partly destroyed by fire. The few remaining people on shore begged to be taken off. They were taken aboard. When we came to Guadeloupe we saw that all that remained of that city were long rows of ruined valls, plasted with mud, and water was still in the streets. A nauseating croe odor came from the wreckage. We hailed another rescue boat, and the latter directed us how to land. In many places scores and hundreds of victims were seen in a single mass.Here and there fire s of great size were still burning. One refugee boat rescued five thousand survivors northeast of the city. Another ship rescued three thousand, and all and all were conveyed northward. I knew on a Hun or Sister who was among the survivors of the explosions, and who was taken to the hospital by train to Pandora. The doctors general made every effort in their power to save the life of the holy woman, but she was horibly burned and their me t most desporate efforts were in vain. Yet she was coun conscious despite her severe burns and other injuries, and told me what little she knew of the disaster. She said she was as well as the other Sisters going about her dutues, being a gight gister, when she heard a most terrific explosion she was to badly frightened at the shaning shoking of the building and the fulling of plaster, and breaking of windows that she fained fainted, and while in this condition the place took fire and she was terribly burned. She remained unconscious for a long long time, but recovered her si senses. She then saw she was lying in the midsts of the ruins of the bull building among others who too were frightfully burned, and they died before assistance could reach them. She also stated that she had no further knowledge of the disasterous and shortly after tel'i ng her story she died. If you are going to look over the ruins of what is left of Abbicann I may say that access to the city city is much suster now since the big catastrophe, except you must look out for the enemy You must also avoid the bigforest fire rawing near the place. If you reach Adele-Heid gity you will see everything scattered by the force of the explosion as if there had been a terrific tornado. The iron and brass beds sed in the houses are badly twisted by the heat, but no other signs of fire are there. Of course no doubt the bee bedding and other materials materials have completely disappeared. After the explosion as they said in one street two thousand corpses were found most of them lying face downward. The northern part of the town of Ad leheid are buried under the ruins. In the neighborhood of Greatgorn Creek many houses were found intact, but strange to sa I saw that many of their inmates are dead their bodies looking as though they had been struck by a flash of lightning, or been shocked by a el eletr electric wire. Mar Adeleheid the region rava ed includes Turop. and a hundred other towns. Nearly three quarters of the city of Adeleheid has been annihilated, and the same fate has befallen all the towns around it. I and many others landed, at Adeleheid, and buried many bodies. We brought some of the survivors to Pandora."

On invest gating more starring and even his followers in learned there were only two thousand sarvivors of Adelaiehd at the hospo hospitals at Pandora, whereas there were more than fifty thousand corpses strewn at the city and beneath the ruins , and a many of the uying who were half calcined, were brought also to Francis Anna, Many of these died. All the while Starring and his followers remained at La-Polama city the whole scenery was midden beneath a thick weil of smoke of a gray leaden color. The ground outside the city was still strewn with wreckage of ships tossed across the landscapes by the flood, and of the ruins of dwellings, trees and other debris. The forests in the far distance continued to burn, and the air was still filled with the odor of burning trees. In La Polama no house is intact even now. Every where there are masses of wood, and debris ad broken twisted houses.

The very streets have disappeared. A guide pointed out to Starring, one spot or one ruined house were the bodies of twenty five women, sixty children, and twelve men had been buried, and where many had worked day and night to release the .! Large trees twisted by the force of the flood lie with their roots upward beneath a awful mass of rubbish, from which the guide said had been discovered the protraing of a a mans arm.

As what was said to be observed in Adeleheid t it appeared that the explosions contained some posious gases in the powders, for Starring was told that all the the victims who had been found apparently covered their mouths in order to avoid death by sw focation. All who were saved came from villiages far from the explosion horror. Not a single soul was saved or recovered from Abbieanian Abbiean itsel. itself. Starring was told that the city of St Vincent De Paul north of Ad leneid was also striken, and the loss of life in that place was at least two to five thousand. He was told that the latest reports that had reached Pandora from the horror region only added to the horrors of the situation there. And it had been thou, thought that when the hews of the disaster first became known, that though the mater material loss would be heavy, the lea h death list would not be so very heavy, but it is now known up to the present time the fatalities number 7,000 and grave fears . are entertained that the list is not yet complete. What made all other work of investigations most desperate was that the forest fires still barred all good ass accessable approaches to the right regions, and it is feared the forest fires willnot cease untill the whole country recieves heavy re rainstorms.

And even now though it is so long since the disaster had occured immense anxiety was still felt as to the conditions of affairs throughout the whole disuster region. The latest news which had been recieved on August the 4th was recieved only the way before gtarring reached La Polama was to the effect that the forest fires were worse, half of the flood still remained, Abbiean was still inundated, and the number of dead was increased. Since then no news of any kind haden recieved. The latest information was that the whole flood area, and a part of the explosion area was cut off from the sholl shole world by ernormous seas of fire, and no n one was able to reach the place at any point, except throug which starring came.

Boats had rescued five hundred refugees from the fires from points along the river shore, and a gun boat whose officers and crew have been wok working bravely since the disaster overtook the country has rescued two thousand people, who fled the fires when their towns were threatened. Everyboard aboard the rescue ships are exhausted but the vessels had hardly arived at Pandora with survivors, before all mands are eager to again set out on their work of mercy.

The River cable steamers also accristed in the work of rescue and has taken all the survivors that she picked up to other cities, and large numbers of the survivors are occupying tent as al all the house accompations accommont accommodations of towns and cities aretaken up, but the crowds of refgees refugees are so large that many are compelled to shift for themselves as bust as they can.

"Yes" answored the P Linding Ranger.

"Do you know the name of it!"

""Yes it is faithful junction. It's about fourty miles northwest of gound Junction. It has a population of 100,000."

"God Holp them, Oh My God help them." said Starring. "I know that town. It used to being my home town when I was a child Ho w How far is the fire from it?" "A little nearer than Sound junction, though , hear the fire is only reaching Imperial Valley and moving pon two armies one under numley and the other under general Vivian." "Well" said Walter "The Blessed Lord help them, and add all His blessings to those who can and will keep the fire from buching the town, My mother is supposed to be there and my father, and God mother too."

Then he began to go forward clowly with the rangers, but some of the leaders went forward some distance first to do a little scouting. The others went on together continui continuing their former discourses, till they came to go down the hill. Then said Walater"It is very d fficult to go out to make a battle against the fire when you cannot hardly see a thing because of all this smoke. And whenyou cannot see where the advancing fire is it is dangerous to proceed I think-"

"You " suid the Chief Ranger "So it is, for it is a hard atter for a man or for a large bunch of rangers rangers to go down into the unknown recesses of this valley when we don't know whether we'll run into an interne or not as we are now and to gutch no flank attack upon us by the time we line up for battle, therefore our chief leaders went ahoud to see if there is a clearing in the sea of amoke. It is not thick enough to check any one but yet it hiden objects more nearer than we like. So they all began to go down the slope but very warily. It took a good half hour to make the descent eaftly w and without a olip or not, though to starring 't was as if a feeling resessed him of reminding him of going down into a densely smoking volcanic crator, and not knowing what he'll meet up in the way.

But now in this valley, they folt all hard ap against it for they had gone a little way untill they reached a clearing, where a breeze opring up cleared off ame some of the fog, and here they saw at some great distance a fierce conflugration moving off to flank the ridge of which they had just left. Then did the whole force begin to be afraid, and struggled hard to make up their minds whether to go back or stand their ground. But they considered again that there was no ravine or any bigger breach than the clearing, and therefore though that to retreat would b means sure death and therefore they resolved to venture and work like mad to increase the six size of the clearing as far as possible. They had two hours only in which to do it. It was not to check the forest fire, that was impossible, but only to save their go the loaders gave the order" Form In line, every one." The command was obeyed, the mining engineers being first, the axe and saw men next and those with spades and shovels andother weapons forming on both flanks, while those with the wet sucks and so on prepared for the covering of their retreat. The condition of the valley was most hadious to behold . Far away it was clothed with gray convulted clouds as if soething a from the bettomless pit, but so far away it appeared to be that evidently two hours was left for them to really work. The ! leading Runger came up to Wal er and regarding the advancing conflagration with a disdainful countenance said , ...,

"Whence comes that section of the forest fire, and whether do you think it is heading fortwintitte "It is coming from the I Emperial Valley, which is the place the heart of the left wing of the fire seems to be, and it is heading straight for us." unswered Walter. "I believe we are in a dangerous situation. How are the men working now!" "Good. T hey are speeding up. But we have only two hours. I percieve that this is one of the amain fires, for all that country is said to be an inferno like a thousand volcanoes in eruption. How is it then that it is spreading this way when it was first crossing Mic-Hollester River and headed for gound unction which is said to have been blown up by a great explosion. Where it not that I hope the fire aight be might be checked I would make a retreat to a better position. We'll be surrounded by a sea of fire and God only knows whether we'll survive or not. We can hope it'll chanc change its course. When the clearing is finished the only mere trifle hope for us to escape the terrific heat is to lie close to the ground, and keep ourselves souked with the water we have in the barrels in the warons wagons..... "Well" said Fulter gturring the fire " thefire is indeed sweeping our dominions, , , , , but , for one do not think we are at least hard pressed i, but yet we cannot be too careful."

"That might be so" declared the gamger " but nevertheless a far as I can say there has been no fire yet of any kind that has outwitted me or my subjects in fire fight -ing, neither will I yet allow this one to overcome me in the long run, when , get the right lay of the land. They'll soon have the whole nation out fighting it ifit if it continues on as it is now. But c since it is heading tward us, and the Government complains of the causes and the result, let them be content to send you help in your efforts to find out who among the glandelinians ordered the making of these disasters. and probably something then can be dies to stop it and stop it for good. And what our country can afford they should give thee if your mission is successful. ".

Abbicanta and her states, even though of course course the service was hard and dangers us, and my wastes could have been so small as to not enable a man to live on it, but I did it for the sake of adventure. I am not really a foregoing soldier sir as some think but an adventueror, for for the Abbican Abbicannian Government a Professional Spy, but I do it more for the thrills of adventure than for mere profit or wages and resard. Then I started out on my first adventure, I did as other considerate persons do when I made mistakes, look out, if perhaps I min might mend myself. But now I have started out on this mission only for the sake of the Princesses, they have asked me to go, and how can I with fairness back out when the government alone may concern. Only God knows what y lolet, and her sisters have done for me."

"And Heaven knows you are right." cried the Ranger. "That they too have done is a marvel a record branker when they could have stayed at home and enjoyed the lives they were born for. They have done everything according to their means, though even then the enemy has changed from bad to worse. Yet it has ordinarily been so that those who have professed themselves to be their aids, have afterwhile given them the slip in cowardilness, and that is why in many of their efforts all has not been well. I like you general starring have given them my faith, and sworn my allegiance to them. and therefore I destort any who desert them in time of danger and they should be hanged as a traitor. Some of my own rangers have done the same to me in time times past, and vot had been compelled to follow their example of mercifulness, and be willing to pass by all. What , have promished to them, and even their father the great hely Emperor was in my very childhood, and besides I count that the Princesses under whose banner now stand is able to do many things for me if I only ask, and besides Walt to spouk truth, I lif love their service, their very beings, the Abbienin Abbieannian government, their company, and country botter than my own which , left so long ago with my parents (France) and I will follow Abbie annia in all she asks. And Walt consider yet what you are likely to meet with in the adventure you are on no w. You know that recently and that for the most part many of the christian spies g have come to an ill and, because they are transgressors against wicked clandolinia and her

How many of them have been put to the most shameful deaths, and besides you are non a more dangerous mission and yet no one han been able to deliver the captured christian spies out of the hands of the enemy, but as for pargar misself how many times as all the very world very well known has he delivered from power and even necessary violance those that have feithfully servided served him and his, though taken by the Glandelinians rind pargar, consult him, and he will have you covered by his members and then your work will be a successful end, and as for the ill end they have come to that will be most glorious on their account. For they do not expect safty in any of their expectations of hazardous work, for they do it for the flory f glory of their country, and they shall have it by and by, iv if not in this world then in the next."

"And " said methor Ringer. Thou hast been already very faihful to the Vivian Girl Princesses and to the country and service of the country, and some day you'll recieve great been from them."

"where in phiefRungers have I been unusually faithful to them?"

There is records kept of which you have accomplished many great marvals even in first setting out, you attempted many things they couldn't do and came through successfully without a scratch, you have frequently raided the enemys here lines and escur secure their many important hans, you provented generals from attempting wrong ways in trying to relieve the pressure of a glandelinian attack against their lines, when they should have sent in botter troops, you have prevented many generals from mostling dimester, when they a wore almost persuaded to make a retrat retreat, and and when you talk of your journey, and of what thou hast heard and seen, thou art even even now making efforts to accomplished something more record breaking yet. If you do succeed you denorty a great commission.

"All this is true, and men more which you have left out, but the Princesses whom I have corved and hencred have done many things also, and besides I have done this for the sake of my n country, for here I've soon enough to make a status weep, and I tto too have grouned ador undor the strain of witnessing these sights, been sorry for the millions of refugees suffering and in want without homes, and have obtained from event more or Vivian the pass to do this mission."

"Then" the Ranger said "Often too I have broken out into a grevious rage over these scenes. I am an enemy of glandelinia worst than you, I hate her government and her wicked cause, the massacres, horrors and other disasters she causes. I am come on on prupose purpose to help the pations withstand her wickedly made disasters. Here comes the time for the start of the work for you and your followers now, gut beware what you do, for we are in the "Valley of the shadow of Death", therefore take head to yourself and don't allow your self to be trapped."

"Starring unewered "I am av void of four in this matter, lets prepare to frustrate the conflueration, for , swear by all that is goof, that is good, that with Gods help the conflueration will go no further, here we will remist its progress to the end." and with that he threw himself with good spirt in the work with his followers.

All the others as fast made at the trees catting and blasting, and when one would fall they would scatter to prevent the danger of being caught undernoath. Starring led the whole fracis for with the near approach of the fire he sawcit was time to bestir himself, and sparks were seen far in the sky rising up thick as clouds.

The one ranger got struck by the large branch of a falling tree, which wounded him in his hand, head and left foot, but he continued working nevertheless.

Though so far away as it was the terrific heat of the conflagration made the Rangers and walt rs f Eulters followers give back a little, but they soon followed their work amain, and sooing the breach was getting wide and long in so short a time walter took courses again, and worked an manfully as he could.

This sore combat by hundreds of men lasted already for about an hour, even till a number of the rangers were quite apant, for by reason of conclean tell like this and as as fast as it is in their vpower to work, they cannot help but grow meaker and weaker. The gap had grown sufficiently large however, and Walter eapying his opportunity begun to gather up closer to the main line of workers, and while he worked on, one of the rangers was struck by a flying branch which gave him a dreadful dreadful fall, and with that his axe flow out of his hand. He was recorded however.

At this time one of the leading Rangers riding p said;

"I'm sure wo'll succeed in heading it off now" and with that he presend them on still harder, so that the work progressed still botter. But as bad luck would have it, while the pangers were fetching the last stroke to their buttle, thereby to length on the size of the breach, the panger r Chief rods up and suid;

"The fire is moving around tward our flonks. We will have to give back a little or be caught in the rear and have out our escape cut off entirely."

The order was given I along the line and with that the workers agreed at first, and then sped away to the other edge of the clearing on a high rise.

During all this toil and combut, no man can imagine unless he had seen and heard as these rangers did, what hedicus and unusual rearing the flames made far away or how the clouds volcanic eraption like rose high into the air all the time of the fightt fight, and when he saw the battle ending in favor of the coming blaze what sighs and groone bursts from Starrings heart-Not as of them even smiled or gave a pleasant bok, not till the captions gave the commands for them to move out of the danger zone, then indeed did some of them smile, but it was becoming the most dreadful sight ever observed it goes like this; that is the battle to stop the progress through great excitement and perils; ::::::

During the progress of the work, and prior to the advance of the terrible conflagration, far to the north eighteen villiages with a good population of nearly 23,456 each, which needled fourty miles north of the advancing Red Plague, were being mustered out on small trains and handcars and on swift horses to come and help the mangers with whom starring was with to crush down the terrible Plague of fire. Near this town there was a large channel being burely two and me half miles wide, some kind of a large section of the Mic-mollester River both sides so densely forested that no one could go through except by passageways and small roads.

The city of Majorcium the triving town of that section of Calverinia with a popelation of over 100,000 also was sending its men folk to aid in the battle for she and the big villiages lay directly in the path of the conflagration and were in cancer of destruction.

Walter starring ben being also one of the men of science and a member of the gemini, knew for months before this when the war disasters first started what what lay in store for unfortunate Calverinia... And experience also had told all his observors that when because of the enemy swarms of forest fires begin in the vinicity of southeastern calverinia, the "Glandelinia pragon of horror" is writhing and preparing to make trouble or try to as to say to St Michael who is in this story the guardian of galverida Calverinia. This was now the greatest forest fire in any volumes written, and so far it has wiped out billions and billions of dollars worth of trees alone not counting towns and villiages, and rendered nearly four hundred thousand to a million homeless, adding continually to the volcanic eruption like enemy made explosions and flood disasters that nothing in realty can ever compare in the far future not alone of the past.

Y. of Yet throughout Calverinia Scientific investigation is to be in large measure to be credited with the real small loss of life in the forest fire instances, for it is through the contu continually made up quick warnings of the advance and progress progress and direction of the fires that the inhabstants of any populated town or city directly in its path were enabled to floe from the "RED FLAGUE." In Abbleann and Bengal county on the other hand far past the cataclysm of earthquake, flood and forest fire and combination disasters far surpassing the horrors of a Katmia gruption caught the big Calverinian city of many millions and all its river ports unawares and unprepared.

It was through fire Rangers, the gemin, the Weather Bue Beaur and other persons the that the progress and direction of the great forest fires were predicted, conver saly it can be hoped that in time fur future explosions can be prevented. If such for dusting of the advancing of forest fires is achieved, it is concievable, that a forest fire of this intensity could have occured with a loss of life something terrible if not predicted on time. The strange phenomena of this forest fire and its a ttending horrors could prove of great importance to the scientific world if actually happening as well as the series of great mysterious explosions is caused caused and the measures which could be taken to safeguard life at the proper time andownrn warn the inhabitants of towns and villiages many hours before the fire came even within eight.

As Sturring know many writers throughout the country had published warnings, that them great forcet fires were likely to spread, and oven general purper rae absolutely confident that disasters of major portions was impending, for the land two years and more during the outbreak of the immeasuremble war prior to the great flood and forest fire disasters, great supplies exclusions caused by the enemy had occured in all parts of northern Angelinia, and this had made general purgar and many of his members make observation trips here and there, to find out proper details.

The observatory at Angelinia Agathia had recorded two hundred and eighty one explosion concussions in the early season of 1913 as compared with an average of 100 explosion made quakes against annually over the first year of the war.

The greatest of the 1913 xplosion shocks occured on Jane and July, and an the ready well know by this time did great damage, Nort of the disturbances were where the great flood and other hereons occured afterwards. At many pints because of these concussions springs in great numbers counsed to flow, n and pends and wells in the country dried up, uring all the spring and summer menths throughout all sections of were we western and southern Calverinia there had been very little ruinful, and this too may be the reason why the forest fires had such a good start when once started.

The ,,iolain violent and of forest fires causing great cruptive explosions of mysterious cause also began somewhere each of Vivian Wickey, where there were formed also three errormous conflagrations, the last two being on November 10 1912 and also throughout pecomber, and the following month within great winter snowasts storms finally stopped their spreading. Naturally the inhabitants in all forested regions of the dangerous paths of fires became extremely apprehensive day after day, but outside of the main blazes sweeping seatern Calverinia elsewhere nothing amount happened.

One great marval of forest five fighting was done by tremendous mining by rhouseads of engineers. The explosions of the mines made quakes and tremendous eruptions, being in swarms of terrific blat blants, so that needs nearest the dangers jumped. Three strong shocks caused by these mine explosions were felt on the afternoon of Septembar the fifth, followed in the evening by two more. The next morning there were a handred and fifth strong snocks in endless succession accompanied by thundering noises in a long revervating roll. The concussions were increasingly alarming and people of towns and villiages believed the enemy were up to something. Grive growting noisespreceded some and a roar us of buttle followed others.

The mining was done along long stretches of force with a purpose to breach it quicker thus can be done by saw, or dynimite and ax puring The sixth of September 10,000 atrong chocks were counted, and scores of greater convussions were being registered by the seimpgraph at the meteorological observatories west of Angelinia Agathia, five hundred chocks per hour during the morning, eleven hundred had per hour about noon, and some twenty thousand thousand per hour in the ovening with a maximum of twenty eight thousand between 10 and 11 P.M.

There was a lad in the strange quaking after midnight, but on the following morning twenty thousand more shocks per hour were felt from six to seven what ever ammount of all this blusting was done, and what ever the breaches were made stopped the way in nowmy in no way whatever.

THE number of concussion shocks felt in nearest cities and towns could not be determined but they were felt every ten or twenty minutes, and some times every five minutes. Then here would come a respite from strongly felt shocks for about an hour during which period there would be fifteen quakes at very irregular times. The armings of the ruvages of the approaching forest fire which it seemed noting nothing could have stoppes, probably even rain maybe, were heeded. Many towns noted in 'he path were warned. Every available country train, rushed with frantic speed back and forth from these towns, day in day out moving the inhabatants from village and city, their bedding matting, food, everything the people had some time to save. Breach after breach was made by the sories of mine explosions, the wind of the fire stopped not for this and the fire raged beyond the breach or around and renewed its spread with sterrifying fury. Every day at many points, the army, the navies of rivers, government departments, shipping of various rivers, and river steamship lines were helping in the saving of people from threatened towns,

By the time that Starring and the many rangers, and all those who had come from villages to help had finished the breach of their own maring as far as time allowed, a report came from one of the men that great emoke cruptions was rising from a large forested ridge to their right. This scene regarded by them was strikingly terminated by a volcanic outbreak of clouds nonrest to their own center. A terrific heat prevaded the air, it grew dark as if the approach of a hurricane in the Tropics and the sky in the distance restance as height as an _lotric light.

All other distant forested regions on movement slopes had all this time been veiled by a dense cloud, while for off there was an incessant din of rumbling which proved that Bangers and fighters elsewhere were still blasting in the hope to stopping the great conflagration.....

At many points in the forests in the path of the advencing fire continual and quick explosions of the most tremendous force were heard for many days and nights, and no of the mines was set off near Evangeline St clare which again the fire was threatening but from a new quarter, a large explosive pair of smoke being reported at that time, but it was not untill later when a wind broke away the fog smoke clouds that the great forest fire drawn anfolded under splendid photographic illumination before the view of many of the apprehensive people of that city. It was also tward this city that Starring and the Rungers were fighting to prevent the progress of the forest fire, and at Starrings suggestion the Pangers decided also to try minding a mining a breach.

The first explosion came at Ton thirty oclock, when in the middle of middle of of the forest near the c clearing already started, the waiting rangers and Starring saw the hard profile of a smalling baloon balloon of black and white smake rise majestically from the ground, where a few hardon before were trees. The concussion was almost as terrific as a volcanic cruption and many trees were term away leaving a large gap where they stood. The big cloud shot up obliquely, then straightened to a ventical column and rose nearly a thousand feet into the sky, first balloon shaped then assuming the form of a great muchroom. Finally the top bent majestically westward than assuming the form of a great muchroom. Finally the top bent majestically westward done good work. It took nearly half are an hour to make the second mine. Then the batteries wont to the shock and again a similiar cauliflower column rose high into the air, but this was dwarfted by the towering cloud of the half hour before with which it eventually morged. Another gap was term in the forest but somewhat smaller. But all this time the others continued working cleawhere with saw, a dynimita and axe for they never took as advantable of the mining to foolish by step their was work.

The breach must be accomplished before the fire came p. With occasional lulls but with ever increasing violence, the booming concussion of mine cruptions grew more and more terrible, but soon it got no further for the mailtions of the Rangers became spent and so nothing more could be done. But though fifthen explosions had been made, they done more in that time then the Rangers alsowhere had done with axe, saw and dynimits. The terrible conflagration was coming nearer and terrible shoots of flame dunced and shot in undulating forms and writhes through through the great volcanic cruptive like billows of smoke, and in the lower portion of the great wall of rolling smoke sometimes strange verticle lines of upward streaming shoots of flame curling as high apparently as the smoke clouds themselves, or even above could be seen from time to time. Explosions occured occassionally as fierce as a fussilade of cannons as trees filled with turpentinecsap exploded when they caught fire. In addition there were cutward spurts of large shooting tengues of flame that apparently enot across a portion of the sky overhead, leaving leaving curving trails of strange glows for a moment in their path.

The Rungers and Starring and his companions were not forced to abandon their work at this point and flee to a great distance before the terrific heat. Great streamers of sparks thick as clouds looked like glaringrock bombs, yet they would darkern after passing the crest of their various courses, or light on trees beyond and set them 509ng in hardreds of flercely blazing torches at as time...ons time...

By this time while approaching the breach the forest fire was graining in fury and just then felt by starring and rangers extra heavy concussions were felt indicating other fighters were doing their own blasting close by warkness gradually begun over the city of Evangeline St Claire compared to that of midnight, and continued for days. The work of the gangers resumed at the further end of the breach where the heat was not felt so intense, and the fall of trees cut down began an hour and ten minutes after they had retreated to a good degree, and continued on untill they again were compelled to make another retreat. The crisis of the work which resulted in the finishing of the breach as far as the heat of the advancing conflagration permitted occured four hours later, when a terrific mysterious explosion on the van of the forest t near the breach hurled down nearly a whole score of forest trees or splintered thom, dislodged boulders from cliffs, and threw the fighters on their faces gome of them come near being trupped in a land-slides, and thirty five of them narrowly escaped from being crushed to death.

They just got away on time. The nearest advance of the left wing of the conflagrat

They just got usay on time. The neuront advance of the left wing of the conflagr ion had begun, and the glare was growing as bright as if the very region of the forces forest was in scuption and ejection hundreds of millions of tone of moltan lawa, gimult modusty with the occurrence of this my sterious explosion which in some degree had the means of accidentally enq enlarging a portion on the of the clearing or breach, a sudden new iglow of fire equally as bright in its sheen of light was observed through the smoke rolling up on the central line of the conflagration. This continued to increase, and the roar of the flames could be easily heard, while now the fighters were termented by a terrific wind that eway ed the trees with a roar seering off bruches and raising great clouds of dust-it was the advance guard of the terrific fire aburricans. The convussion of explosions made by miners to try and gap the fire were occassionally so severe and reached at times such a maximum that people who remained in threatened Evangeline St clare citythroughout the passage of the " RED PLAGJE" testified to witnesses and newspaper reporters that their ears were aching as a result of the incessant detonations and the everlasting ruttling of the partitions doors and window shashes of the houses. It was a vertible bumbardment of sound. The city itself looked like some big scarlet town from the terrific glare of the distant conflagration-

Religious Processions Headed by the City pardinals and priests were made to askedur Blessed Lord to save the city from the flames. Yet it might seem probable that the big concussion shocks happening as frequently as the number of musket shots fired during a buttle was the climax of exploding mines used to fell great number of trees in the headway path on the advancing flames, and also that other and greater detonations were the climax, of the explosions in the region of the woods nearest grangeline at dare, where thousands of citizens of the city, and many rangers were fighting desperately to check the progress of the flames..... The glow which increased within full sight of the city at the time, ,, of the fusitude of explosions was due to the ever increasing of the flames as they spread, wildly among the greater turpentine forests. All through the time since this great fire first started it had been followed already by many months of intensie intense activity in burning and progressing forward and in many other directions.

An Starring again observed, which gives truth to the statements of the sungers there was a new danger brought on by the tremendous forest fired. At first something that could have been mistaken for hot lava flows ermorged from a slope which was all a mass of flames in the distance moving rapidly the first few hours and then settling down to a plastic flow looking more like some small glacial moraine than a melted rock flow. Evidently the heat of the flower were melting rocks on the slopes till they became of lava formation gimilar false lava appeared from another sour r source, where the fires were in greater and fuller blust-

And now Starring and the Rongers had only half on hour more to complete the breach before the flames now roaring in the distance like a hurricane of the _olar Planet would be upon them. A great series of mine explosions almost new within sight of Starring and the nangers, which had been set off by workers elsewhere,, and during the explosions something else happened which sont up an avalanch of clouds and flames, and rumbled like a thunderstorm. At the front of the conflagration emoulders of great size were as fierce as molten lava streams and seas reaching the ocean and they made a sea of rising tails and rolls of cottony smoke.

some portion of a nearby ravine before the concusuion caved in, and there was a noise somewhere as of a volcanic eruption. The climax of fire luminousity, accompanied ever end anon by terrible detonations und concussions of mining explosions made an appearance as if the whole forest region was being deventated by some ernormous volcanic eruption issueing from every mountain and valley and plain in the neighborhood, and like huge skyrockets, burning mons secured over the unburned forests in all directions before the screaming screaming hurricane now blowing. Over the closest mountain still more thickly forested hung a huge black cloud of smoke in which ernormous tongues of flames, either undulated, writhed or zizzagged in long white streaks. Suddenly from that ridge with the awe struck men all gazing intenstly some tremendous force of heat sent a wall of fire seemingly more than six thousand feet into the air. Then along the slopes a brilliant column of flame simulan sously seemed to fall through the wemake, and down the slope tumbled like a vast Niagara of fire in wide streams, amaze of burning trees which scene evidenced that many had burned through and crashed crashed down. Newer fires were hurled black smoke, and the tumbling fires of rulling burning trees down the slope seemed to strike rocky obstructions and ike like water sent a fiery mist of sparks far into the night. To see what was up Starring climbed a huge pine tree to the top. There he felt the heat as if in an rearing gale. From there he saw a great stretch of fire moving tward a new section of the forest, mushing like motion clouds, across a far off ravine, roofing it in flame, filling it with broken and burning trees, and changing a forest of ernormous dimensions into a glowing fire sea. This dreadful scene increased, and spread fire now tward where the great breach was made, Now it was coming. The entire forested region fronting or in front of the big clearing was ablaze. Flames leaped high, and the glowing embors of trees burned down elsewhere glowed like a heilish nightmars to the Infernal Regions. He caw some small vitlinges a score of them which oven and he had all he could do to keep his perch the tree swayed so in the hot had been built in line and also the fire was catching and burning rapidly along these. A perfect "Rapids of Blizzard glowing ash or sparks" torn from the burning forests by the howling winds seemed to behave like the famous downrushing blust of Mt Pelse on the island of Martinque in the eruption of 1902, setting fire to patches of trees car in advance of the main conflagration, obliterating a big patch of woods near the viver at once with flames and smoke, and with ever increasing violence the winds blew, beginning here and there to throw down the trees, with their tops away from the fire, the stumps shrodded and puctured by flying

This was the moment of most extreme danger for Evengeline t St Claire, for the blasts of the fire harricone like an incandencent blast we blast was headed in swirling whirlwinds straight tward the city, scarcely more than thirty miles away, but it was hoped the Even; cline St Clare stroum being wide at this point would not permit the flumes to cross. If the concentrated flumes crossed, Evangeline St Clare surely would be destroyed, but the ourcome was to be happybeer the city, for the explosives used for breaching in that neighborhood, and the width of the river, and the efforts of all the non inhubatants of the city in breaching across the river in the ci city side prevented the conflagration from crossing at that point. Al nd also if the conflagration had concentrated tward the _learing quicker than it ald, there would have been no hope for starring and the Rungers in escaping, but the outcome for them was happy for some time, for in the explosions of miles the clearing had been extended, and therefore the fire did not readily reach the clearing proper till that half hour was up in which time they were able to work to partial success. Hear the river immense patches of dead fishes floated brown and all colors, and all sizes, some places in such ashes us to impade rowbouts. As the wind was mostly southwest the heavy spark and hot ask harricens and blizzard accumulated thickest over the woods.

The main line of fire within wight of the clearing, and which was heading for the clearing was forming more than sixteen miles long in three minutes time, and varied in width from less than a mile near the source to three miles at its widest in the region of the river. The more voluminous east fire sea came from three near by valleys, many of the burning trees expld exploding ike artillery. From the heighte where by heat alone a new fire was forming starring could see a snake like stream of fire spreading on the forest at the rate of a hundred feet in a half second, to u region further up the slope where the flumes spread out to the right and left in into a suden sea. All three were gaining. The heat of the fire rassing down the river was so terrific that even where Sturring and his friends were the river water was boiling hot with clouds of steamy vapor on all sides, where if any one fell in it would meun certain death..

Creat caulificwer smoke in explosive like puffs were sometimes brightly incandescent in flame reaching a height of thirty thousand feet, and somewhere probably from the heut of the fire, apparent blowholes of paroxysmal gas puffed almost continuously from some terrific pressure, and strangely enough enough which seemed unusual some of the fire streams or stretches when seen at that great., and unusual distance (everything met be unusual in this case) divided into lobes at their lower ends,,, and as of these burned up the side of a ridge, and covered the summit untill it began to look like one of its fellow hills which were all ablaze. The greater moment when the hill became entirely a hill of fire occured about twenty minutes later when the whole ridge was obliterated by fire and smoke, which began to rise a the sides and summits in secthing flames us high apparently as twice the same kind of a mountain. The least of these flames seemed to rise to a height of threese of four hundred feet. At Angelinia ot at clare the temperature was 138 degrees in the shade but at some other places in the city the thermometer gave such runging degrees of heat as follows; Northwest city, 100,, then rose to 115, 120,, 125, 134, and 154, the highest 1 186 where people could not stand it.

A n investigator out in dangerous location in an effort to learn the main course of the fire was caught near a sudden outbreak of a new fire that at that time was manked from him by smoke or masked from him by smoke. It suddenly appeared within thirty feet of him, the heat of which inflicted some injury upon him, and his attendant. Fortunately a large creek was at hand into which they wetted their clothing which was aftre, and then fled for shelter

The remarkable record of life saving, by even starring and the Pangers in the moment when Evangeline St Clairs was throatened a fourth time was par partly due to good luck but also to the instinct of the people of said sad scoity, to the wis wisdom of the city's government, and to city Geminian Societies ... Also city army, and navy and plice officias in that intense heat and durkness took control , river steamship companies, newspaper men, tourests, sight seers,, and high school school boys organized rescueing expeditions to the endagered cityy, in the face of the terrifying explosions of forest fire tree bombs and unful heat and dense smoke fosting the city streets so you could not see a hundred feet, and helping every one possible to get out of the wind racked city before the heat would gain more and start fires of its awn. Yet despite the peril many refused to go. They lived through all the horror, through heat, some and wind which thra threatened to sip off the goods of the buildings, and send alexis of dust and debris alying down the atreats. Three headred persons had been injured during pastice and taken to nospitals, and two persons driven income by the spectacle jumped into the river and were drowned or scaled to death. People outside the periled city camped in internment internment or refugee camps in country cometeries, there being fifty thousand the left for the outside. The majority of the mon citizens went out to combat the red domon. There had been a general exadus, all belongings of shops and private houses which could be moved were taken off, soldown took up their quarters outside the city, and general in charge of an army detatchment that was bound for a portion of general vivians army which was at this time situated about thirty miles north of

gound pend and about as many miles south of avengeline St Clure diverted his own command in rescue and relief work, with tarring and the pangers helping. People in outliving towns reclaved some of the refugees, and systematically provided lodgings, even though they too might be threatened by the " NED P: AGUE" cometime later, on. Many foriegners, who were familiar with the trugedies of St Pierre at the time of the Mont Peleo cruption, and of other great aruptions, who had witnessed in America and other places great forest fires, and other disasters, know the nature of this big forest fire, and their views had been made public. As gtarring had been told, the highest member of the Comini kept stendfuetedly the record of the shocks produced by explosions, and atmospheric changes produced by forest fires, and did not allow anything to frustrate his offerts to obtain anywhat he was after. It was also a most astonishing commentry on the advanced idea, of the aurthorities throughd throughout Culverinia that they should blame weather observers for not predicting in advance all they " should " know about forest fires. At the time when the forest fire passed the city without doing doing any horm, aurthorities brought official bulletins to the effect that for the city the worst was over, so that thereafter the population straggled back to the city,, and the she shops and the hotels were rep reopened. All railroad communications with the city were broken, and telephone connections also. Over the series of disactors as Starring also learned relief funds were continuing to pour in o from all parts of the world. In the vinicity of Evange line St clare city 1,155,000 people had dwelt within the death zone of the most dangerous forest fire ... Yet no lives were lost directly to the fire in this locality Probably one hundred and ninty two thousand people deserted that part of the country and were cared for by unusual hospitality ...

As Good luck would have not, the fire been did not move an directly tward,, the breach us had been first feared, may if it had prengeline at lare would not have excepted. O when the battle to keep back the fire was ever, turring said, to the the chiec Shief ranger, "Let us all give thanks to jur pleased Lord who had delivered us out of the path of danger, and they all kenlt kent down and prayed most fervently. After that they all and town even in that smokey atmosphere to eat break and drink some of the warm milk, and then afterwards they all decided to alimb up to a high ridge as best as possible to get a good view of the ernormous fire, as starring desired to do so before he would continue the journey, for he

"By that means we could easily know which way my travels would be safer. E e Even though some other enemy may be at named, fear the fire worst. It took nearly half a day to reach the summit and here they had a good view from the great height. Now million books of words can describe the fury of this raging billowy series of red lakes and sens and rivers of seathing flames through i menser seas of heavy volumn rolling like smoke clouds. Fo givery where great sh oots and spouts of flames flames shot up through the smoke along a stretch of a score of thousand of acres and at that distance they seemed to be something of incundescent light, yellow when it rose and disappearing the red blood through the smoke. The noise of the conflagration was a continuous roar like carf, and by a noise like gas rushing through a lava pool filling a rift, the winds c seemingly to churn the flames to foum, and flinging up seus of sparks. They proceeded across the summet to a m better clearing to the immediate edge of a precipico to get a better view of the tremendous scene. To them it was like taking in the views of a hundred big volcanic erup erupts eruptions at one time. A large ridge a great distance beyond where they stood was about five hundred feet higher than some of its near neighbors, and stood or north west of them stood the highest of the hills, and densely forested . Next to them immense mountains of flames rose up continuously half again as high as these ridges, and so many trees all ablaze and burned through were falling that they seemed eternally scattering n w new fires, and rolling noiselessly or fiercely down clearings seemingly to be gilded with a mottled fiery puttern. Through the southwestern wall of the highest forested ridge there, the fire had began to surge and here in a stretch miles wide and of a length which the naked eye could not determine rushed a ne new fire surge, from that distance like the sluiceway of a dam of fiery matter. This new fire only ten miles south of the observors quickly eproud into a fiery sea, with epoed up the clopes estimated by gtarring as probably more than fourty miles an hour. At that distance the fire stretch of course appears far narrower than it really was at its first formation, with many upriving waves, and bright surges along its own left. As the wind was off tward the observors from that direction the heat sometimes became almost intolerable, and they were forced to babeat a quick retreat. The flames was pouring across the River within view at this section, and the rangers obtained one glimpse of the flames before a sudden black shoot of cloud shut it from view. A large stretch of heavy white hot lava could not have looked any more fascinating. The upris uprush of smoke clouds at this point, where the flames was suging up a whole line of slores seemingly at once, curried up big brunches of trees, and a blinding shower of flaming embers and sparks showing the force u of the uprushing currents. Some places the flames played in the clouds like red shoet lightning. Then they view the scene nearer with field glasses they could observe great rafts of hillside rocks, red hot or black or red below and black above rolling done into a ravine, either smoothly or rolling over and over showing the terrific heat of the flames almost melting even the biggest rocks on the hillsides. The color effects of the conflegration through the immense smoke clouds were sometimes gargeous beyond description. Over the highest clouds at times rose sheets of red and even strangely to say purple and vermillion green and blue flames topped with like fume, against a black, or blue gray bl background, ! Inewhere rose the great buff-colored volutes of cloud with individual billows, black, white, coffee colored, brown, gray , cream color, and black each. All of this was backed by an further distant Columi Nimbus like yellow and dark gray cloud.

While observing it only ten minutes the great scene had by that time vastly increased, and the noise had changed from a mild his hissing and other kind of rour to a loud thundering beening. The fires couths hills increased in size and height untill the whole series of hills began one gigantic line of conflagrations. When the wind was strong strange gases guite different from the smoke of the conflagration which had been sufficating in volume but still somewhat telerable with the aid of a wet cloth over the no strils would be whifted over to them, and they corroded the eyes tissues, and gripped the lungs so as to instaneously stopped stop all breathing. A wet cloth would produce no improvement whatever, and there was no possibility of coming too near the smoke belt of the fire and surviving unless with an oxygen halmet. As Walter had great anxiety which continued unrelieved by any complete information as to what was transpiring on the ridges west of them, they made an excursion around to the east side of their observation post t in order to compar compare conditions with what had been observed in the earlier stages of the conflagration there. A line of fire was observed at this point rising in places cloud high above the surrounding country, darkened by clouds as fierce as a Man Mauma Lon eruption for three times the height of all the mountains. Over the high summit of the nearest ridgs and through the half of the valley beyond the flames would shoot up in their red sheeted tongues through smoke clears like a beginning of a burning world, which rushed on up two immense slopes in an endless climbing avalanch of fire. The wind on this hot surface and before its advance set up every now and then small or big ternadoes of fire and smoke lasting from half an hour to several minutes, moving along the glope and tearing up all the branches of trees in violent noisy whiris. Taking advantage of the wind at this section being tward the fire inst ad of from it, Starring climbed a nour on the same side in order to yet a better and clearer view of the Red Plague by as close an approach as possible. It was necessary to clumber up a slope, where trees and ground felt unusally warm from the radiance of heat from the distant conflagration which made him sweat like having a murkish Bath. Here on this spur he saw gigantic surges of flames surging forward and upward, and suddenly from somewhere to his surprise rose a geysor of flery fragments of trees two hundred feet above the summit. which evidently told him the fire had exploded something. It was evident from occassional changes in the direction of the wind, that the greatest heat radiance from even that distance of the conflagration might at any moment be turned in his direction, so that it required quick work to get to the summit of the hill, and get to a sheltered spot on the other side where he would not need to sweat himself to " death. The sensution of incessantly looked down in valleys over plains and mountain slopes at that towering sea of flames, and calculating its movements, with the heat almost insupportable, and the noise uncal uncanny was an experience never to be forgotten. He succeeded however in getting to the summit, and taking a look down into the flaming valley below. It all had to be done in much less time thun it tukes to tell it in a few words, for a very few seconds of the rising heat would have rained his face. A The wall of the spur made a reflector for the heat, so that but for the wind at his back, it is doubtful whether he would have reached the edge at ail. The valley below where the fire only smouldered after burning down the r trees was like an ernormous volcanic crater, the seething flames elsewhere being impolled continuously forward by the wind driving it on in glowing surges. The whole vailey was ablaze and the flames were quite as fierce in appearance as any sea storm and the fire rouring and thundering, quickly put one in mind of getting a downward glimpse of the Infernal Regions.

TII 'oBmoin,

There was a smaller interior vailey which was like some titunic pen chalice of fiery amoking embers, and which looked like a big sea of smouldering couls, with loups of flowe like gayeer jots flying back and forth. So fuscinating was the scone that gtarring felt desirable to tarry several days around this section, but it would be extremely dangerous. Further off but in full view could be observed a moving and frightful "desert of flames, the creation and the prey of the mightlest of fires ever heard or written of, dominating overy other view, and towering up slores and hilltors in huge mountains of fire. The whole conflagration was composing itself into a great sea of fire, opening apparen by in all directions.

Now however when starring decided it was about time for him to continue on his journey withihis followers he for a while was a m somewhat taken aback.

The whole region before him was a worse than even the Valley of the chadow of Death through which Christian passed through Starring and his followers if they wiched to find their way to general Johnstons Jackken Munleys army had to go through with the danger of meeting these terrible forest fires from three sides. Now this valley being the extreme northeast section of the great Imperial Valley was a very thickly forested place, a wilderness of trees, yet a land of extreme beauty, a place of surpassing interest, but now with the forest fire soon to threaten it if the wind should change direction was to be a valley of death. Sturring feared to take the chances but he had waited so long or stayed so long with the Rungers thatbnow now there was no other way, and to remain another day would mean disaster for them

Even all the pangers were now worse off than in their fights with the fire. Starring and all the rest prayed forwently that the fire would remain on its own proper course and not head for this vailey. Then they had descended to the borders of this bountiful valley there mot him a group of men making a hasty retrat retrest in his direction. Starring was surprised and somewhat apprehensive, and asked them naked them: ::...::::::::::::::::::::

"Where in the world are you men going?"

"We are going back out of this valley, and you and your comrades are wise in acing so too if either life of health is prized by you."

"Why what is the mutter "!""""""""Demanded gturring."
"What is the mutter you say!" said no of them" "We were goinghthe same way sas you are going, and went for about half a mile, and indeed sir we a were almost beyond our chances of coming back, for had we gone a little further, we cwould not be here to bring the news to you."

"put what did you see! What is it you encountered!" asked one of Sturrings follows

Followers. "When we were almost half a mile in this vailey, but that by good luck we happened to look before as and saw the dangers before we came to it?"

"But " said Starring impatienrtly" what have you seen. For the love of Mike epeak plainly, not in riddles."

"Seen, thy the fire is spreading north of the valley itself, the smokecoverhead it making it as dark as pitch, we heard also in that valley a continual howling and yelling as of many facitive animals and over the whole region hange the discouraging scenes and confucion brought on by the fire, in a word it is beyond measure dreadful being utterly without order. The fire is flanking the valley." "But" said Starring. I perciever not yet by what you have said and seen, but we must go through this way if we have to fight our way through the fire."

"Woll" said one of the men" be it thy own will, we will not choose it for ours." so they parted, and gtarring, his followers and all the rangers went n on their way. On the right of the valley there was a long deep and wide ravine. Again on h the opposite side there was a very large and dangerous quag of oily tur. The tar if it caught fire surely would smoke the valley out. The ravine run for miles and gtarring and his followers decided if there was immediate danger to seek shelter in the ditch and fight for their lives there. The pathway too between ravine and the tar quag was only about ten feet wide. It was quite narry wnarrow at some places , and also as the heat of the advancing conflagration was growing great greater and greater, Etarring became more and more worried, and even it began to grow so durk and smoky that when he sought in the darkness to see where he and his comp unions were going he and any others of them were in danger of either falling head first into the ravine or tip over into the mire into which if any one fulls and no one is around to help him he can find no bottm bottom. Thus he and his companions went on, and once in a while of o one of them would sigh bitterly, for besides the dungers ment ioned which they faced in the ever increasing darkness, the pathway in some places was so dark that very often when they lifted their foot to set forward they new not where or upon what they should set it nest. nextt. Dome places usar off scenes broke out as if a great number of mouths of hell suddenly appeared, and ever anon and anon the flame and smoke rose upward in such abundance, with clouds of sparks, and sheets of flame and hedious noises, that Sturring and all those who followed him were forced to Pray with all the power they could infuse in praying. One of the Rangors cried out loudly;;;;;;;

"Oh guared Heart of Josus I beseach Thee deliver us from unseenn perilss." Thus they went on a great while, yet still it seems as if flames would sear the patches of trees nearest to them and reach tward the adventuerers, also they heard strange delegal neigns and rushing sounds sammingly to and ire, so that "sometimes they feared a wind would come up that wouldet a would tear the forest to places and overshelm the whole region in a sea of flame in h which there would be no escape but the raying. These frightful lights was observed, and these dreadful nouses noises were heard by them for neveral miles or more altogether, and coming to a place where he thought he heard an extra rear of the conflagration coming tward him and the rest,, he shouted to them to halt, and then stopped and began to mase whether they all should seek the ravino new in the dark or go on .. Sometimes he was tempted to retrace his steps. Then again he thought he might be nalf way through the valley, he remembered also how he had already vanquished many a danger, and that the danger of going back might be tenfold more than to go forward, so he resolved to go on. Yet the rearing flames now showing themselves in a long rising clouds of shooted tongues seemed to come nearer, and nearer, but when they were come within a mile of them, they came no further but changed course and want in tward the heart of the forest. The heat it gave forth however was terrific.

The neise of the conflagration was so conformding that starring and all those .. with him were so confused that they did not know their own voice,, as any one c couds could have percieved. Just as they halted to watch the forward progress of the seas of flame and wendered where all the noises came from ...

.One of the Bangers who was behind him, stepped up softly to him and whipserings in his our suggested some plans to him. It was hard to make up his mind, for this situation which he met with was something never in his life before, even to think that it seemes as if the whole world was on fire and he and his followers were facing a hellish d scene and yet not participing in it, ,et could be haved helped it, he would not have doe it done it, but he had not the discretion to dare to go back, even though he did not know from whence the wings of the forst forest fires came.

Then they had all traveled in this fearsome and disconsolate o condition for about three hours,, they thought they neard the voice of some man going before them saving:

"Though I walk through The walley Of The hadow of Douth, I will fear no evil for Thou art with me. ". ". , . . .

They all then felt before chearful and that for these reasons, if there can be any. First because they gathered that so e one who could not us a guide and knew the dangerous valley, were going through this valley as well as themselves. Becondly for he and they percleved that even now god was with them, though in that dark and hellish dismal stae state, and why not thought hewith us though by reason of the impediment that attend this fire threatened valley, they cannot percieve :t?

Thirdly , for that they hoped (could they overtake them) to have more reinforcements reinforcements by and by (providing they were not enemies $0) so they went on, and shouted and called to those who they heard in front of them, but there was no unswer. By and by a bright glare rose in the oky turning the valley almost as bright as day, with the sudden light manesfesting itself, They all looked back to see why the glare, and what hazarde they had gone through in the dark. Evidently he and his followers saw by the help of the terrific glare more perfectly perfectly the large ravine that was one the one side of the narrow readway, and the big tar quag that was on the other, also how narrow the way was which lay between them both, and also he now saw, scenes as of the main entrance of the hell p pit, but all afar off, for the flames were not as near as at first supposed yet they were all revealed to him by the g light of the flames.

Yet sturring was much affected with his unusual deliverance from all the day dangers of the fire swept Imperial valley, which dangers though he and his companions feared them more before yet he and they saw the perils more clearly now, because the glaring lights of the conflugration made them more than ever reveal themselves to him, and by this time the distant flames was rising higher and higher, and the increasing lights was another mery mercy to the adventurers for though the first part of the Imperial valley was dangerous because of the near possible fact of the fire changing course and sweeping right on them, vet the other section of the valley with which he and his companions were yet to go through was far possible more in danger of the firecas the formation of the valley and its course at this section turned in such a direction that if there was the slightest slightest change in the direction of the wind, they'd never escape and they were far from the big gully or ravine by now. And also it was a long ago left eners by the retreating enemy who after the Evangeline St Clare horror left enurse, traps, gins, and note here, and filled so full of pits covered over with brush, usep holes, and se shelvings, that had it been dark, as it was when they want through the first part of it, had he had a thousand hundred men with him they would have been caught and injured badly or killed, and his trip would have to be abandoned.

Taking divantage of this fire glars they continued on cautiously and after two hours finally came to the end of the valley. Here they came upon bones and skelentons of men and animals, and mangled bodies of men, evidently some vict ims of a cutus roohe not found till now, probably of some party of soldiers that had gone rh this way formerly, and while Wal Walter Starring was musing what should be the remon, he aspied before him the results of some explosions by which they evidently had been killed. Not by this section the adventuerers went without danger, whereas they much wondered. Lots of mimals were flowing past ..

they could not tell themmelves what to think, especially because a mysterious, explosion a killed them. And there was no one in slight. It might be they had lain doud a few days only partly outen by wolves, and as for the horses, though one be yet a little alive they could not hardly move.

How as Starring and his followers continued on their way, they ascended another hill. Up the aloges they therefore went, the Rangers now remaining behind to do more work against the probable turn of the fire in this locality. Then they reached the summit they pay a young boy and girl scout going before them on horseback.

The it was no one would say riding with the girl scout, but Starring called aloud; " Stay and we will be your companions."

At that the boy good locked behind him, to whom Sterring cried again; "Stay , stay till t come to you."

"At that the boy enswered. "Come on, but hurry, for we have no time to weste, The fires are spreading b hind us."

At this Starring was somewhat moved, and he and his come companions putting to all their their strength, they did quickly catch up with the gir and boy scout,, but starring no . not taking good head to head fout, he suddenly stumbled and foll, and could not rise again untill one of the men came up to help him.....

Then they still a ntinued on their way with the two scouts, and then had some,. conversation,, of all things that had happened since first starting cut, and thus gtarring himself began; ;;;;;

"It gooms a wonder to be able to evertake two child account of your age cut herevin a dangerous fire threatened wildernesse, and as God has brought us tomethor, we can coni continuo on us companions in this so dangerous a path untill He sees fit to brings us through and into a sufer spot..."

"I had thought sir starring, that you are and your followers were out here and were sourching for you, but you did get the good start of us, wherefoe we were forced to mearch and search and come this much of the way alone. The Vivian Girls sent us to be your guides as we know the county well. Had we found you you would not have faced such troubles us you did."

"How long did you stay in general Vivious inco, before you were sent out to looked for ma!"!" ":!!"Asked Storring.

"As soon as they gave me the advice to go forth, for there was great talk presently ad after you were gone away that the whole country side would in a short time be one wast conflagration and as the Glandelinian camp in which they were working to secure the information they sent you for were destroyed, and they had to go, for their own safty, they set we. I'm Jonnie or Angeline lience, and the boy with me is Rudeliffe."

"What did the camps under Manley get struck by the fire. ?"

"Yos. Was a terrible disaster. But all of us oscaped. Violet and her sisters are again with general , ivien."

"Did everybody talk so about the ravages of the forest fires."!

"Yes. It is in every ones mouth. Especially the partl you might be the Violet and her sisters were greatly worried."

"Mut!And did no more of them but you come out to search for me!""

"Well, though there was as I said, a great talk thereabout, yet ; do not bink think any no but violet and her sisters firmly believed it at first. For in the heat of the discourse, I heard some of them speak of you and your desperate journey as a journey through the regions of hell, but wiclet and her sisters did believe and do still, that the whole countryeids will be swept away, by the worse forest fires on record, and therefore they sent me and the boyscout to look for you Instead of we finding you, you found us."

"Dear you hear of any talk whether general Vivians army was in the path of any fires or not. I heard the fire crossed at Sound pend and the armies were encamped somethers northeast of it?"

"Yes, but he escaped after a hard fight. But I am sure his army had a thrilling tim time of it. In his own thrilling escape general vivian was caught in some sort of a bog, having fallen in in his excitement, and though he got out himself he was covered with the mud. But he pulled his army through the danger zone. It was like a fight through the infernal regions."

"And what said many of the officers about it. "! asked starring. "They saythat it is probable that even Violet and her sisters did not know what they were doing when they sent you out on this long adventure, that the very ele ments may be greatly in derision, and that with the War torn states ten times worse than before you are bent on sucide in your mission//munin

"But why should every one be so set against my mission for iol t, and her sisyers Violet and her sisters, since it is the only hope ; believe for the winning of the

"Oh"they say" you are too venturesome for a general when others could have takon your place and you should havecremained with your command."

"Had you no talk with violet, or her sisters since the fire struck general Manlays camps."

As if to add to their trough troubles the night was now excepting excepting on and gray clouds which had overspread the s'y was changing to inky blackmost-put the sound of the distant buttle had stopped and the elight breeze of wind that had been blowing had wifted the smoke haze away and the little waves of the creek began te quiet down and not be quite so rough.

It was having for 'iolot and her sisters I think that the horses had re ran away in fright and taken the wagon with them or otherwise wholet and her sisters might mays been killed as a she, shell would have hit the wagon and exploded the ammunition benes in the wagon-Many little girls and hoys in the place of io let and her siters might have wapt and screamed or even given way to despair, but because delet and her sisters had encountered so many adventures and perils and come safty saftly through them it did not occur to them at all to be even the least bit afraid even when they were in a wagon loaded with boxes of boxbs and cartridges and even dynimate. The little girls were wet and uncomfortable it was true but after sighing once they managed to recalled some of their customary cheerfullyness and decided to wait patiently whatever their fate might be. By and by the clouds rolled away and showed a clearer sky overhead, with a large full silvery moon sining shining brightly and sweetly in the middle of a large rift in the clouds and little stars winked morrily at inlet and her sisters when the little girls looked their ways, he raft did not toos much any more now but was moving along gently and quietly so that the floor upon which the little girls stood or sat was not any more being awee swept by splashes of watr coming through the wagon side slaths. Seeing this and indeed being quite exhausted by the exsitement of the past two days the little girls decided among themselves that sleep and rest would be the best thing to restore their strength and the easinest way and they could pa pass the time. The floor of the raft was domp and the little girls were themselves wringing wat but fortunately the day and night had been warm and sultry and nei' neither of the little girls felt cold or chilly.

As there were too many of them to lay down they had to sit as comfortably as possible but nevertheless it was not long before any of them were fully fast asleep and floating down the stream as if on a large rocking cradle.

A most populing and still most strange noise anche first violet and her sisters afterwards, and liolet and Jannie who first amp anoke opened their eyes and found h that day had dawned, and the summer sun was shining brightly in a beautifully clear and blue sky-violet herself had been dreaming that she and her sisters were back in the christian encampeents again and playing with gentrude Angeline and her other friends and with the boyaccuts and even officers and senerals and at first as she herself rubbed the sleep from her eyes she really imagined she was there with her sisters still.

''Hello little goils. what ye doing here on the wagon

y' ish here was the strange sound of a still stranger voice again that had awakened solet and her sisters. urely it must be a man or a boy speaking, gut her wide open Eves first saw through the wagon clats still adhorring to the bott on the blue and green waves of the stream of water new calm and placed like it should be, and her thoughts flow back to the past night so full of danger and ruch discomfort. also after looking more carefully also began to remember or discover at least that she and her eisters were still f g fugitives of a past battle and now admift probably upon a strange and treacheriess river of tweel immense width for new they were not on any creek for the land on both sides was far away.

"I say little goils what ye doing here on the magon bottom?" Demanded the voice more firmly.

' hat's that. ' '?' 'Cried violet starting to her feet and looking at her sisters who was beginning to stir.

"hy I just disco ored you on this wagen betem floating on the river that's all. "Raplied a storn grim and manly votes but sharp and distinct and looking around her violet discovereda tall man standing upon the bottem seat of an immense river rowboat wearing a yellow coat and blue pants while a little protty bobbed haired boy was siting on the other end of the beat. "mear me" he exclaimed in great surprise "U" H we you been afloat on the river all night too. 191

Incourse not. newered the man still rowing tward the raft to get closer and yawning. " "Karly this morning I and this little son of mine were persued by rebels and escaped byour boat and while rowing down the river I discovered the wagon bottom floating tward us and wishing to see what was up discovered you on it with your little companions and strove for ten minutes to try and awaken you little girls. The ungon bottom was floating on a small sand bar and was tipping and so I had come with the purpose to take you off or tow you to shore for I knew if you little girls fell in the water while sound asleep you would surely be drowned. Indeed I nearly drowned myself and my little boy as it was inattempting to overcome the raft you are on and nearly captized h my boat. I never found y little children so wet in my life and even sound asleep. Are you not coldeto.

"Yes' agreed d violet as she shook Jennie and her other sisters' 'It was pretty wet for us all at least for a time you know."

aut do you feel more comfortable now! " Asked the man.

 ot very. The morning our bos of course helped to day my dress on it seems to have dolle to the dresson of my statershore but I feel better to since yesterday evening. We happened to be in this plight on nocmust of a fight and of two runnway horses aut what's to become of us t should like to know now affect on this hi unknown rivers f shot river is it ofretis

"It is the norma une "Said the noldiere" Put I'd like to know what is to become of us too. But neverthelose I'm going to tou you nehore an this raft of a wagon bottom won't float wich langer Im sure-nut tell me how does it happen t hat pretty little girls like you so young and delicate looking happen to be able to pass through such a night like this without even being afraid. You don't seem to show even the slightest fear . 'I expected to see you cry and serem as a on as you would wake up.

"my as for that 'Anomored Jennie herself r thoughtfully as she slowly aw arose''I have gone through one thralling adventure after another with my sisters and never knew that there was anything to be afraid of especially that I can remember except sin. But when you asked my sister folet a question a minute ago when you awake us it seemed the most natural thing to answer you. o we spoke and we seem to keep on feeling no fear just as you mentioned to her a moment ago.Strange isn't it. '!

'yery' Replied wielet he herselff. 'If we were not going through all our adventures in this land of galverinta where there is no much trouble going on I or my sisters would not think it so q queer, because many of us Angelinians have no fear whatever the that we can remember, but also out here in this hig river we must be a long way off from Julio Callio by this time IBm sure."

'you is it that you suffered from a runwa runaway and got in this condition?' Asked the man tying the rope to the raft from his boat and looking anxiously and lovingly at the little girls. 'bo I speak properly without too much curiousity in your judgement. "!

"Yes. 'Said folet while her sisters looked on. 'you do very well, for a new found friend." And she told him all about their experience of the in evening and might before and confered to him who they were . He was fully actonished at being confronted abou by the Avian airls who he happened to have heard about and he said joviously;

"I'm glad indeed to know that I'm in the presence of the daughters of Governor Coneral "Ivian and that I can atleast be of some service to them. "He continued with a walute of respect and in a confidental tore. "Because if one is going to have further adventures like I expect it is best to have it in company and o not onlyons or two. This little boy is my son andmany have often said that my son and my daughter were quite perfect in ways and manners and now it is a cof emafort to know that I have come within contact with the brave Heroines of Angelinia at last. A thing I prayed for for a long time and finally gor got answered.

'not p p ying any attention to his pa praise violet remarked; "I'm beginning to get hungry and probably so are my sisters. It's breakfast time but there is to be no breakfast for us yet. "

"You may have some of my pro iprovisions I have in my wheat." Said the man-"We have enough for a while and I would not like to see you little goils g go

"Don't you want tosaye it unless untill you need it? 'Asked the little girls in surprise. 'We can wait for a while. We are hungry but not starving as we were only one night on this things "

"no indeed." reward the rematilf you little goils are hungry you should ent-I never care to lot any of my friends go bungry unless I have nothing myself and then it cant be helped. Theore is thirtsen because of food in my beat which I secured from the wheeler "landelinian encompanies and its a lucky mamber for us since I found you here on the wagon bottom. go you may no well take away your hunger and eat something in one of these boxes.

"Oh I or my misters could not possibly eat it untill we get ashore. "Exclaimed Joice. "I'm much obliged for your kindress to us and will wait if you don't mind."

"'nen't mention it my dear little goile.'Arowared the man calmly and began rowing with all his speed while his little boy and girl who also appeared from under a seat relooked at the little girls with great admiration and curiousity. per a moment field and her ever her sisters at a stood looking out over the the wide expanse of water. She and her sisters were still thinking of the food bems so presently inlet again asked.

''Why did you bring all those provisions on one boat when you dont expect to remain on the water very long."

"It is not all satables." Replied the man. "Only two boxes are food. The others have ammunition, that is bullets. It has always been my pride to do something for my f country and so has it been for by boy and girl here and so I thought I would need it in ease I found some soldier refugees or escaped child slaves or other fugitives. I never feel like being happy or contented till my hopes are realised and without the chance of doing something for my country I I or my som and daughter would not be happy. The little girl is seven years old and the bey is ton. 'T

"'It is strange. "Said Bettie reflectively But as I'm not a soldier I samet expect to understand that, "In coursenot my little deare."

Then follst and even her sisters fell silent again if you please to mention. The man and his two children was some company, and a big of comfort too; but it was dreadfu llly lonsesse on the big river nevertheless.

After a very about time therein biseeff stood up and labed in several aircetions while his little daughter fairly perched upplymon the termest part of the beats rummy which was a little histor than the raft which was heing towns choroard. Violet and har staters having nothing also to do had been all satisfies down alone together upenthe bottom for nome mements panta

why we are not for away from land now. 'Exclaimed the little h girl herself looking atwher pap enroently.

"Labore? here is it little girl. "!Gried joice jumping up in great excitement and nearly trip ing o ver one of her sisters and tossing the raft almost dangercusly and onusing her sisters to marn her to be on reful-

''Over there a little way.' 'Anamored the boatmans daughter pointing her little finger in a certain direction. The we are going tward it now so that before long we ought to be on share again. "

"We are reaching the abore." Declared the man and by noon at least we might to find ourselves upon dry land again. '

*I shall like that but we have to be careful of enemies. 'Said Angeline with a little sigh for her fast and legs and also of those of her sistersmore still watted now and then by the river mater that came through the bottom of the raft.

"Bo whall we." "newered her eisters." here is nothing so miserable in the world than to have feet and legs wat. "

he river shore which they seemed to be rapidly approaching since it arew more distinct every mimits was quite beautiful as viewed by the little girls on the floating and towed ungon bottom raft . Next to the western side of the river was a bo broad beach of white sand and even grave, gravel and distant houses and further back where forests and high foothills while beyond these a trip of different i kind of fir and pine and evergreen trees marked the edge of a malverinian forest. There were also many houses half in ruing to be seen but there was nowign of any christians or any one eles who might inhabit this part of the Calverinia region which was north of Vivian _ickeye

'I hope we shall be able to find screening to eat and then the man came save his little provisions. "Baid Jennie looking a engarly at the pretty river beach tward w which they were being towed. 'It is long pant breakfast time

"I'm a trifle hungry myself. 'Declared the man himself.

"why don't you he ent what you have in your box then?" Asked he his own child. "No I cannot stop to out now." Uricothe man impatiently. "I do not want to stop rowing now or the current or of the river wi 11 pull us out again.  1 I beg your pardon air, Isa sure Hr, Mr, by the name may I inquire your name sirf  Asked the little girl.

"My name is hiller gauter. 'Raid the man semewhat gruffly.

* hat differences does that make little goil. "

* You are an Angelinian are you not? "

'iog a In course I am.' But when I first came into the world my mother gave me that name for no one could tell where whether I was going to be a boyor girl so my parents after I was born called me whilliam and many of my friends made a pet of me because I was the only real Angelinian without an Angelinian name. hen r grew up nd when I found that i I did not care to quarrel or fight with any one as all boys usually do, and girls too, my paprents did not think it probable to hom change my name and every creature now know me as whilliams.qo hilliams I have always been called and whilliams is my mame.'

a ''nut it is certainly all wrong you know.' Declared joing very earnestly earnestly and if you certainly don 't mind I shall eall you u only gauter. It sounds better for an Angelinian you see. "

''Oh T dont mind it in the least.''Returned the man as they were now close to the shore. "It does not matter at all what you call me so long as I know the name means you are talking to me.''
!'Very well-Sauter. My name is joinsy vivian and these are my sisters - just ivian girls to my friends and Miss ivian to strangers. You may sall us by our first manes if you like We are now getting very near to the shore. no you s uppose it is too deep for us girls to wade the restof the way or swim to the shore. We

''Whit a few minutes longer. ''As Advised the man. I don't 1 like to see you wet o your clothes again and the sunshine is warm and pleasant, and also we are surely not in any hurry whatver.

''gut our feet are all wet and soggy.''Said the little girl''ns so are those of my sisters. "Our dresses are dry enough to be sure but we don't feel right untill we

who little ivian girls weited however as the man add advised and before long the boat had reflehed the shore and the man and two children got out and grabbing the rope started h uling the wagon bottom as near to them as possible and soon the pec peculiar raft grated gently on dry land entirely and the dangerous river trip was entirely o ver for the time bwing. It did not take the fugitives long to reach the river shore you may be sures, the little girls got off the raft at once and soom all were safe ashore dfa drawing off their shoes and stockings and spreading them upon the sun warmed stones to drye hen they sat down and watched the two other children as the man went off to see where he could place them all, the two children digging sway with thehr hands in the sand and gravel which they scratched up and started making m sand pies out of.

Trotting almost a mile from the shore of the river but still walking along the waters edge so as not to be too far from the river the little bey whomscompained his father and sister and the vivian firls came to a flat stretch of land covered with velvety grass and the boy looking down a saw a handberechief lying there. He pisked it up and saw that the cloth had some queer letters or emprayings upon it just as one would r write a code upon a piece of paper.

"that does it easy!"He asked Jennie who be came up to and who was tretting along mi with her sisters in a rather dignified fashion.

"'You surely ought to know.' he answered pleadingly.

Over some of the furtheat branches were blankets hing so heav y that the branches bent underreath their weight. one of the hig barragks buildings were dark brown in color, these still larger were of a dull tin color, but the others were if or seemed to be ecated with bright tin that shows and glistened beautifully in the rays of sunshine that touched them. wiolet and her sisters were delighted, and even the man who had rowed them to shore acknowledged he was delighted and surprised but cautioned them to be careful as he knee from the shape and color of the tents it was a rebel encampment of some sorts yearing the house however the party finding it empty went in and the little girls recieved the nicest of the lunch boxes from the man and then they sat down on the chairs found in the row room and eagerly opened the boxes. Inside they found nicely wrapped in paper and cloth, han ham sandwitches, pieces of case, of three flavors, picks pickles pie, cream and swiss cheese and ap apples and or m oranges. every box cont i contained exactly the same but the little girls found the food very delicious and they ate every bit of the luncheion in the bexes violet and her olsters furned quickly around and so did the others, and saw coming out of a path that led from between a mass of pine trees tward the road the most peculiar ly dressed or uniformed landelinian their eyes had ever beheld. It had almost the form of a tall ghost on horseback which was robed in a similar way, except that the horse galloped at a furious speed instead of troddytrotted raising a cloud of dust, and the horses legs were covered the same as the mans legs were all in mist gray color giving them both the appearance of a gray man and horse p phantom at the same time. Yet really it was no ghost horse and man that. the party of adventures really beheld or discovered for the persons sold shoulders was covered with the most gorgonisly embroidered designs of many colors that could be imagined and he wore over a fierce looking gray hood a large hat more like the form of a girls sailor hat with two big ribbons floating from the side of it, the hat being worn or perched h jountily upon the side of his head. But he differed from other Cargovlians in this respect that instead of having the En Klun glans designs on the front of his robe on the chest there was designed two pictures of spinning wheels, under which was a skul and eross bones and other rounded wheels. He had a terrifically 'eng cabre uprisced and his horse was galloping swiftly over the level ground. Afterwards wholet and her saleters found when some of them peopples had been captured that these odd wheel designs were of the same description as of other gland linians captured later on and they also learned that Gargoylians of this kind are no fiercer than the others but have the swiftest horses ever known. ut having not seen any real glandelinians like t have at close quarters before the little girls when they first caught night of the first individual of a race of Gargoylians

'It is only some soldier wh no head must beamage out of copper to have allowed himself to be taken prec prisoner so easily. ' ont imied Jennie looking in more closer so that she could examine the man more better .

"'Once' 'Soid violet' I known a soldier a man who served in the army form over two years without being wounded or captured once whose name was general ick hopper. But though he went through many battles and experiences he is still alive are are, cause he seemed to have been born with a charmed life, and got his experiences a little at a time---first spying on the foe as we do, and then being a flag bearer, and then for hisbravery getting the commission of a general, for the reason he had went through many accidents during his experiences and though he had done things in a very careless manner and caused us to go through the dangerous trouble to resous him he never got injured once. **

'Oh' anid the little boy, with a sniff as if he did not believe the story she told him.

big eyes fill of pity and curiousity at the same time 'Is not like him at all, and I wonder how he ome to be left this way for, and why it was that the landelinians may have looked him up and bound him up in this queer p,ace. "hat is a mystory to us indeed," Remarked the little boy more politely. wielet alone while her sisters remained outside stopped inside the cave to get a more better view of the man and to have arrange a way to release him and after he was released and helpled to his fact and unbound, folet discovered in his pockets a poculiarly printed eard that she placed inside her waist, and which was suspended at the back of his mask and the fourth possibly as thing that was suspended from a small copper tag at the base back of his time to be a first part of the last the base of his time.

After looking over his carefully the little girls can that the man was only min evivor of between another getting on the erope of the parties are the evivor in the contract of the contra as soon as possible ... dolet returned to the path where the light was better and sat down upon a large slab of rook to read the printing on the peculiar card..  "but does it say? But as the wounded man tried to enter after them, the guard presented his misket and orded;

''you are not permitted to man until resieved.''
''go on with yourself.''' storted the soldier drawing back in anger and fineering his pistol with the army not in the sling ready for action. 'Have you not any better mannerathen that. noss not the card say I m admitted too. "

''Oh but + did not remember that. "Ind are you really wounded or pplaying wounded!" en quired the guard who to tell the truth was really suspicious of the whole party. ''Can't you see for yourself without asking foolish questions.'' supped the soldier. "SUrop that rifle and get out of the doorway so that I may enter with my friends. KI'm to go, on that mission too. "

he general won't like it the way you appear. 'Smid the guard hesitating. ''I don't care whether he likes it or not in I go. 'Replied the soldier, and drawing his pistol he simed it at the guard with a wicked look in his eyes. ...he soldier guard at once ducked ax aside and the soldier reached violat and her sisters in cafty.

"'Very well' aighed the guard mournfully 'If you are it in serious trouble because of this chatimate soldier don't blame me for it. I know who you are, and do not favor harm coming to you but you are upying on general Manley and if he recog name of you good day. It is not safe to anny his excense excellency with your spying trips."

'ITell his excellency we are waiting if you will please?' 'riolet requested with utmost diginity." he we wounded man in our friend and will go wherever we go."

"whey are all all good looking." the guard replied.

'Are the men strong and and of good built?' nont inued the general looking still more anxious and suspicious as he knew he did not send or ask for any one. 'That I-eaunot say your Excilency. Excellency, gut they all seem to be very bright, will your Gran Gracious Excellency see them now!'

"Oh I may as well Gallmanna. But I do not trust the visitors and if the visitors have any claim to being real christians in disguise. I must take care that they don'T

"'Your iden may be exceedingly excellent but no one ha can defeat them.''Answered the guard with another low bow-

'Again Manley looked anxious and hegitated for a moment-then he said; Help me to put everything away, and quick before we admit them."
go the guard assisted Manley to collect everything together on the table, and then then they slowly walked across the polished floor to the cabinetonow y must explain to the reader if he don't mind that general Manley had besides the maps, plans and important papers thirty seven geographies of all sizes, nut of course that day he had been looking through only one of them, because he had nothing so very important to do that time. Those books and latters, maps , and impo important papers were kept in his subinet, which masin what had been a beautiful libary that lay just between a dining room and a bedroom. To make things more carefully arranges he had placed each bookand other articles in a seperate cabinet lined with velvet. he cabinets ran entirely all along the sid: side wall and had elaborately carved doors with golden numbers on the outside and jewelled d orknobs on them. He hassade a grand capture for his victory at Julio Callio battle indeed. when the general had gotten out of her hed him hed that same morning after captur ing the place the day before he had went to the cabinets, i opened one of the velvet lined supportes and finding how they were had placed his most important papers and so on in them. hen by the aid of some of his officers he had put in all the geographies he had also captured and afterwards called all his generals for a council that day. Despite his highest commission he always were almost a r privates uniform with only his decorations and shoulder straps to show who he was. Despite hi his highest com ission and being the chief general of all, and despite his cruelty and wickedness there was no pride in general M n Manley, he was as good tonll his soldiers as if they were himself but he had no use for christians or those s' who p opposed him, and he had no interest in wearing re rich generale uniforms as many of his lo west officers even had one. Of course the thirty four or five reographies were in great variaty no two alike but all being of exceedingly value and loveliness. here were geographies so simple that children could study them, there were others more like schook geographies, and of other kinds which gave everything the world has in detail and pictures and maps. The maps many of them were of golden co, or or rich authurn bue, gray, basel, and red but there were on small maps among ang an any of the books, and all the illustrations were bright and landsome in colors representing all tr types of co color and beauty and the landscapes in the maps were all of assorted sizes and shapes. He had found one ket key that unlocked all of the cupboards, containing all his treasures which he intended to use here as long as he remained, a curious key carved from a blood colored rubis or stone—and this was fastened to it his key ring which he always carried with him, hen his orderly and the guard had helpled the general to the cabinet he unlocked the door of one of them with his key and after handing the plans and maps to the orderly he put in the geography in to it and then the rest w re place placed on top. There was only one trouble with general Manley that made any one really dread him, the temper that he had, which when he was aroused, was fivry, hares harsh and haughty in the extreme and wicked as he really was it often even led him to do and co cognit things and deeds which he heartily regretted when he came to realize it. Ut he did not remember any of his uglioness this day and when to meet his guests in the recoption room with a feeling of cortainty that he would ap surprise them with his at lye of uniform. However he was greatly disappointed to really find that his visitors were merely small girls in long dresses, a wounded man with arm in allng, anda civilianwith a boy and girl.

"Oh' gaid the general slightly lifting his noise like a young weman for he had the face of a sleay." I thought semesone of great importance had a lled to see mes you are not but the base spice the vivian girls who have dared to defy me by entering my domains because there are nosoldiers in this part of the encampment. "And because of this you think you have me at your powers."

"Then you were right general Manley." Declaired inlet. "we are a good deal of importance indeed, and when we have you at our mercy some day we will let you know how it is to make us suffer as you did for all the praying we did for your conversion. As for the rest f of it;;---'

"'Stopment op. ''Commanded the general with an angry flash of his fierce eyes."
How dare you amnoy me with such somesless chatter. Get out of my lines at once or ISLI place you under arrest. ...

"Why you horrid insurgent. 'Said Joice who was not accustomed to being streated so rudely.'' o you think you can frighten us after all we have goin gone through.'' he general looked at her more closely and realized what they really were. 'Tell me' He resumed angrily but with an anxious tome. 'Are you going to try and force me to give up my plans to you?'

"Bettor thanthat Insurgent Manley. 'Said Jeise.' I came to make you prisomer."
"Huh ''gried the general scornfully. ''you vivian irls are foolish children to try such a thing and yet I cannot understand how you have the merve to try ite this time since there are no soldiers to oppose you."

Yolet and her sisters were so indignant that for a moment none of the little girls could find a single word to reply. But the they rose from their chairs and were about to draw their gums when the general scanning their faces and percieving such a move about to be made stopped her by quickly drawing his own gun and saying fiscosly; "Idome over hear mearer to me you dodgasted Federal spies."

violet and her sisters seeing themselves covered by the rebel general, saw that being sus surprised as they were it was useless to resist just now so without a thought of fear they obeyed and stood before the haughty and angry Glandelinian general, while with a fierce s i smile he examined their own weapons with exceful attention.

"Your weapons are rather attractive to re and I would like to have them for my cane"He said presently." Your weapons of course are ret at all beautiful, you yederals may underscand but they have a certain syl style of appearance that predict they are better guns than the one I have. So I believe I'll relieve you of your weapons."

"Well I believe you will not." Exclaimed violot. "You have us covered but that will not make us give up anything even though you may shoot us onthe spot." "It will do you no good whatever to refuse my request. ""Ontinued the general" por I need your weapons for my one use, and no no matter where I be my word is law whether my army is near or not. I never have cared for old weapons with me . will have in my hand is little worm. If you will exam exchange weapons with me . will do as I said before allow you all to go without being molested."
"I don't know anything about you old weapons and other gure and neither do we want to other. 'Said Catherine firmly.' We are not used to giving up our weapons to ink insurgents so we will just keep our own weapons.'"

''.ou refuse me you fools.'' ried the general with a fierce from from.''

''.ou refuse me you fools.'' ried the general with a fierce fromm frown.''
''On Of course we do.''was the sudden reply.

'hen' 'gaid general Manley''I shall have you looked up in one of my private romes untill I decide to have you turned over to the proper surtherities to be held for investigation as spies. he phen turning to his orderly he said; 'call twenty mens'

The orderly obeyed and at once a captian and twenty men in bright gray uniforms entered the room and saluted the general in a very grave fashione.

'Seise those spins and christian dogs and carry them to my private room and lock them up immediately.''Gried the general pointing to violet and her sisters.

'To hear the command is to obey it your excellency.' "Enswered the big op epait captian, and ave advanced formand to so ise the little girls by the arms but the little girls suddenly opened fire wounding six of them while the citizen at the same moment raised a chair and pounded it so forcibly against t 3 the captians head that the i big officer sat down upon the hard cloor with a sudden bump with a fractured shull while the surviving soldiers looked both dazed, and 'l'Help' the others shouted, and some of them sprang to assist their commades. here was now great excitement for the mement and the man had knocked down eight more of them who were spranding in every direction upon the floor, when suddenly one of the rebels managed to jump in behind and suddenly soized his arms with the chair uprriged for another blow and help him parfectly motions notionless.

"hoot him quick." Ho called to wielet. " hoot him quick."

Bho drew her gun again to chey but then to avoid being captured by the "landelinians a she and her cisters and the two other children managed to dash into another room and at the moment other rebels had grabbed hold of the wounded man and he also also was helplans to follow them to escape.

''This is too had.''Baid the wounded ane.'The poor vivian irls ought to have kept on shooting untill all were down.''

"We'll it on can't be helpled now 'Said violet with a sigh.' We are out of arrunition and cauld not do it."

''will you exchange weapons with me now you foole?'Demanded the general.
''He indeed we will not.''Gried the little girls.''mhen Isli lock you in the room
''He said and alcoding the door shat he put in a key and looked them securely within before they could make a rush for the door. mhe soldiers in the meantime took the two men elsewhere.

"The other generals wil think I have some body of importance now" Said the general with a one enser. "go it won t matter in the least, and as my army is moving already I'll leave them there to try and escape of their own accord, and desert them and the house entirely. The christian armics are coming under some general and r must take my deportant books, bapers and goographies and get out "cuick."

my deportant books, papers and goographies and get out rquick."

"hat shall we do with the two men prisoners." Asked the captian, who had just thought of thems."

"Put them in another rok room as we cannot be bothered with them in our retreate."

answered the general. "It is goneentinian Aronburgs army coming and with my army dwindled, badly by my losses in the recent battle I cannot meet him now."

"''he situation looks rather tough your excellency. 'gaid the op ep captian rather doubtfully.'

"The situation is a base slander for us indeed." Said Manley. "But the christian dogs will find that the breed of men I came from are exceedingly dangerous when a remand."

"hen "faid the a captian y will order my troops to move on, and we may as well lave the prisoners here to either be rescued or escaped as they will. I'll leave one man to guard them though so if they escape they will not attempt to follow me and get into my lines again."

The guard himself the was left behind brought senst hing to eat to miolet and her otherculature and the other prisoners the most they had to eat however being bread and black coffee and a little milk and all the poor prisoners had to sleep upon in the morning or night following I man was the hard stone floor with a single pillow for each and only thin coverlets. In the morning the little girls werethe first to be up and liolet herself lenned out of thewindow of her prison in the tower to see if there was any certain way to escape from the prison. he room of gibeir prison was not so very high as usually but nevertheless it was nearly two hundred feet from abvo above the ground nearly compared with the height of the highest huili building in chicago and it gave them a g od vie view of the surr surrounding country. mo the west and even eastand also north they saw something like a distant forest, with a great expanse of shining silvery like river of water beyond, it, (Probably the "orma nun) and other landscapes br beyond that if you please, here was even a dark speck upon the shore of the river that they thought might be the old ragon bottom in which they had arived in the silgular fashion to the nearest portion of gulio gallio or givian mickey. hen she looked first to the straight north, and saw a deep but narrow ravine 17ing between two hilly sections of the country and a third hill much higher than the others the that shut off the ra i ravine from there. In that location dense masses of smoke rolled but th the little girl did not pay any attention to thatat all. gtraight westward the artile land of gyna gtate of Calverinia and early ended a little way from the building like palace and the pretty little givian girgirl who was Jennie could see miles and miles if of seemingly familiar encompments mist ly all of gray, white, red, o pur, ple and blue tents of all sis sixes, with buts and rows of black tents which stretched further than her eyes could reach. he thought sure she had never seen it there before. It mis must be that this encampment, she thought with much interest that alone can separate her andher sisters from the wonderful christian encampments, and she then remembered sorrowfully that she had been once told already that no one who are di ristians or galverinians siding with Aniel Angelinia again t the Recollion had been ever able to cross the dangerous section of julio callio or ivian wickey, not even themselves now. he rad once of the voc books called the Ox Book or volumes and had reach much about little orothy gale and her adventures and als almost wished she was her instead of herself for norothys experiences and adventures were tame compared to hers and her sisters. and the region she and her sisters were now in was enturely worse than the nA g pangerous desert in the Oz Books, or M re mysterious than the worse or most peculiar lands in the country of Oz or elsewhere in the Oz Rooks, worse them even the Nones Nomes or the platheads them slves. he read that in the first book a cyclone had carried little porothy across the doddly sands of Oz, and a mi magical pair of silver slippors had carried little porothy back again. The almost now wished that she and her sisters had either a vyolope or apair of such slippers for each to assist them escape the dangerous region of livian vickey, for to her she believed just now the condition of her and her sisterswap and indeed, he know only the rebel enchian have tents ofall various colors, he Angelinian tents are Kaki Kahki color. The little girl realised he she has and her sisters had beel lookedup in this 1 pl ce by the most disa disagreeable general of all the landelinians who insisted she and her sisters should give up their pretty little revolvers for the ones Manley had which the 1 i tle girls had no use of, and which might not be any good at all.

Really just now there seemed no hope of help for the little girls or their friends for there was no e ristian army in sight, and to escape cut of the place was impossible. Thoughtfully and sadly she gazed me t most wintfully from the narrow window On all the I miscapes note living thing was stirring, and the distant encappeants which probably was Manleys no one could be seen except moving objects and it looked as if the tents were now going down with the greatest hasto whatever and the volumes of smoke clouds was growing long larger andnearer every moment.

'Whit though ploase dearreader. Curely senething was stirring on the far eastwr engtorn Januaral Januarapa-semething her over had not observed at first. At first it seemed like along and large aloud of dust, and at t ines seemed like to the little girl to make out what it really was. A broad column of horsemon mester menaterilously long seemed like something unrolling itself over the ground, while simultaneously advancing across the fields and ot her landanonpos was a wonderful and seemingly never endless procession of men, in purple, infantry, artillory and other horsemen, long seemingly endless trains of ba ggago vagons, automol automobiles, trun rtruks, and other things that made the little girl open her eyes in amasoment as she gazed . wirst came the magnificent cavarly, while elsewhere crossing other vales or through came came long processions of monatoriously great guns drawn by great teams of horses, shoulder to ghoulder and trotting along as gracefully as a well matched team pulling a wafen. nd right riding in front of the whole wast column was a beautiful little girl, clothed in purple robes, and wearing a beautiful purple bonnet upon her dainty hond. she held inone hand the reins that guarded her horse and in the other a small banner which a small design which seperated at t he top into something like two prongs, the prongs being completely t tipped by the strange letters

I'h ghat in the world could it be?' he wonderede Libra gradual'y but in a brief space of time, nevertheless, the vision drew mear exough

"O" and R" made of bright red color-she realized she had a contured robel flag which mightfied the robel states with the two letters, Overinia, a and programminembe girl who was very beautiful both in form and fentures goomed only a trifle older than her older minter voice but you no .. more larger than wielet herself and at once the little prisoner and ivian irl in the strange tower guessed that the levely go girl riding the hores far in advance of the immense advancing christian army must be her friend Jennie urmer of whom she and her sisters had so lately become acquainted with. whe best friend of her and her misters and Gertrade Angeline. pollowing close behind the little girl Jennie naw her old friend general Jack Evans himself riding calmly astrice his own grand and magnificent black horse which prac pranced and trotted as naturally as the best race chorse, on the hars dones, and then to her joy and numprise, c me general lick ghopper, Hanson lyian her uncle and also general Robert ivian her father, and another christian general with a funny funnel shaped hat tipped carelessly ver his left ear, his gleaming sabre over his right shouder shoulder, and his chest full of religious medals sparkling as brightly as it had ever done in the old days when she first knew him for it was general Jacob Balawin himself. He and all the Controls were on horseback it being a company of thirteen mindred generals and her officers at the front, of whom some were lean, stout and fat, some short and tall but all were draressed in handsome uniforms in various designs, and of p mirple or lavendar color but the horses were decore decorated in clothing of various designs and colors no two being alike in any respect. o on wed wonder the rebel encomponents were undid. he enemy saw the advance of the christian army and was rer retreating for better ground as it was general Hansons advance and attempt again to help capture julio Callio and other sections of Vivian lokey. chind the generals came a perfect rolling tid tidal wave of infantry and yet long as the procession was there seemed between them ground enough for other columns to pass through and walk upon. Jennis knew at once it was the advance of general mannons army and her heart beat high with hope and joy as sheerealized she and her sisters were soon to be resoued and allowed once more to greet her dearly beloved friends of the Angelinian armies, and Gertrude Angeline and her other girl and also boyscout friends, the generals and her father and uncle and Evans. Indeed she felt as good as rescued as soon as she rego recognized all those in the procession, for she well know the courage and loyalty of all the her good old friends and girl comrades and also believed that any others who came from this marvelious christian army, ''mho flower of Angelinia (('' would prove to be pleasant and reliable acquanitioness. Jennie at once awoke her friends and notifed her sinters and all were soon provided by thaother windows looking at the scene below them.

As soon as the are necreat column had crossed the Evan landscape and all the procession from the beautifully and dainty Certrude Angeline and Jennie murmer to the whole column of soldiers had changed direction a little, and the foremost had renched the grassy m mendwos mendows of the Calverinian country of the palan palace there was heard sharp orders and the whole column was graudil gradually halting, the foremost column mostly the many christian prevals turned tward the handsome building, and rode haughtily andin a most dignified manner u i nto the broadroad broad roadway leading up to the pl palace, while all the prisoners still gazed from their tower windows in eager joy and excitement.

While the rest not changing their direction of revenent had halted, the column of generals cale quite close to the front door of the palace, and then halted, the leading general being Hanson himself dismounting to approach the door. that he might demand entrance.

As the was not admitted, he ordered some of the soldiers to break it downh hey succeeded and many went in besides some of the officers. he little girls just above him could keep silent no longer.
'there we are friends, more we are uncle,'the little girls shouted in a shouse and as loudly on they conod. 'Ellero'n violet, and my sisters.''

''violet whe! ''Asked general Hannen Vivien looking upward.

"Violet _ivian and yo my minters, your nation of course."

Yetthe distance was to far up that the general could not make any out anything the little girls were saying and managed by means of making signs to tell them to drop a paper wrapped in a stone down so they could understand what the little girls were hollering about.

As soon as one of the little girls obeyed there was great excitement, and general manson shouted through a large trumpet which made a gr great moise heard why hello my little neiges. Tell me what in the whole name of Goodness Gracious are gou ivian irls dging up thereino you own the palace or did you capture it from the glandelininis?''' othing b just now.''Violet herself ealled down as lodu loudly as she could 'Hecause there is nothing whatever for us to do. Save usunole save us please."

"'Save you. From whom. here are no enemies in the buil building and you are quite safe now.' Replied the general. Two rebel guards were the only ones found in the buildingoandthey are prisoners. **

"gut we are prisoners in a room. We are a' pall looked in with our friends so that we can't get out of the tower itself. 'She pleaded.'

"That's all right. 'Said the general. ''you might have been worse off little girls if we had not come in time. Just consider the matter of our prompt arival. You are safe now and can't get sho shot, or out up or troddne down by a wheeler. But don't lean too far out or you will fall out. some folks would think themselves lucky to be up 5 herehaving such a big building a 11 to themselves."

"As long as you are here we don't mind it at all but we don't like the idea of being /o looked up in this tower without anything to eat. 'Declared the little girls real ini g that Hanson was tenning them. "And we want to get down from up here tomediately and see you and our friends and the two little girls with you. "

'Yery well you will.' Said the p great generalnodding. 'It shall be just as my little neigen say my brave little jvien "irls." he was it that looked u you up so

"The general in chief of the glandelinian armies, who is a horrid general."

she answered.
At this Jennie turser who had been listening carefully to the conversation, called tow lolet and her sisters from her horse sa asking;

" Wy did the general in chief look you up, my dear. pld you try to capture him and have the twbl tables turned on you. **

"It is that in one way but because I or my minters would not allow him to take our guns from us. "Exclaimed Jennie" It was out own fault in one way for during out our excitement we ran in the room, and he slammed the door in our face and locked it, and then left us all alone in the building and went for hinown command. "I'l don't blame you for refusing. "Exclaimed Jennie urmer promptly." We will find our way to the room at once and oblige your freedom immediately. ''Oh thank you very much.''Uni Gried Catherine who as soon as she heard the sweet voice of the girlish scout knew that she and her sisters would soon love to learn to love her dear y dearly. The little girl followed by Gertrude Angeline and a group of armed soldiers drove around to the third doorway of the wing, upon which the soldiers boldly proseeded to break down. As soon as the door w gave way the two girlscouts stepped into the hall, and made their way at once to the hallway followed by eighteen soldiers. he soldiers made a great noise and clatter which brought the other soldiers who had broke in front the front to the scene bearing two prisoners with them. he rebel prisoners were roused to great anger be this sudden turn of events and though captured and armed stood before them all, and seeing the slight and delicate form of the two little girls cried out; "How dare you and your dirty christian dogs enter general Manleys heacquarters unbidden just because our army retreated. If I or my comrade was not capture you two litt le devils I'd make you leave this pulace at once, or bind you and all you your soldiers in chains and irons and throw you into the pits of lime.

 rust then to their surprise and relief Gertrude Angeline and Jennie urmer, and the other soldiers re-entered the hallway, with , iolet and her sisters, followed closely by the wounded soldier, the boatman and his two children.
the first thing in turn lolet and her sisters did when they got outside the building was to rush into the embrace of their father and uncle and other generals whose handsome faces beamed with delight as they pressed their forms one after another to their bosoms honors. hen general Jack Evans enbraced then --very gently in their strong arms and Baldwins and some of the others also---very gently though, for they knew their strong robust arms might hurt the little girl herones if they squeezed too roughly. These ogreetings haveing been exg exchanged, wiolet took the bet from her pocket which she secretly took from Manly during the argument with him and led the followers to the cabinents and unlocked them all with the purpose of inter interducing the hooks and maps and papers Manley had concealed there, but while doing this they were greatly disappointed for Manley had taken everything with them. wevertheless it was useless to cry over suilt milk and so while the other generals were seeing to it the miniss would be intremched right where they were the little girls told of their experience and why they got locked up in the room. when they shook hands with some of the h the other generals and officers and thanked them all for p helping in their rescue.
                    ThenViclet herself asked;

'It is not general Evans to us it is Jack Evans and you are talking in a tone that shows you are angry, which is very undignified. 'Said violet reprovingly.' Evans rode up and dismounted and Jonnie called to Gertrude and her compainion;

" come here Certrude and Jonnie and show us our way to the front again for general Frams is here with a group of glandelinians as prisoners. " the two other girl heroines, came into the yard, and the soldiers who were not buisy just then silently watched the nine beautiful children, without however offering to approach or say anything, violet took Gertrude her friend by her hand, and

""Ho Oh Gertrude How dreadfull you look. You have lost a part of your dress, and one of your ribbons is nearly pulled off from your hair, and the side of your mack is be bleeding. " violet and her sisters sadly shook their heads.

'I don't approave of this dangerous buisness at all. 'ghe said on helping Gertrude along tward the planpalace for she limped a little. "

"I don't thinkthey are so dangerous when you know how to manage them. "Replied urmer herself. "It is some of the Angelinians who are to blame. They did not watch the prisoner as closely as they should have. 'General Hansonia's. 'Answered the soldier.. The ittle girls had spent most of the afternoon of that day talking with general mick hopper himself, and also some of the boyscouts they had managed to select to accompany them on their mission, and wick hopper related to the little girls a 'all that had taken place in his army or general Hansons army since the little girls had left it for t he few months. jolst and her sisters were much interested in the story of the heroism of Gertrude Angeline and her two girl sempanions, who had before the battle of palmarrinia saved a little child from being stelen by a rebel come company on he horseback. Gertrude Angeline did not know that she had really accomplished a grave not untill she had been informed of it by manyof the officers. Then it was also found that since the death of her parents and sister Annie Aronburg before the late part of the war that she was the only moice of general concentinian Aronburg, the general who was proving himself a perfect Mapoloom of Angolinia and who was entitled to even command in a higher commission but who did not want it. Gertrude Angeline and her companions had had many adventures, before she or they had regained general , iviaze armies, and via these they had been accommanded by soldiers of all kinds, and had once secured a wonderful squadron of splendid horses single handed and got away with them. , a the otheradventures boyscouts and even walter Starring, and some others had assisted assisted the little heroises, but john wans who commanded a division of Artillary men know nothing of Gertrudes experiences untill after she became the highest girl socut leader of the girlscouts. hen he journeyed from concentinian Aronhurgs army under which he had been corving to general Hausens army to see them, and succeeded though he encountered a countless number of perils on hisway, and on hearing that general Hanson wivian was go intending to me e another expedition against the besieged at malio Callio of or 'iving micheym and force the fall of that important point in calverinia he decided to join general vivians army

. hat a remarkable adventure to see you little birls again. 'Exclaimed the general as he held wielet in his come.

'I quite agree with you that it is. 'Replied wielet in a happy and pleasant voice. "rittle creatures like us have no buis buisness to have so many friends like thi this I guess as we all know but we cannot help it I suppose when we are so good and lob loving. nut nevertheless it was our heroism that did it, so we cannot be justly blamed."

"'Of course not." aid the general. "and you little girls seem to be bent on another adventure, and I hope your beyscouts who are going to accompany you areof some uso.

"Oh yes we will make them of some use alright." eturned Jennie also nestlinb in his arms." nd we never tire of adventure, never have to beafraid of anything, or care what we do as long as it f is for the good of our own cause and country."

'Are your companions or boyacouts intellenguit' askes the general.'
'I'm afraid they are note 'Said AAngeline.' ut it would be feelish just now to at I gues they know enough to obey us when so make o we will be pretty well satwaste mu h itellengence on the boys, when so many dends need to be performed.

That night violet and her nisters slept in pleasant beds in the champer next to that complet by geber general Hanson Vivian himself, and Gertrude Angeline and Jennie urmer and even Angeline, these choosed their own single rooms and slept as soundly in that position as did violet and her sisters who slept in twos in a single bedgut before daybreak every one of the little girls including the whole army was all awaks and stirring, and soon the adventurers were cating with the generals a good but hasty breakfast in the great dining room of the generals new headquarters at the head of a longtable, on something that looked like a raised platform, with the wivian mirls on the right hand, and their companions on the left-wielet sat next to general Jack Eva schimself so that she might have the chance to ask his advise advice about the proposed journey while she and her sisters ate. Lower down the long table were twenty eight of the boyscouts, and at the end of the room was a solitary officer eating his soup while pacing up and down and doing some thinking. It did not take them long to finish the breakfast meal, and then the whole p party were mounted on the horses brought u brought up for them. and the party was soon ready to start for the christian army under general Francis Hansonia.

The roadway they went upon lead for a long time through e pratty country scene, and the past a long stretch of farm lands and even large picnic groves and grounds that was very inviting to the whole party, ut the procession continued to steadily advance for a mile or so untill Gertrude Angeline cried as in an abrupt and al ost commanding manner that surprised them

''Halt. Halt.''

Violet and her sisters stopped their horses so suddenly that the horses of those riding on behind nearly ran into them, and if they had not immediately stopped their horses they would have either been dismounted and tunbled over one another. Immediately the little girls and the rest of the party saw some one who appeared to be a strange a child or boy, stuggle from a clumb of at black berry bushes. run across the road and disappear into a clump of bushes, and wat what startled them all was that he was a by boyscout of the glandelinians, and it looked as if he was Gerald starring.

" what was the matter. " galled Angeline Richeewho alonched net seen him. "'Why we have seen a rebe, rebel boysocut, that's all. 'Replied violet.
''A lone rebel bo sboyscout. 'Repeated Angeline Fichee, in great astonishment. 'Yyes we saw him leap from the blz black berry patch younder and leap into the bushes across the road, and it looks quite suspicious. "nut do you think a foolish landelinian boyscout is going to cause this entire cavalends which is bound to general Hansons's array is going to stand stilland cower lime like frightened furry kittens before a puppy dogs 'Enquired Jounie urmer earnest lye

"hat else can we do!' "aked Angelinia Aromburg.' This I believe dangerous to proceed in that direction for there may be "landelinians or more rebel boyscouts hiding im ambieh, and it would only mean capture to proceed. "

'Then it certaily must be something peculiar. 'gold Jennie murmer impetiently

"We are going to proceed."

""no, no. "Exclaimed one of the boyscouts who had or who was accompanying the party. 'If we go on just now we might be shot down or captured as she says.' "'mhat's nonsence.''gaid Angeline piches.''If we are to be kent back for a mere glandelinian boycout then I'm going to go back. Iwon't go along with a lot of fraidy cats , Ism sure. '

go they proceeded onward slowly but contiously all having their guns drawn, but the coke in the faces of the boys and even some of the soldiers showed they were afred of a very serious adventure indeed. All of them even the little girls were restless, but nevertheless the girls alone were anxious to proceed at any coste In a few inutes they had passed the so called bushes where they had seen the boy pass and encountered no one.

suddenly they heard a strange noise semething like a hem makes. 'Kut, kut, kut ha-daw-kutt. ' mhis was repeated five times.

' what is bithat hen doing ! i singing her lay or something! 'Asked one of the sco soldiers. 11 i orward every one of you and never mind the noise.  shouted Jennie _urmer wavung her arm and he procession started just as violet had drew her own revolvers and looked carefully in the direction of the hens sound.

"Is not any one going to get that hens egg." Gried one of the boys in great

''If you go after that egg you will get something olse.''asid Angeline ichee tossing her gelden har with an anxious face. It is not a hem but the rebel boyscout making the call of one to summon his assistance. We are being watched by hidden enemies. Keep your guns ready w for we may have excitement.  The strangecaveleade having moved onward rapidly and cautiously, was then far in advance of ielet and her sisters but it did not take them long to catch up with the rest of them and present ly the boyscouts themselves we were riding in their acquistomed place behind the wivia Vivian girls.

hat shall werdo if the Glandelinian boyscouts foolow us! "He One of the boys asked Angeline ichee.

''I do not know as yet. 'the girl heroine answered. 'Perhaps we may let them try it, and surprise them when they do not tha think we are being followed. when we'll make them prisoners and bring them to the christian lines...

"It would not be worth the time to waste to take them insurgent lads to the christian lines under Hansonia. 'Romarked violet.', nd to have with us , those boys are more dangerous than ten bushels of bun bushle beed bees set upon us. If they follow us all we need to do is to trick them and get off that's all.'

'we they would not even be worth our company. 'Said Angeline nichee tossing up her nose. 'That lad Gerald Starring have been very mean to you little vivian "irls of late, late, and they should know there is no reason to it that I know of. If they follow us I would for one like to let them know how good a shot I am though a little girl. I have a good derringer in my skirt belt."

pley had now reached a large and beautiful valley a v valley of many miles in width that lay between two beautifully tree covered range of hills which islet and her sisters had seen from the window of the tower. At the far end of the valley they could see something like a beautiful lake which blocked the valley in that direction and was balieved to be the northern edge of the boundary of the State of Ozwana. They believed it must be beyond this range of beautiful hills that general Hansonia's army was said to be but it surely would be some long time before they could recach that army as the valley they saw was nearly thirty eight miles broad. one pl ces the path had become a little rocky, and was diffi cult for the horses to trod upon, and at one side they saw a small crecive erevice , but which to their surpruse surprise was too wide for their horses to leap over-yo go some of the moldiers quickly made a small bridge out of a fallen tree which they dragged to the crevice and another was placed as close as possible, and leaving their horses behind as they had to do so in the care of one man they proceed across on foot and all passed over in safty.

'mat was indeed cany enough for us. 'gaid angeline 'ichee looking at yielst with her pieroing yet friendly eyes.''I wonder what will happen nest to imped their our progress.''! They were not long in making the discovery, for they had already crossed only one hale of the path and suddenly they heard a noise. 'Crumphe Crumphe rup crumphe' who noise echoed throughout the villey and seemed to grow louder as they advanced.

They /looked in the direction of the sound, and they naw before them but far off in the distance huge forms of white smoke rising in the air, and geysers of earth and stoke from the ground, and puffy clouds from the distant hilltops , theolouds of smoke rising from the valley floor towering for more than a hundred feet and then aprending cut in a thick wreathe. The noise at that distance sounded like as if the gigantic man in the book of 0 m Ozma of Oz built of cut of plats of cast iron striking the ground with his iron mallet as quick as thirty blows a minute. It just sounded like so many blown having poud pounded the earth, but these resounding blows or thumpswere the cahoes they had heard, and the flashes that produced the stoke clouds were such bigger than usually seen in shell explosions and even one explosion occured between the rocky sides of the math and filled the region with a small avalanch o' stones and gravels. 'Of course seeing this horrible scene so su'denly confronting them on the once beautiful and quiet valley they at once halted. a safe distance away from the terrible clouds of smoke and crouched behind high ledges of rocks. Thier rifles would do no good for them in this case, for it could not be the means of reaching the cannoneers on the hills above, and for the time being the rocky ledges were the only means to protect them from the dangers of those explo exploding shells and shrapnell, but not from dangers of explosis explosions that would liable to appear in the i air above them.

"wow. 'said Cortrude Angeline with a shudder. 'It makes me dreadfully nervious to see those big explosions so suddenly appear right in our front. One of theese those shells would kill or wipe outall of us at once.  here must be a glandelinian position on top of those hills or at least a rebel battery, and are working against us as steadily as a clock. 'Said one of the soldiers. Probably seeing us coming they must have mistaken us for an attacking part y and opened fire but had the range forum fortunately too shot short. I knew trose hillswere occupied by general Homes battery of artillery or had been but T thought they had been withdrawn before now. I t is my buty to have inform you of thin this long ago for it did not come to my mind untill now. It seems the only way we could be cafe from rebel cannons lately or even from rebel soldiers and cavarly and the like, we would have to be crawling underground. Is it not the 'a dangers of the re ellion becoming great. ''?

''Cannot we think of something to do.'' fasked Orgay Violet' Regarding the scene before her with wondering eyes. For the moment since they had gone before t or hidden behind the rocks the artillery had consed firing but the smoke still howered over the scene. 'no ''No I don't think we could do it. 'Noplied Angeline michae.' 'The rebels would see us if we want wentured out agoin and would pound the valley again withshells and probably hit us this time for sure and then it would be the end of us. There is nothing wise or good to think of this time as far as I know and yet we must proceed at any cost wintever...... But nevertheless there is some place. "

"the enemy may know of our intentions or see us too well or something." Observed inlet. "With their cannons the insurgents are keeping us from going further. Is there no way to stop the men from firi ng the batteries.' !

'Only by having long range rifles, and than only can dothat?'

gaid Angeline iviane,
'then' said Jenie urmer, anxiously' hat shall we doefff ?'

'Excuss me for a few minutes.' Said one of the boyscouts and I'll'

He slowly and carefuely left the the rocky ledge, and then retired to a pos position i in front, where he looked cautiously from bh behind a clump of trees to whi which he had crept behin deMeantime the rebel gunners had seen the boy going from the rocks to the teee and some of the guns suddenly fired and two shells exploded near by and the explosions sounded like something striking the earth near the trees terrible blows, and the explosions coming simultaneously school through the valleys like the roar of two canno s cannons. Again and again the explosions of shells came dangerously near the tree , but _iolet and her sisters saw that for some reason or other tha there had been a moments pause between the other gunners, and perhaps the others had also noticed that the gunners for some reason had passed to fire, and then the lad thing some back said;

. the fired upon un but the matter is very simple after all for I looked at t'e hill pps with my one ga glone. If we can ranged it right we can run between shell explosions, but no must be seessporated one by one at long distances apart , and when we hear the guns boom, we must throw u ourselves down, and the shel s or balls will pass over us and explode beyond us. It is the only way for to make a retreat would be doubly dangerous. **

"I'It willrequire very quick work if we escape between b shells. 'Said Joice ivien with a shake of 'is head.' nut it really seems the only thing for us to do. ZAs the distance is only short now, ; wonder who will make the first atrempt. Every one looked at one another hesitatingly for a moment or two. Then the soldiers themselves who were trembling like leaves in the wind from 'ear, said

"Isuppose we being men and should head the precession, must go first and that will mean us. But I must tell the truth we are terribly afraid of the shells as we do not know how to dodge them in time like the little girls do. " 'what will become on un little girle! 'Auked Hettle .iviam.' you soldiers right rush saftly past the exp exploding shell storm saftly but the rebels may know of it intime and change their tation too and we would surely be crushed or mangled. " " "We must all go at once. "Said Angeline ichee norviously. But every one of uus including you girls can seperate yourselves and watchfor the explosions. _hen we know how the rebels aim and what to do as we go on-"

so this was finally decided upon-Suddenly violet said looking at high bushes growing close by;

"we must get across somehow. See the thick shrubbery before us. Let's cut down enough thick branches to hide all of us apiece and we could advance slowly under their coverand the enemy thinking we are shrubbery will not fire upon use." Thin was din done as soon as possible, the bushes were out down, and soon each party started to ersen formard as slowly as possible.

'cling fast to the trees and don't any of you drop a bush. 'Advised Jennie wurner. "I used to dothis trick myself and that's the way I got my experience. To do this it takes great palence and it is a trial too. " go each one clung fast to the bushes that shelled them, and they erouched in a long line and eyed the distant cannons carefully untill they knew just the instant a volley of shots might be fired. when before anyone thought she was ready jennie murmor made a sudden leap forward, and before any one among the gunners saw the

mon motion the party had gained few steps forward and he cannitchet was fired. ivian birls were in advance of this movement, the others had not yet moved forward but they want next. violet and her sisters kept a tight grip on the bushes they held or clung to as they slowly advanced and made the leap former like the others straight and true as an arrow from a bow, and ere before they realised it the landelinians had seen the motion and though no guns reared there was signs of some boing loaded. you came the soldiers behind r in a line even with wielet and her sisters, and while they moved forward cautiously and slowly but in early they were within hairs breadth of being emight by sees shells for two exploded elene to them but did no harm though it emised encitement. Joice who was in the lead edged forward to the very edge of the spot where the first employions had appeared, and then all remained motionions for mearly-tem minutes. when an no cannons boomed forth they callly moved forward again. . gain and again they made in made the the quaer movements and they made this in safty. some of them however were always wihin a hair's breadth of being caught by exploding shells, for the rebels could observe that the bushes had never been seen in the valleys before, and also observed that the bushes moved.

One of the Angelinian soldiers who accompanied the party recklessly walked or moved forward to the very pi point where the enemy would have the best range, and just as a number of shells came buritling tward them they all calmly threw themselves flat and the missles passed harmlessly over them and they excp escaped the fragments when they exploded. _hat was a good idea for the others to follow, and they all began to have hopes of crossing in safty for they knew if they once got too near the rebels could not depress the guns sufficiently enough to blow them up and from shells they would be safe. hey had already went for about a mile across in safty we we but when the whole party came to a small stream their knees were so weak from their continual crouching position, that they could not hardly walk another step and some of them fell exhausted to the ground near the edge of the stream.

'In bbetile anyhone of us could have more courage than is considered very wonderful. 'aid one of the little girls trembling in spite of herself.' "nd i in any other conditions our foes and rebel enemies usually find us very terrible to face out real war is one thing for us and this is another. hen it comes to being pounded to death by enemy shells in such a helpless condition and not know ing where the shells will come from next any one i of us can naturally object . **

"Let's make a desperate run for it. ", "ged wiolet.
"'we are already so worn out with this exertion, the that only one or gwo of us am able to run and that is r and gertrude. "Answered Jennie urmer, 'nd if we should try it all of us would be ground up by the exploding shells."

'Well, well.' sighed wiolet.' I see friends that we all have placed u ourselves in the greatest danger in our efforts to reach general Hansonia's army. we might as well stay here stationarly like if we were treps and shrubbery until night fall and then make a run for it down the stream. It least we can do the best we can. "It seems to be our only hope." and Joice.

I really must inform my renders that it containly was mithout telling a lie under any conditions whatever, that it was one of the most trying times of their lives to remain behind the bushes beader the river entiting nearly seven hours more for night to come on. ad worms of all when the twilight become to wen the little girls who had been watching and a hords of grayconts moving down from the hills and swarming the valley with the surpose to look for them, and head of their escape whatever they may turn. To when night time ones wielet and her sisters having alres y already told their comrades and followers to retain their bushs bushes started s'owly and cautiously down the atreams banks, and many times they encountered rebels searching for them, but just in time to stop moving, and the rebels really took the bushes for real ones and did not even look to see if any one was hiding behind just then. whey repeated this during kind of movements over twenty five times,, when all the fugitives had carried themselves beyond the first swarm of rebel searchers, and managed to reach a bend on the stream, and somm saftly on to the other side. y h this time the fugitives were very tired again from their second effort s. and some of them even the little girls panted no hard, as the day and following evening hed been no warm and sultry, that their tongues were almost sticking

"'now will we know how to get away yet?' Asked wielet. "how shall we find out if the persuars have found our tracks and are following us with blood hounds! Oh leave one of the boyacoute behind for a while to not an guard and watch and see if any one is following us. 'quid the captian of the soldiers.' We are all tired out, and cannot go another step for a while. We can only hide under the thick shade of these big oak trees where in the darkness the enemy won't see us.''
Violet andher sisters knowing the danger at once protested that they must have every os one of their company with them under any conditions, else there would not be any of gi them when they got to the generals army and they did not o want to lose one. But neither the men or the other boys would accompany them further unless one was sent to watch out for the enemy, and so Violet with great reluctance sent the eldest boy behind to match for signs of the persuous whe boys name ha bappened to be a lad by the name of Frank Ormaton. _ither the boyscout rans somewhat assessment careless, recklers, overginfident, or he failed to properly time the distance of the persueing or following landelinian soldiers, for ther were musher of clandelinians not far from where he was, and some of the landelinians seeing his approaching opened fire, he bullets missed him but one of the rebels rushed upon the lad and struke struck ablow withhis musket butt, and the mighty weapon caught him equarely upon the side of the head, and thumped him upon the ground so powerfully, that for a moment he lay stun ed and bleeding. he rebel stood glowering above him but the lad recovered almost promotly and succeeded In drawing his little pistol too quiel quickly for the rebel to realise what he was doing , and he shot the glandelinian soldier dead. mhon wounded as the lad was, and with blood streaming down his a face he crawled tward a tall oak tree, and here he clung desperately to the roots behind it, while robel soldiers pounded and trampled the ground in search of him. One oft he other boyscouts seeing the danger of his comrade dashed in to his rescue, and had his left foot smashed by the fury of a spent bullet, before he could pull the wounded lad out of danger. He howehowever covered by the sudden fire of his comrades succeeded, and they found that the wounded had heen badly dazed by the blow of the rebels musket butt, for while the hard wooden butt of which the gun was formed had not actually crushed orward his head his left ear had been almost torn off and he was so dazed and suffered so much pain that he was not hardly able to hear a no single sound. Also his right knee was cracked and pained him, and violet and her sisters herrifed as they were volunteered to assist him in any way and soon had him as comfortable as possible. ielet having torn off a piece of cloth from her inside dress bound up the wounds on his head, her heart fluttering with fear and excitement, and now it only remained to rescue the other lad who had is foot injured. This they managed to do with great difficulty, and four boys accomplished it though many guns flashed at them from the hidden ribels rebels or alandelinians who were bont on proven proventing the p renewe. he boys however accomplished the feat without any one of the four being shot, and when they returned t with the wounded lad they declared they were not hurt in the least.

wherefore the two wounded lade being attended to the entire party proceeded on their a way, the wounded lade being helpled along as under no conditions would their friends leave them behind in the power of the rebels who were stiri striving to snnihilate them alle

By and by when they managed to draw near to a small hill mounting from the edge of the stream the night began to grow dark and gloomy for the reason that the sky was becoming overcast with storm clouds, which shut out the light of the rising moon. nd the air was very silent too in thatvalley, and there was no birds singing or squrrals chattering now, and also no trrees of any great number grew here, only the bare grassy and m ossing grv ground being the only object to admire.

wielet and her sisters, and even all in the party were a little awed by the silence, fearing one of the well known cyclonic storms was approaching, and all the others had become verygrave and quiet also, except the two wounded lads who grouned and monned with pain for every step they made. It was hard for the lad whose foot was wounded, but he had to choose to walk on it than share a worse fate by being taken by thr landelinians.

mo o e wo one on account of the danger to the rest had any chance just now to pay any attention to this because they were now close to a strange lo, looking encampment and they believed that the splendid christ christian armies under general mansonia could not be very far away.

eBuddenly they all heard a shout and storm of jeering yells, and stopped short in fear and arrizement. they found also they would have had to stop in another moment anyway for a huge stream of water, a abrupt bend i in the river barred theur further progress for the path they were following in the dark ran up close to therivers beach and ended.
 ho was that laughing, jeering, and yelling? 'Asked Gertrude Angeline. There was no reply from any one but in the gloom they could see all around them, as well as on the heights above strange forms flitting this way and that, some having with them lanthrens, and others had b, bloodhounds. There is never the prowle pprowling men might be just now they seemed very much like the color of the rocks and grassy ground themselves, for they who had lantrens had the uniforms of the colors of grass or gray rocks, and in the dark, and strange lights their forms or shapes were rough and rugged like shadows also. here a kept close in a perfect swarm as thick as bees, some facing our friends, and seemed to glide tward them like black or dark gray or green colored c ghosts, some others move moving this way and that, with a lack of regularity that wasquite confusing. Ind so peculiar did did they nove that they did not seem to need any place to rest their feet either, but seemed to move like spirits, or cling to a surface of distant rocks like a fly would a window pane, yet all of them were neversial for a moment and second to be coming nearer and makrer every moment. "We will bave to bide behn behind those bushes. 'Said one of the boys as the 14ttle girls shrank lack. 'They are the claricalinian Gargoylies.'
'Ind what are the landelinian Gargoylies. Gerglylians! 'Anked Jennie half frightened out of her wits by the strange scene. "they are the "mooded Terror" or the Ku Klux Klans of the rebels and serve under any rebal general. 'Replied the boy. 'But they willdo us no harm if we keep well hidden from themWe are in disguise you know. You must pretend to wall for one of the rebel guards like the corpor coporal of the guards do, because without that trick we could never worm our way out of the hap we are now in. "'You can make the coll yourselve. 'Baid violet to Angeline ichee. gust then the terrible sound of laughing, yelling, and cursing came again with redoubled viol violence and indeed so waird and disheartening was the sound that nearly all of the soldiers who were with the little girls ande a 'hight shout Pace "movement and allestarted to run as fast as it was in their power. Two of the little wirls at once persued the wen, and wielet cried ' alt you cowards. ' ndwhen the soldiers stopped their flight, she all asked win a very representul look indeed;  mere were you soldiers coing wihout our permission! "We are all surrounded by enemies and it is almost impossible to escape now." a said one of the soldiers trembling like a leaf with great fear. "" o we are going back o to our own lines where we came from. " "That is impossible" aplied inlet reproachfully. "or you have us as enemies as well and we and out to scouts would kill you for deset s desertion on the spot-So rou had better take the chances with the enemy and not us.  *Oh T forgot that we were deserting. 'gaid the officer who was a captian his face turning pale. 11 ''you seem to forget a good many things. ''pemarked _ielet. ''I hope you won't forget that / on are not acting like brave men and deserting seb sevem little Princeses Princesses of Angelinia, and what the penalty would be if we happened to report it to our father or general Hanson Ivian our unclee!!
"Nv Nevere" gried cried "the captian, slapping his medal covered chest and forgett ing his fear. ""Never, never, never. "Gried all the other soldiers and officers, indignantly all slapping their chests also like their captian did.' "" or our part alone. "said the privates themselves in a meek manner" we must obey our officers, so when we are told to run, we run under any conditions, and when we are told to fight, we always fight." "'It did not appear to be that way just now." newered wielet kn inna voice of scorn. 'and now you must all come to the rest and to my sisters and obey our orders and requests. nd remember if you try to make the leas least attempt to run away from us again 1 like you did I will have to order our boyscout companions to open fire upon you. And s as soon as we get back to camp I will see to it that every one of you officers shall be reduced to privates for this behavior." This terrible threat and punishment now coming later on so frightened the soldiers that they had once returned to where violets s s sisters and the boyscouts were standing, the boyscouts looking mean and dangerous to the deserters in the darkhen Joice who was in the group orded out in her loudest voice; The sound that the leader of the plandelinians who are searching for thristian prowlers or so called "thristian dogs come out and see us and give an account of why they swarm the plains of the valley." There was no reply, except that the searchers in the distance laughed in derision and followed by the baying of a number of bloodhounds.
"We must not command the rebels." Said one of the boyscouts" for though we are the Nationals, and they the Insurgents or rebels we do not generally rule them, as we do our onw selves.  "So Joice called again saying; I request the rebel leader to appear to us and tell us why he is searching for ahristian prowlers. **

Still the only ease sounds of derision, laughter, and yells, and else the havoing of the bloodbounds replied to her, and the sen who were secuching for them continued to flit here and there, al always nearer and nearer. "If we do not wish to be fired upon by perhaps a hundred can at close range we will have to try untreaty or give ourselves up. "Said the boyscout lender to Joice. "If the rebal lender will not come at your request, then the insurment commander of the searchers may listen to your pleading and only make us prisoners and not shoot us down for escape now is throughful just now. " joice looked around her proudly. "Do you wish I and my sisters proud Priceeses of Angelinia, to plead with the wisked glandelinians, who are enemies of Our pear pleased Lord!" he asked severely. 'shall I and my sisters, who are all known the world over as the worlds greatest and bravest Child deroines, now go down into thildness and covardice and burble ournelves to wicked creatures of the early earth his who lives in nothing but rerevilness. and who are fightime not only Angeliain but all of the christian world by action, rars fury, and devantation beyond comprehension. We will die by their bullets first. " ''no' shouted all the other boyscouts, and the other girl children with as loud as coices as possible, and one of the soldiers, becausing more encouraged by the defines of the little girls added; "If the rebel leader will not come and allow us to give terms we will ot nllow ourselves to be captured inder any conditions, and tocapture usthey eill have to dig us out of holes I ike foxes or rai bits. but just the same our sweet little _ivian girl Heroines must always maintain their diginity, jo just as we maintain "I'l' not afraid to take the chances in pleading with a pobel leader as long as I have the intention of only tricking him. "Said Angeline ichee." I' only a little girl from the country of Abbienmia and we have nore diginity at he e or elsewhere than we usually know what to do so with. "I'll try and call the insurgent leader to parley with us and allow us through the valley if consible.' ""po" aid one of the boy scouts." and if the rebels makes hash of you some wild beast Will est yo for breakfast to merrow morning Ism sure."

Augeline ligher therefore stepped forward and said;;; "Please ar leader of the alandeliniane in the valley please come and hold a p parley with us if you will it. " just at that moment the low growl of a dog near them was heard, and there suddenly flared a number of lanthress, and a voice fried from one ome forth you people and show yourselves. !! ''isn't it some trick or something or other?'' sked one of the soldiers.
''Never'mind if it is.''Replied going sadly.''... come into this valley to find our way to general Hansonia's army and it seems possible we will have to run some risks to do so. ut as long as we have to devidence of being spice about us the clandelinians I'm sure cannot do anyt anything to us.''
''gome of the landelinian generals though wicked, and an insurgent, are usually honest and even good natured. 'Said Gertinde Ante-Angeline.' If it one of them we can trust them to do what is right." go violet led the way from their hiding place and soon found themselves surrounded by soldiers arread with long guns and bayonets, and they and the prisoners passed through a long yet marrow lane, and from the lane entered a large passage way, and from that into a glan, and to then up the sides of one of the hills, which was now lighted to by the one moon coming out again. where was no one now but only six soldiers to escort the pre-prisoners who were disarred by their captors, but nevertheless all the party pressed on un the hill for about nearly three quarters of an hour, unti'll they came to the summit, and then were ushered in front of a large domed shaped tent or tahour, that was grandly furnished inside. On to o top of the hill were rifle pits, batteries, and breautwordk, A little beyond we were encamp ments and barrioks and other militar'y sores and houses. hey were shown incide the tent. In the centre of the bit big tent was a large Table rude and round in shak shape, and lit littered with all kinds of paper, g and maps, whi while on the back of the table and on two mides, were books mostly geographiew , geographies, spellers and historian Upon a big swivel chair sat a glandelinian general. This landelinian general, was about five feet six inches in height, clothed in a brownish gray uniform that were the exact color of the soft covering of a walmut shell, and he was sitting in ease in the chair in which we hwas was seated. He had thick bushy hair, and a short but flowing beard, which were snow white in color, and his face was as brightly hued and with such glowing cheeks that it looked as if he had fairly paintenand powdered his face. He wore a great round hat like a little girls sailor hat, but with a thick plume covering the top of it, and he had a jw jewl jeweled studded pistol belt enciroling his fat body, and on each side were a bra was a brace of very ugly looking pistols or revolver. As for his features, they seemed kindly and good natured enough and his eyes were turned merrily upon his visitors as violet and her sisters stood before him with their followers close behind theme ''why goodness me he seems to me to be just like ganta daluss,'' hispered violet eagerly to her sister poice, ut the old general happened to hear the speech and indeed it made him laugh around. 'Santa glauus must be my personater. 'quit qu qouted the general in a very pleasant voice, and they all could see indeed that he really did look like ganta the lauss when he laughed.

Violet and her sisters and theories others were very such relieved to find the old general indeed so folly, and in a minute he had issued some or e orders, and to their surprise some soldiers in purple uniforms some in and brought stocks and chairs for them all tist to statute.

while the adventures sented themselves the general picked up a pipe and lighting a match placed the fire into the boul of the pipe u and began puffing out clouds of tabaco smoke that curled in rings above his head, which and her sisters thought this rade the great general look more like gents glauus than ever, but now yoke began spaking, and every one listened intently to her words.

'Your Exce'lency''Said she realizing that he really was general Hausonia as the soldiers she saw come and go wore purple or rad uniforms.''I and my misters here are the 4 u daughters of general Angelic vivian and we have come here to warn you to look out for general Handonia rederal who is going to frautrate you in covering papes advance upon Manley, and we have come here to request you to release your wast army from this dancerous position, whom you have placed on this ill, and which you hold for your pi positions.''

"Oh no I'm afraid you arevery mistaken about that. "Replied the general. "Three are not my original positions, but my encomments which I seized from a rebel army not long ago without even a battle."

"ut that was wrong to do that , as it is danferous and general Hansons Geninian sples have discovered the danger. "Said violet grieved to realize general Hansonia was presumptions and reckless.

'Amordingly to the laws of war, the general can do no wrom in seizing a strong temporary position on high steep bios hills.' namered the general eyeing a ring of blue smoke he had just suddenly blows from his mouth'; that he has a perfect right to hold a all positions he has seized unless notifed by his superior to move to enother another. My positions are very strong.'

"',ou are cheating yourself though.''paclared Jennie.''por you have not a very strong or verysagure position, nor a long line of hills to defend. If you wantto be as reckless as this it would be better for you and your army to jump into the

''It is not so dan erous as to charge with attempting sucide.''Said the general crossing his less and smiling contentedly.''T give you my word that any landelinian army that attacks my positions would only risk destruction. It would be the charge of the

to the rebel general who would destroy blanelf. "Then how would it be possible that the enemy would risk destruction by assaulting your positions when he could have positions equally strong and one that could command your own with artillery that would infilade yours? 'Asted Angeline.

"Easily enough . "was the reply." How suppose my dear girl that I at your fathers or uncles command, gave you a small position for a large commany of boysecuts for a chance of your own safty, and that after the onemy had made an assault on all directions and I had lots of art illery, and with the e help of my art illery my gunners to save you and your company of boys smashed the clandelinian columns into pisces and either destroyed it or drove it back, gould you say then that I had not segured a good strongposition, and saved your as well?"

"No" navered violet.

for exchange of the position just because after you argument I succeeded in smashing the rebel column!

'wo' anid wielet again.

''Of course note' The Angelinian general returned.' Her will I give up my own positions or the hills because general Handonia Sederal is advancing against me with a force superior to my own, phase positions belong to me and I will keep them at any risk.'

"But are making a great and norious mistake just the sens, and are just the same as if you were treating yourself and your army of troops cruelly." Said Angelinia Arenburg who was much distressed by the generals refusal to listen to reason.

'In what way do you mean?' Ho asked.
'By holding a position that is insecure.' Said she.

"Holding a position that is not secure, and you call it cruelty! "Remarked the general puffing our wreaths of smoke and watching them floating into the air . Is a thing I cannot abide or understand. 'I have known that positions on steep kills are the strongest kind so as positions are secured here, and my positions were at first thought to be delicate and tender, I transformed the breastworks into batteries and small sailent fortific ations, and have ravine positions and others scattered around various sections of the sides of the hills also. So instead of being obliged to hold a weak position against the foe, they merely hold an unassailable position and I really think, I have treated myself and my whole army with great kindness. 10 "But you do not know the situation. "Said Jennie. W" Whave been experienced with such t hings as we saw them ourselves. What a dreatful fate would be for your army if it happened what we fear. The enemy would know it is too strong to assail by infantry so they would mass artillery against you that would be unass ailable, and their fire concentrated against you would make your positions untemable. and And the whole region of besieged wiviam Wickey is in great need of strong christian armins to govern it and hold that no enemy comes to the rescue of general Purga torian, and strikes Mansions army a blow that would break the long seige. If you will listen to reason and liberate these hills from your armies, and restore your number to a botter and attemp position. I and my adsters will give you the o number you did it ten kisses for rounde.

The general looked grave for a negative.

'guppeso I refune to do nof' 'He ankada

"Then' Endd Argeline Richee' General Mandoniasvillacon acre here with his mighty Insurport landelinian army and conquer your strong position, and oblige you to retreat in the most disgraceful fashion. We warned you at the request of our father and uncle and if you refuse to do so, they will in case you suffer a disaster reliave you of your command."

The general laughed and then grew grave again.

"You are as brave as givian girls can be my dears." e said to Angeline Riches"

"Ind so are your girl com companions." but you little girls have to idea of the exten of the tack general Handonia and his army would have to undertake to drive me from my position. Come with me to my lines for a moment and see for yourself."

He arcse and took two of the little girls by their hamse, and led them and the others cutside of the tent, and cut into the encarpeants a little beyond the positions. when he he mounted a high rook above the encampments from whence the litt le girls and their companions obtained a wonderful view indeed of the whole hills and their christian positionsembey also realised that it was the Angelinians who had fired upon then from above thinking they were the advance guard of rebels as they still wore their own disguises and some of the Angeliainus looked upon the party with si suspicion but said nothing. That positions with artillery and rifle pite. teening also with machine gues exe entended for miles and miles from east to west and in every direction beyond on the darkness there were so many emp fires that they seemed to be furnaces and forges glowing brightly, and here and there could be seen guards and sentires moving back and forth. On one of the strongest positions were thousands of big cannons, mostly brass pieces behind strong lines of high breastworks, or positions cout of solid rocks and atomes, and these 4xtended in rows far away into the dictance as far as their eyes could follow them in the nights darkness.

while the little maidens heriones of Angolinia gazed wonderingly upon this strange and imposing scene the general uttered a shrill whistle and in a few minutes, from rifle pits, and breastworks solid ranks of Angolinian soldiers marched out. O great indeed were their numbers that they quickly covered the hill top where they stood like immane swarms of black been as their purple uniforms looked he black at night, and they also quickly filled the company streets of some wast camps. Although this tremendous army consisted of the fierce Abyssinkiliand and Angoliniams they and had weapone of hayonets that looked like clittering material of poliched steel, inlaid with something that looked like beautiful genes that gleamed bright ly in the night Upon each brow of the soldiers they were large hats like those soon of college professors but, more large. It was a ident they were as perfectly trained as other christian addicts are for they quickly assembled in long straight lines, rank after rank with their weapons held erect and true as if awaiting but the word and command to levelheir bayonets and rush upon a charging foe.

''This ''gaid the Angelinian general' Is but a very small part of my army indeed.
''I'msure no wicked landelinian general upon earth has yet ever even dared to fight me, for I have moved against may robel armics and they only ran from me or retreated, and I bet you little girls your looks of beautiful hair, and rib'ons and a thousand kisses and hugs that no robel general over will, for I and my army is too powerful to even the Eanleys to attack and oppose.''

"He then gave a signal with his pistol and in a few moments the martial array filed through the company streets and soon disp disappeared either in their tentd or in the r dugoute and works or was mailent positions, after which the sentries and guards who had been for the manent forced to absdon their own tasks resumed their work once more. hen sad and discouraged, v violet and her sisters and the oths others turned to their friends, and rentering the tent the general cand callely reseated himself on his big outyol chairs.

"Maybe after all it would be foolish for the rebel to fight him." roice said to her sister Hattie. "For general Handonia's brave army of insurgents would be quickly destroyed. I am sure the enemy also would not do know what to do or how to act in this emergonoy. I guess the general is right."

"Ask the general where his Kitchen police are?" uggested one of the boyscouts.

"I fell as hungry as a starved tiger."

"I belieb believe general mandonia could surprise general Hansonia some way and pour pounce upon him and his positions and ta tear his army to pieces or somethings." Hemarked one of the Angelinian soldiers who had accompanied wielet and her sisters on this missions.

"It last him try it." said the general with a sneer, relighting his pipe." he Angelinians themselves have too many guards on the hill sides and if the enemy was seen approaching my infantry quild crouch low and spring upon the rebel columns like a tiger spring upon its prey, and would drive the rebels back down again, and chase them to their own position without the rebels being able to approach my position within five hundred feet."
"It seems to mee. Said Joine thoughtfully That our best plan to return to our

"It seems to me." Baid joice thoughtfully "That our best plan to return to our own army would be to ask the general to allow us to have a strong body guars, since after all I believe he really has too strong a posttion to be assaulted, and too

'This is one of the next set sensible things any of you have ever suggested.'De clared the general.'You now know it is for folly for any rebel general to even threaten me, and I am so kind hearted especially to you little girls who are the daughters of general twinn that I will not refuse any request of yours, and you would not need to conk or even wheedles. If you really wish to get back to your lines without encountering too much stirring adventure or danger and acc emplish anything good by your long journey, you may have the strong escort you wish fore But remember I made a bet with you little girls, and what you owe me if your advise is wrong.'

'Yory wall. 'Said violet more cheerfully.' Let us be still bett or friends than ever we were before, and talk over my pla as to return in a nice manner.'

"To be sure. Agreed the general, his eyes twinkling merrily.

"Tam very anxious" she continued To reach our own army or lines which we left to some to yours without any serious adventure whatever is possible. To reads to quanthkin town, and dillikin, and Eve are susp suspicious to us as we fear the enemy have already come by that way and in that direction we are out off from general Humsons army, go tell me sir, how to may accomplish our return without too much excitement and danger as we wish to return without a single loss among ourselves."

"Yes indeed we are. 'Answered Joice firmly and bravely. 'W don't mind a little excitement as long as one of us or any one of our followers are not killed or seriously wounded like the two you just brought to your hospital tente" "mhen 'Said the general' I will make you this offer for your own good; "You little girls, shall with your strong escurt go, but not alone, and must not be unattended to, into my secret pass I have selected in case I really would be worsted in battle, and as you leave my lines I have given your or wi 11 give your strong escort leaders instructions to examine carefully every read, and woodland and find what they contain. You shall have permit ion to command any one of your followers I will 'ive you, but avoid the roadways you mentioned, in pat particular the Ev goad, for if any one of them or more than one proves to be guarded by rebels of some army to mentioned so near, the glandelinians will instantly move upon you and your escort cand if you are captured you may never leave their lines again. You must not have any objections to my advise whatever. It is possible for all of you in this way way to remain free from even persuit, but if you do not observe my advise correctly, and if you run into danger and each one of you are captured or slain then I hope to say if you refused to follow my directions I cannot be to blame. Very few would ever rec eve the privileges I grant you. **

'Oh thank you general, Oh thank you general for this kind offer. Baid Jennie eagerly. 'and

", nd remember if none of you do not do as I advise, and if any readways of or fields or weeds prove to be full of hidding rebels and you run into them then you all will be taken prisoners of shor shot down by ambuscades and so I warn you to be careful, as careful as can be."

They all thanked him and then he added with his eyes twinkling;

"I make but one condition?"
"what is it?" Invalined violet.

''mhat each one of you little girls allow me to embrace you and give you each one little kiss. This is fair and just, and I am saving you from the risks you are unwilling to undertake.''

Learning this peculiar and yet nervy condition imposed by the Angelinian general pansonia iclet, and her sisters became silent, and thoughtful for a few moments, and all their friends and companions, looked at the wivian first uneasity. 'Don't you do it.'Exclaimed one of theboyscouts.' If we take such analoss, we will all run into great peril. May as well stay here in his own lines and await the coming of better devoluments.'

"gut we shall have any amount of chances to get through if we travel by night." "newered Angelina Aronhurg or Gertrude Angeline." urely as we do it beforewe all ought to get through any perilois adventure without mishap and if we do, we shall be able to return to our fathers or uncles army, able be safe from the rebels. "We must not under any condition took failure." Gried , dolet encouragingly.

"We having some allthis distance to warm general Remonds of his own peril, which he refuses to believe it would now be week and very controlly in all of us to aboution g the adventure. Ind we the had shown so much bravery would be laughed at if we failed this time of back cut. Therefore I and my sisters shall accopt the generals officer, and remard him as he wished, and then go at once on our way as he directed."

After he therefore had the reward of one kine and their embrace he enid; "gome along then my dears, and ISHI got the escort and show you the way so you gon't make a mighter."

they all let left the tent and after going son seme distance through an encampment they approached a high wall of rocks, and making a turn they observed a large passageway or lane descending the hill tward the rear of the a a small ridge.

The secort was given to ther all, about three hundred and fifty nounted soldiers, they themselves and their other comrades also recieving horses and after a sweet smiling farewall to the general and the cheering soldiers they boldly proceeded on heir way.

''nemember'' houted the general.''Do not do any traveling by day . Hide at daytime in any possible secure place and travel by night only. You only now have seven hours were of durkness. Get your sleep if possible in the daytime. Your fathers and uncles army is nearly fiv fifty miles away from us now."

The little girls and all their followers found themselves in a very splied splendid passageray, beautifuly formed and colored by rature and looking more grand and yet weird than anything they had ever beheld in the koonlight-rhe walls of thepassage may was high, and shove at certain points were great arches of stone covered with green folinge, these being over thirty feet above their heads, and all the walk of rocks and even the ground itself were of granite and other stone, andeven as shown by moonlight were strangely tinted w exquisitlyey in many beautiful colors, almost like the sceney of the Grand canyon itself. Thick velvet like grass we was growning on the floor of the passage way, and heavy hanging foliage of all kinds protruded downward from some of the strange arches or natural bridges above and at many places the material of the rocks seemed to be of very rare stones covered with delicate moss thatlooked like delicate green sating, and the coloring of the rocks , and elsewhere with the moonlight chining bright ly made the entire region seemed to be lighted by a mysterious glow of strange colors, that seemed tocome from no particular place but nevertheless flooded the entire region with its very soft and pleasing radiance.

violet and her sisters and their strong escort of boy and men followers passed wider one arch way after another, greatly delighted indeed at what they a all saw. Strangely the lovely region had no other occupants but themselves, for the general had left then at the entrance and had allowed no one tofollow after them so that in front of them there appeared no other person nor either any enemy.

Epon the top of the pre precipice walls of the long passage ways, and on many trees themselves, were clustered as thick as stars flowers and blossoms of every dest description, and sens rocks seemed to have all sorts of notals in them. The passage was indeed quite a rancum of flowers and foliage, flowers indeed als also of rare and curious kinds. After an hour and a half however they soon found themselves leaving the beautiful passage ways and came upon a plain, below which to their surprise was thickly wooded, after a hearty examination from a hiding place of the region before the, all of them legan to wonder which of all the numerious sights before them in the deene woods contained any hidden enemies, for they knew they were not far from the road of E o Ev as the general had av advised them when they got out of the passage way to be careful which way they went into the woods. There seemed nothing whatever to guide any of our adventures, and yet all parts of the woods seemed without a spark of human or animal life. so they all felt they must go on blindly as it were, and for the first time violet and her staters alone came to realize how dangerous was their task and how likely they and their companions were likely to loss their freedom or even lives in striving to get a their own lines, if they did not follow his directions. Ho wonder the cunning christian general gave them such a strong eccort of cavarly coldiers, and did not laugh or smile but looked grave at their departure, when he may know or fear how easily the whole party might be easily trapped by hidden enemies. But now since t hey had undertaken the strange adventure would not abandon it. hey looked at thewooded scene before them, and observed not far from them a roadway running into the woods, and mear it a mighty big tree with ten large branches and thought;

"This may be the goad of Ev for we can tell by the tree with ten branches."

go they looked at it closely and then advised every one of their followers:

to have their weapons at a ready, to dismount and to all move forward very cautiously.

To make sure there were no enemies near the little girl Jrennis fired a few shots tward the woods knowing if there were foes near by the shots would be promptly answered. But the woods remained as silent as before. "hey soon were by the t ree and looked around cautiously.

Then they slowly and contiously wandered forward to another large thick group of t rees, and then thinking they saw moving objects comeing tward them, and thinking it might be some rebels swarming forward to open fire they all every one quickly wont behind a single tree and waited breathlessly at again they were unsuccessful to see any one approach, and believed it was only imiganation-three minutes, four nametes, five, six, coven, eight, nine and ten, minutes they waited almost impatiently, and still no one came in sight, though the little girls themselves who could hear almost as good as a cat thought they observed stronge counts as if sene one were talking to another in whispers far beyond. he little girls shivered a little and grow pale even under the white light of the moon, for surely they believed energies were in hiding like themselves, and their own fate depended upon some result? One of the little girls decided upon the others to fire in the direct ion they saw the objects moving but Jennie advised Angeline not to be lasty and as noise from guns may arouse all the enemies who may be enonmomened near by and then all would be loot. go they all resolved not to be hasty, but to work themselves from tree to tree cauticusly and carefully, and so they did so, darting from one tree to another, noiselessly and quickly, gazing earnestly and auxiously in the dird direction of the deeper recesses of the woods and;; "Halt who goes there." whey were startled by the sudden chalange from the distance, and were almost panic stricken and at once each person had different things to decide on what to do. minally they all decided but almost in despair to leave it entirely alone to chance.

and to remain still and not utter a sound.

"If any one makes a sound, or even sneckes I'll shoot him. " warmed the officer in command of the escort in a loud whisper' go be ;; " I SAY THO WENT THERE. AP' APPEAR FROM YOUR HIDING FLAGES OR DOD GAST YOU WE'LL OFEN FIRE. Rang out, a loud w voice and then followed by a curse and blashphemy. There was no answer. he little girls themselves faced the direction of the sound and all s'ut their eyes tightly expecting to see a storm of flashes, and then one of the boyscouts thrusting aside the heavy bh bushes near the tree he was behind saw a object advancing blindly tward him with a musket and bayonet leveled tward hims wot far anny were other objects moving forward. Softly, and slowly he crept forward changing the direction tward the tree which hid Angeline nichee, and she also saw him ad immadiately she draw her pistol, and holding it by the muzale decided to give the prompt promber a tap on the head that would make him go to aloop. she did not know whether it was a comrade of hers lost in or going in the wrong direct ion to hic hide, or whether it was a fee but she did not intend to take chances, but she uttered a low whisper togicalt that some one was provide providing tward here and then seeing the object close by struck with all her might.

where was a sound of some one falling to the ground, andeverything seemed quiet and empty after that, when cloudy the adventurecore managed without danger to get to some other trees a little further off. They all had gained a new new position just in time for within the part where the moonlight shows plainlty upon an opening in the woods came slowly forward a number of gray men or uniformed men. One of the man in advance were a poculiar rounded black but with an image of a pretty green gra grasshopper on top or in front. It was indeed rebels. violet just beyond the scene itself suddenly looked up and almost smiled great as their peril was. Then she fired the robel dropped. "he has the marve to fire next. "ghe asked in a pleas pleasant voice just as a mimber of flashes came from the robels who quickly retreated behind trees themselves.

Jennie wielet , and a beyoccut mearent then who had been at mains behind trees in most annious stience each gave a store of diamey as she but fixed, and then stared into one anothers eyes.

'Has she failed to hit the .man!' Asked Joice.

'go it seems.' Insurered Jennie urmer. m' 'The man who dropped arese and ran off behind a tree with his comrades. But th

"but there is no reason why we should all. fail to succeed if necessary. 'Said violet. 'I did not want to wound the man . quet fired to scare him. who next time they appear and charge us though I want every one of you to open fire at once, for are are only twolve enemies I think to our two hundred and fourty. '' ot so.' Replied Angoline _ ishee sternly.' 'As the boyoccuts are under your command and as adviser and commander of our band of men and boys it is the privilege of one of the boys to do so. "

"away you go then. 'Said the boy scout leader to one of his boys john immoni by name. But he careful old friend and do not let the traitors in hiding snip

"I will be careful indeed. "Promished the boy, and then he moved forward tward the hiding foes tree to tree, but keeping carefully concealed in the dark, and as the others watched him he soon disappeared as the darkness closed around themall as a scurrying cloud went over the moon. A few minutes of maiting and the light of the moon returned to lighen the scene and the rest of the band of adventurers stee settled themselves for another long wait, for the ex a expected return of the boy. All of them, inc u including wiolst and her sisters also were greatly disheartened by the failure of geting out of the region without encountering the enemy, and the knowledge that they were now hard pressed by hidden foes---in a dreadful greey creepy looking woods filled them with dread in spite of all its magnificence. anxious for the boy who went into the dangerous quest, and without his return they did not know what to do next, and each one even down to the tr v trembling soldiers and to even the private of the escort, began to fear the little boy would never return, . whey expecte! to hear so e shots and hear him cry out but nothing happened. suddenly the boy who had none off returned, and despite the peril of his ow situation bat's bapponed! 'Asked violet anxiously.

"Why be help of the monlight I saw one of the landelinians uniformed or dressed in the fundiant looking clothes you ever can imagine. 'Replied the boy, wining the tears of marriment from his eyes.' 'o one could ever believe that the glandelinians could dress so funny and make of himself such an amsi amusing sight. That shall me do next. We are ull surrounded. 11

At this they all gazed at each other with sinking hearts. One of the other boyscouts more third than the others began to weep delefully.

""hat are you or crying for Ju Jim?" Asked Angeline ichee very indignant, at such display of weak weakness from some of the boyscouts who had accome nied her and her companions.

I wish to get art of t hese danger dangerous woods. ' said the lad. 'But I hate to lost any of you friends. "

"Then you shall go and lead the way out for us. "Declared Angeline "ichee firaly. "Me do it. "! Gried the boy greatly alarme!.

"Certainly Jin. It is your duty indeed to follow theadvises and orders of your commanders. Comes Come commades. Let's get out somehow if we have tofight our way through with pistol and swords. " "I won't lead the way. 'Said the boy troubling like a leaf. 'I would like to though, of course, but for some reason I cannot explain I just simply won'TT...

Violet and her sisters looked enquiringly at Angeline sichee.

"Never mind said little brave iches." If he does not care to dead the way for us and take the chances as well as we do, We'll abandon him to the enemy by going ourselves and leaving him behind in the woods. ********

All, right, all right . I'll go----of course I am going to lead the way. 10 alrost yelled the boy as quickly as cent. 'which way do we d go. Let me lead the way go he was compelled to take the lead, and he carefully edged his way forward, escorting the others who moved from tree to tree, keeping as sharp a lookout as a cat would for nice, and every one as they went on , always wondered what the result would bee what the rebels were doing nowno one could tell, but it was not long, before there was six flashes suddenly in front of them, and to their horror the boy behind wielet fell and lay still with a shot in his brain. Shots had flew past the others but no one e'se wad hit. They feared however it would not be long before some other one of them would be the next victim, and so they answered the fie in a bunch but without effect, and rebels only fired again from another quarter and to the fright of the little girls six of their soldier escorts fell shot dead, and joiet herself felt a sudden ; pain in the arm. It was evident enemies were closing on them in every direction, and thus one after another had to seek better protection than tree,s for while the trees sheltered them in front they were fired upon from behind and the danger was greater now than they supposed it was the lad who took tye lead had also been b ki's jilled ear and to say and some other boy was forced to try his fortune. Thus one after another of the company, all of the men and boys nowcrowding about the girls to protect them filed carefully from tree to tree, and made their attempt to bring down a fee, but though now both sides fired occasional, y neither side lost any one.

Me meantime during such a trying ordeal some of the officers ordered a new supply of ammunition to be served to some running out of ammunition, and to take care of the girls who were waiting for a chance to get to better safty, and at their commands this wad being done. One of the officers was not unlike the other Angelinians in mansonias army that wielet and her sisters had seen, but he were heavy gold embroiderment on his uniform o coat to show that he was a sort of con colonel and he also assumed an air of much importance, and even told his own superior officer who was a lieutement colonel not to be too reckless or he would be also shot by the hiding rebels who were surrounding thou all and oniping them. Despite the peril they were in, and tempite the excitement of it all violet and her sisters having eaten no supper we were hungry and even sleepy, and they were not now even afraid of being wounded or ill, and so ate freely of the rations they carried with them on their quest eating also several good cakes , and finding them very good, and also drank a bottl of cold black coffee and also found it most refressing. of zil the large party which had started upon this second adventure, the ivian irls and the three girl companions and the soldiers were now more further Mprt apart, the little girls being almost left alone. Of course every one except the four who had been killed were still all there, but they also having eaten a little to quiet their nerves had gone behind double trees, and rocks, also, some had even climbed the trees nearest them unseen by their enemies, while upon the other side stood the boyscouts behind trees and high rocks with guns drawn, all motionless and silent as if they were more things of wood or stone. Gertrude Angeline herself had quietly walked around from tree to tree for a ceetain distance, and now being for apart from wielet and her sisters and her two companions she tried desperately to find her way back to them again without encountering fees who would she t her down in the darkness ... very one felt sleepy but to dare sleep meant death for them 11 all-presently Gertrude Angeline in going from a from a tree, and rushing to another one tent feet apart spied a hollow undermeath a large oak tree, and seeing wiclet and her sisters close by, crept into the hollow unot i unnoticed by either them or the foe. he could still hear the chattering of the rebels around her, but it was again intensely dark as the mok moon went behind another cloud, so that soon she almost fell asleep.

in silence for a long time, for no doubt they knew wielet was in no hurry whatever to be shot or taken pr somer by the hidden enemies and made her search very slowly and carefully. The others homever especially her sisters and the boyscouts who seemed to know by some reason or other, all that was taking place in the woods a little beyond, grew anxious and impatent impatient finally, and declared that they would not wilt any lourge.

But we have to sleep come what may, fust the same as any one also do ne we did not along such at all lost wight and so for my part we are going to try and hide rone anfilly and manurals by climbing the trees around us, and expect every one also to do so to a very few minutes. It a the only but, were otherwise we will all be killed before to merrow morning. "

Indead it was not long after before they all had did the deed of getting high up to the very top of the trees unknown by those hard pressing them below. Of course they me used ground if they brought they really very more very cale among the tree tons because the energy at their cudden disappearance at once realized the reason of it, and some began advised in a perfect fury at the tree tops nearest thema pourer no one was hit, as the energ uncorrain where their furthires hid did not noting the one and the see one one of the lighting the clapping their bands in gles but reliable of the lighting reliaved, and some of the lighting part like clapping their bands in gles but prudently remained silent .

We are alrest indeed but do not like to sleep forever just now when we have some important thing to do. . o if you light your edgarable I'll chake you out of your branch. "

"IT don't see where you have any buteness to sit up so high and light a signi-otte here." Said another girl who was Certrude Angeline looking at the foliage of the tree carefully. 'If that lighted match touched one branch we would be enguifed in a mass of finms we could not escape from and be burned to death. This is a pine and evergreen forest. o don't start a forest fire while we are un here please. "We have no buisness to get into this wess in the first place. 'Replied the man gruffly. 'We will all be no cross as griffins in the morning. nd probably none of the little girls made any answer to this remark, and fearing the chery may come with torohes and purposely light up the trees with fire to rout them from their hiding places they all started to work from one branch of n-tree to another as carefully as possible. The little girls were like monkeys. They also were gironthe first chance to start, and the boyscouts and the soldiers who were privates the next, although they were not so good at such motions among branch after branch, and the officers camenexts he trees were close together here. and they found the motion safe and easier than supposed, but each motion however. was a perfect bore for the clumsy men but they learned from experience not to let one brand branch sway too much as it would attract their enemies who could see it in the moonlight, and so after every atempt they rested for a mirate and passed the time very quiwtly, since they all realized they were only made of oflesh and were not empty air and did not like the idea of having the rebels fire a sudden volley into their shelter.

hen it seemed that they had gone to some distance and when they had to rest for a few minutes joice remarked in a sad tone;; 'I am is great sorrow over the loss of about four of or comrades. We have ourselves. that ix is I and my sisters have had many dangerous adventures together, even with soldiers helping us, and mostly escaped them all without any losses whatever, and now it grieves me to know thatwee have met with this tragedy and that they are lost
